Jno. R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., S. O. Bland, of Newport News, and Frank Armistead, of Williamsburg, for the Commonwealth.

Miller & Miller and Meredith & Meredith, all of Richmond, for defendant in error.

KELLY, P. Pursuant to the provisions of the act of March 24, 1914, as amended March 21, 1916 (Acts 1916, p. 729), this action of assumpsit was brought against J. Frederic Kernochan, committee of Marie Marshall, for the recovery of alleged omitted taxes on intangible property for the years 1897 to 1914, both inclusive, and taxes assessed on such property for the year 1915, claimed to be due the state of Virginia and the city of Williamsburg, aggregating over $800,000; the taxes on the real and personal property located in this state having been regularly paid. A jury was waived, all matters of law and fact were submitted to the court, and a judgment rendered for the defendant.

The question in the case is whether the taxes sued for could be lawfully assessed against the intangible personal property of Marie Marshall, who is now, and has been since 1872, non compos mentis, and during all of that time either an inmate or under the control of the institution now known as the Eastern State Hospital at Williamsburg.

[1, 2] The lower court held that Miss Marshall's domicile was in the state of New York, and based its decision largely, if not wholly, upon that ground. This finding of fact being in our opinion correct, the judgment complained of must be affirmed. The further question, discussed at considerable length before us whether the domicile of the incompetent or that of the committee determines the situs for taxation, becomes immaterial, because in this case the domicile of both is in a foreign state. It is to be noted in the outset that in Virginia domicile, as distinguished from residence in the more ordinary and usual sense, fixes the situs for the taxation of intangible personal property. Pendleton v. Commonwealth, 110 Va. 232, 65 S. E. 536; Hurt v. Bristol, 104 Va. 213, 216, 51 S. E. 223, 7 Ann. Cas. 679; Cooper's Adm'r v. Commonwealth, 121 Va. 338, 344, 93 S. E. 680; Talley v. Commonwealth, 127 Va. —, 103 S. E. 612.

We quote the following as to the facts of the case from the written opinion of the learned judge who tried the case below:

"Miss Marie Marshall was born in New Orleans. When a child between eight and ten years of age, she was brought by her parents to the city of New York, which became the residence and domicile of Mr. and Mrs. Marshall and of their children. She resided in New York City during her minority with occasional visits to an aunt living at Petersburg, Va. As she approached her majority her mind became impaired. While on a visit with her mother to her aunt in Petersburg, her mental condition became such that she was taken to the Eastern Lunatic Asylum at Williamsburg, and was admitted as an insane pay patient on October 8, 1872, by the board of directors of the asylum. She remained an inmate of the asylum—hospital, as it was later named—until the year 1897, when she was moved to a house and grounds adjacent to the hospital, purchased for her by a proceeding had in the Supreme Court of New York. She has ever since occupied this abode.

"The intangible property owned by Miss Marshall was derived from her father's and mother's estates. John R. Marshall died in 1881 in New York, and his will was probated in the county of New York leaving his entire estate to be held in trust for his wife, and at her death to be divided equally among his three daughters. Mrs. Evelin Marshall, the mother, died in 1885, and her will was probated also in New York, and her residuary estate was divided among her three daughters. The share of Miss Marshall was left to the executors of Mrs. Evelin Marshall in trust for the use of Marie Marshall.

"In 1894 proceedings were instituted in the city of New York, and as the result of said proceedings Marie Marshall was adjudicated insane and incompetent, and the defendant, J. Frederic Kernochan, was appointed committee by the Supreme Court of New York of the person and estate of Marie Marshall, and qualified as such by entering into a bond of $1,280,000 in December, 1894. In an action brought for an accounting by the trustees under the will of John R. Marshall, it was ordered by the Supreme Court of New York that the trustees transfer to the committee all the surplus income accumulated in their hands as the property of Marie Marshall, and by an order of the said court dated October 5, 1895, the trustees under the will of Mrs. Evelin G. Marshall were directed to pay over the accumulated income arising under the trust to Mr. Kernochan, acting as committee.

"After the death of Mrs. Marshall, the trust created by John R. Marshall for the life of his wife continued for a period of 12 years for the benefit of his daughters. After the termination of such period, the trustees instituted an action for an accounting in the separate trust for the benefit of Marie Marshall under her father's will, and a judgment of the New York Supreme Court was entered April 6, 1898, which decreed that the corpus of this estate be paid over to J. Frederic Kernochan, committee. Owing to an appeal, however, being taken, this judgment did not go into effect until February, 1901, when the Court of Appeals sustained the judgment of the lower court and directed the transfer of the corpus of the estate of the incompetent to the committee of Marie Marshall.

"An accounting action was then brought by Mr. Kernochan, at that time sole committee of the person and estate of Marie Marshall. In this action an order was entered on May 8, 1901, appointing the New York Life Insurance & Trust Company to act in conjunction with Mr. Kernochan as committee of the estate of Marie Marshall, and directing Mr. Kernochan to transfer to the New York Life Insurance & Trust Company all the property in his hands as committee, and to deposit the same with the New York Life Insurance & Trust Company, and it was also ordered that upon such delivery and deposit with the New York Life Insurance & Trust Company being made, the bond given by Mr. Kernochan as sole committee should be canceled.

"Prior to the appointment of the New York Life Insurance & Trust Company as co-committee, Mr. Kernochan made application to the court of the city of Williamsburg to be appointed committee in Virginia of Miss Marshall, and in February, 1895, he was appointed by that court as committee, and entered into a bond in the penalty of $2,000 as such committee.

"In August, 1895, Mr. Kernochan, as committee of the person of Miss Marshall, applied to the New York Supreme Court for authority to purchase a house and grounds as a residence for Miss Marshall, adjacent to the Eastern State Hospital, in Williamsburg, and to make the necessary expenditure for such purpose, and for the improvement of the house and grounds as so purchased. The court granted the authority asked for, and such funds as were necessary to carry it into effect, and in 1897 Miss Marshall was removed to the house purchased for her. But before such removal was had, an agreement between J. Frederic Kernochan and the Eastern State Hospital was entered into, dated May 21, 1896, reciting in its preamble that the party of the first part had been duly appointed committee of the person and estate of Marie Marshall in the states of Virginia and New York, by orders and decrees of the courts of each of said states having jurisdiction of the said matter, that the party of the first part is a resident of the state of New York and his ward is and has been an inmate of the Eastern State Hospital, situated in Williamsburg, Va., and that 'it is the desire of the party of the first part in his capacity as committee of the person of the said Marie Marshall that she should continue to be and remain in and under the custody and control of the board of directors of the said Eastern State Hospital, although she is to reside in a cottage of her own outside of and adjoining the grounds of the said Eastern State Hospital,' and in the granting clause of the agreement it is provided that 'all the care and control of the person of the said Marie E. Marshall, and all questions in regard to mode of life, diet, regimen, exercise, amusement, regulations of personal attendance, and, indeed, all questions relating to Marie Marshall personally, or in any way relating to the health and happiness of her mind and body, shall be under the supreme control of the board of directors of the said Eastern State Hospital, to be exercised by its chief medical superintendent,' and in the fourth paragraph of the agreement the statement is made: 'it is expressly understood and agreed that the question of Miss Marshall's health and happiness is of the most paramount importance, and at any and all times every question in the management of said house must yield to the decision of the board of directors of the said Eastern State Hospital as expressed by its chief medical superintendent.' An addendum to this agreement was made on the 17th day of May, 1900, dealing with the installment of a water system, and it provided that 'the arrangement herein set forth shall continue for a reasonable time, in the event of the death or removal of Miss Marshall, as outlined by Mr. Kernochan, committee, in his letter of April 14, 1899, hereto attached and made a part of this agreement, and it is further understood and agreed that under no circumstances shall this contract be terminated during the lifetime of the said Marie E. Marshall without reasonable notice.'"

[3, 4] Miss Marshall's domicile was clearly in New York at the time of her commitment to the hospital. There is no room for controversy upon this point. It has remained in New York to this day, notwithstanding her continued presence in Virginia, unless it has been changed by some competent and authorized person or tribunal, and the burden of proving the change is on the party alleging it. Cooper's Administrator v. Commonwealth, supra; Talley v. Commonwealth, supra. If such change has been made, when and by whom was it done? Miss Marshall could not have done it because she lacked the mental capacity.

[5] The question then is whether her domicile, independent of her own will, has been changed for her by some competent agency and authority. Such agency and authority, if it existed at all, must, of course, have been found in her committee and the courts having jurisdiction of her person and estate.

[6] In their learned and resourceful arguments and briefs, counsel on both sides have dealt at length with the two branches into which this question naturally divides itself, namely: (1) Did Miss Marshall's committee possess the power to change her domicile from New York to Virginia; and (2), if so, did he ever exercise that power? The commonwealth contends for an affirmative, and the defendant for a negative, answer to both of these questions. The former, to prevail in this case, must maintain such an answer to both, while a negative answer to either concludes the case in the defendant's favor.

Very much of the able and painstaking opinion of the trial court was addressed to the question of the committee's intention to make a change in the domicile of his ward, and the conclusion was there reached that no such intention had been shown. We find it unnecessary to deal with that aspect of the case, however, inasmuch as we are of opinion that regardless of any question of intention, the better reason and authority is to the effect that the committee had no power to make the change.

Mr. Raleigh Minor, in his work on Conflict of Laws, on page 109, states the law as follows:

"The question remains: What is the locality of the lunatic's domicile when he is himself too insane to choose one? Shall the guardian or committee have power to change it, or must it remain unalterably where it was when the disability was first incurred? This case is closely analogous to that of the guardian's power to change an infant ward's domicile, already discussed. As to the lunatic's municipal domicile, it seems that the guardian has the power, but not so with respect to his national or quasi national domicile. His latter domicile will remain unchanged regardless of the place of his actual residence. He will retain the domicile he possessed before he became insane upon the principle that a domicile once acquired is retained until another is gained."

As Mr. Minor points out, the question here "is closely analogous to that of the guardian's power to change an infant ward's domicile." With respect to the latter the better doctrine seems to be that the guardian may change the municipal domicile whenever such course is for the best interest of the ward, but that (unless he be the natural guardian or at least one occupying that relation) he may not make any national or quasi national (interstate) change of the domicile.

Minor on Conflict of Laws, p. 90; Lamar v. Micou, 112 U. S. 452, 5 Sup. Ct. 221, 28 L. Ed. 758. These authorities point out the important considerations justifying this limitation upon the guardian's authority. The change of the ward's domicile from one place to another in the same state "does not expose him to be subjected to any change in the law governing him and his property as does a change of his natural domicile. The courts are very jealous of a change of that character."

In Sumrall's Committee v. Commonwealth, 162 Ky. 658, 172 S. W. 1057, an insane person had been taken from Kentucky and placed in a Maryland asylum, and it was claimed that the estate was not taxable in Kentucky. The court held otherwise, and said in part:

"From the appellant's appointment as committee to the present time, the status of the ward and his estate has remained unchanged, and there is no claim, and cannot be, that the insane ward fixed his domicile in Maryland, but asserted only that appellant, before September 1, 1913, elected to fix the ward's domicile in that state. In order to enable one of sound mind to change his domicile or acquire a new one, there must be: (1) Freedom of choice; (2) bodily presence in the chosen locality; (3) an intention to remain there permanently. But an insane person is incapable of exercising either choice or intention, nor can these twin elements essential to the acquisition of a new domicile in another state be supplied by the committee of an insane person."

The Kentucky court in that case, after quoting from Minor on Conflict of Laws (page 109, supra), said:

"It will be observed that the text last quoted draws a distinction between a municipal domicile and a national or quasi national domicile. We may concede that appellant as committee has, as claimed by it, all the power that a guardian possesses with respect to the control of the person and estate of his ward, and that by virtue of such power it may change, within the bounds of the state, the municipal or county domicile of the lunatic of whose person and estate it is the committee, but we do not give our assent to the proposition that a guardian or committee has the power by the right of election to change the domicile of the ward from this state to another state. * * * The brief of appellant's counsel seems to take no account whatever of the distinction between the within-state or municipal domicile and the out-of-state, national or quasi national domicile, or to realize the fact that in this jurisdiction the right of the committee to change the domicile of the ward, by removing it to another state, has never been recognized."

In Lamar v. Micou, 112 U. S., supra, Mr. Justice Gray said:

"But it is very doubtful, to say the least, whether even a guardian appointed in the state of the domicile of the ward (not being the natural guardian or a testamentary guardian) can remove the ward's domicile beyond the limits of the state in which the guardian is appointed and to which his legal authority is confined. Douglas v. Douglas, L. R., 12 Eq. 617, 625; Daniel v. Hill, 52 Ala. 430; Storey Conflict of Laws, § 508, note; Dacey on Domicile, 100, 132. And it is quite clear that a guardian appointed in a state in which the ward is temporarily residing cannot change the ward's permanent domicile from one state to another."

In Ex parte Bartlett, 4 Bradf. Sur. (N. Y.) 221 (cited in Lamar v. Micou, 112 U. S. 452, 5 Sup. Ct. 221, 28 L. Ed. 751), it is said on page 225, referring to a guardian:

"There would appear to be no ground for challenging such a control over the residence of the minor as shall not withdraw him from the jurisdiction of his domicile of origin. In the present instance, the residence of the infant has been changed from one county to another, but still has been retained under the sovereignty of the same laws. This, I have no doubt, is completely within the scope of the guardian's authority. No rights are impaired or affected by the act. The jurisdiction of the state is preserved."

To the same general effect as the above authorities is Long on Domestic Relations, §§ 179, 190.

We fully realize that the authorities upon this question are not in harmony. An extended review of them would prolong this opinion without affecting the result or accomplishing any good purpose. It will be found, however, that most of them which appear to support the power of a guardian or committee to make a change of the ward's domicile, either relate to the municipal as distinguished from the national or quasi national domicile, or relate to cases of change by a parent or one standing in the relation of a natural guardian. The case in hand is not within either of these lines of authority. In so far as there is any necessary conflict in the decisions as to the case here presented, we feel constrained to follow those holding that a guardian or committee, other than one occupying the position of a parent, has no power to change his ward's domicile from one state to another. Such a change, as the authorities point out, might materially impair or affect some of the substantial personal or property rights of the insane person, as well as the right of succession at his death.

In this case it is perfectly clear that Miss Marshall became insane while her domicile was in New York; that her parents, who were then living, never attempted or intended, and in all probability would not have been willing, to make any change in her domicile; that her parents made no provision for the appointment of a guardian or committee who would stand in loco parentis; and that therefore there has been no competent mind or authority which could have changed her domicile from New York to Virginia. Having reached this conclusion, it follows that the judgment of the lower court must be affirmed.

[7] It appears that Miss Marshall's estate has in a large measure escaped taxation in New York. Counsel for the committee contend that this result was lawfully accomplished, and was due to the alleged fact that according to the law in New York the actual physical residence and not the domicile of the taxpayer fixed the situs for taxation. On behalf of the commonwealth it is contended that the committee, in proceedings by which the exoneration in New York was accomplished, affirmatively recognized by affidavits and otherwise that Miss Marshall had become domiciled in Virginia. The lower court sustained the committee's contention, holding that nothing done by the committee amounted to an admission that she was domiciled in Virginia, or showed any intent to change her domicile from New York to the latter state. Whether the decision be rested upon that ground or upon the ground upon which we have placed it, the result is the same; and the question for us to decide is, not whether the state of New York has been wrongfully deprived of taxes upon the estate, but whether Virginia has the right to claim and collect the tax. Buck v. Beach, 206 U. S. 392, 27 Sup. Ct. 712, 51 L. Ed. 1106, 1112, 11 Ann. Cas. 732.

For the reasons stated, we are of opinion that there is no error in the judgment complained of, and the same is affirmed.

MANN v. CITY OF LYNCHBURG.

1. Master and servant §364—City and not state employer of policeman.

If a policeman is an employee within the Workmen's Compensation Act, the city, as the party using his services for pay, and not the state, is liable for benefits.

2. Master and servant §417(2)—Compensation case fully determined in public interest, though submitted on limited certification.

The question whether a policeman is an employee within the protection of the Workmen's Compensation Act will be determined as one of a public nature, though the case is submitted to the Supreme Court of Appeals on a limited certification, presenting merely the question whether the city or the state is the employer.

3. Municipal corporations §186(1)—Policeman is a "public officer."

A policeman is a "public officer," and the compensation he receives is an incident to the office.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Officer.]

4. Master and servant §364—Policeman not within Compensation Act defining "employers" and "employees."

Under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 2, declaring in subdivision (a) that "employers" shall include the state or any municipal corporation, and in subdivision (b) that the term "employees" shall include every person in the service of another under any contract of hire, the relation of employer and employee does not exist between a municipality and a policeman, so as to create a liability for benefits, for a policeman is a public officer.

Questions Certified from the Industrial Commission.

Claim by Willie H. Mann against the City of Lynchburg or the Commonwealth of Virginia for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act for the death of Lee Arthur Mann. On questions certified by the Industrial Commission. Questions answered, and claimant denied compensation.

N. C. Manson, of Lynchburg, John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., and J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., for city of Lynchburg and the Commonwealth.

PER CURIAM. The Industrial Commission of Virginia, pursuant to the provision of section 61 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (Acts 1918, p. 637), has certified to this court for its decision certain questions of law arising in the above entitled proceeding.

We quote as follows from the certificate of the commission:

"The claimant, Willie H. Mann, in her own right and in behalf of her two infant children, Bernard Mann, of the age of 13 years, and Arthur Mann, of the age of 10 years, has filed her application for hearing before the Industrial Commission of Virginia, setting up the claim of herself and infant children as dependents of her husband, Lee Arthur Mann, a policeman of the city of Lynchburg, who was killed in the line of duty on the 25th day of March, 1920.

"In said application claimant asks that the compensation be paid as provided by the statute, either by the city of Lynchburg or the commonwealth of Virginia, as liability under the statute may be determined.

"The facts of the case may best be stated in the agreed statement of facts, which is in the words and figures following to wit:

"Agreed Statement of Facts.

"I. The claimant, Willie H. Mann, was the lawful wife of Lee Arthur Mann, who died in the city of Lynchburg, Va., on the 26th day of March, 1920, from the effects of a pistol shot wound in the head inflicted by John H. Williams (colored) on the night of the 25th of March, 1920.

"II. The deceased, Lee Arthur Mann, left surviving him, as his only heirs at law and distributees, his widow, the aforesaid Willie

H. Mann, and their two children, to wit, Bernard Mann, who was born on the 9th day of December, 1907, and is therefore aged 12 years, and Arthur Mann, who was born on the 12th day of November, 1910, and who is therefore aged 9 years. The said widow and children of the deceased were entirely dependent upon him for support.

"III. The deceased was in every respect a duly and lawfully appointed, qualified and constituted policeman for the city of Lynchburg, Va.

"IV. The deceased in the performance of his duty as a policeman of the city of Lynchburg, along with a fellow policeman of the said city, sought on the night of the 25th of March, 1920, to place the aforesaid John H. Williams under arrest, upon a charge of carrying a concealed weapon and upon a suspicion, which has since been confirmed by his own confession, that he was wanted in the state of South Carolina for the crime of murder. The said John H. Williams in resisting the said arrest inflicted a pistol shot wound upon the deceased, from the effects of which the latter died on the following day.

"V. The arrest of the said John H. Williams sought to be made by the deceased and his fellow officer was in every respect a lawful arrest, made in a lawful and proper manner by proper officers.

"VI. The average weekly wage was $26.25, and he was paid monthly by the city of Lynchburg.

"VII. The method of appointing policemen for the city of Lynchburg, and which was followed in the appointment of the deceased, is set forth in the charter of the city of Lynchburg. (See Acts of the General Assembly of 1913, page 238, and special section 10 of chapter VI of the charter, on pages 251 and 252 of said Acts.)

"VIII. The duties of the members of the police force of the city of Lynchburg, including those of the deceased, are prescribed by law, and include the enforcement within the said city of the laws of the commonwealth of Virginia and the ordinances of the city of Lynchburg, and the detention and arrest of offenders thereof. (See section 2901, Code of Virginia for 1919; section 10 of chapter VI of the charter of Lynchburg, supra.) The members of the Lynchburg police force were also made conservators of the peace under the charter of the city of Lynchburg. (See section 4798 of Code of Virginia, 1919.)"

"The city of Lynchburg contends that the killed policeman was not 'the agent, employee or servant' of the city of Lynchburg, but was 'the agent, employee or servant' of the state of Virginia, and that under the terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act the state is the true employer and is alone liable to pay the compensation stipulated to be paid under the terms of the act to the claimants as dependents of the said Lee Arthur Mann.

"The contention of the state is that the city of Lynchburg is by the clear intentment of the Workmen's Compensation Act alone liable, as the employer of the killed policeman, to pay the compensation therein provided to the said dependents.

"The questions of law which are here respectfully certified to this honorable court for its decision and determination are:

"I. Was the city of Lynchburg the employer of the policeman, Lee Arthur Mann, at the time of his death, and is it, as such, liable to pay the compensation to the claimants in the act provided? or

"II. Was the commonwealth of Virginia the employer at said time, and as such liable to pay said compensation?"

[1] From the briefs of counsel for the city of Lynchburg and the commonwealth of Virginia it appears to be agreed that no question is to be raised by either of the defendants as to the right of the claimant, Willie H. Mann, to recover from one or the other. The necessary result is that for the purposes of this case both defendants concede that Policeman Mann was an employee either of the city or the state, within the meaning of the statute. Upon such concession, eliminating any consideration of the statutory definition of an employee, we answer that in our opinion, as between the two defendants, the city of Lynchburg, as the party "using the services for pay," would be liable for the compensation conceded to be due from one or the other of the parties.

[2] If this were a question between private persons or corporations, we might well stop where the briefs of counsel stop, and refrain from passing upon the question as to whether either of the defendants are liable for the compensation claimed. The question, however, is one of a public nature, and we feel that we should answer it as fully as if it had been submitted to us without the limitation above indicated.

"(a) 'Employers' shall include the state and any municipal corporation within the state or any political division thereof, and any individual, firm, association or corporation, or the receiver or trustee of the same, or the legal representative of a deceased employer, using the service of another for pay. If the employer is insured it shall include his insurer so far as applicable.

"(b) 'Employee' shall include every person, including a minor, in the service of another under any contract of hire or apprenticeship, written or implied, except one whose employment is not in the usual course of the trade, business occupation or profession of the employer. Any reference to an employee who has been injured shall, when the employee is dead, include also his legal representatives, dependents and other persons to whom compensation may be payable."

While it is plainly provided in the act that the term "'employers' shall include the state and any municipal corporation within the state," it by no means follows that all persons in the service of the state, or of the municipal corporations therein, are entitled to the benefit of the act; for example, the Governor, Attorney General, members of the State Corporation Commission, judges, mayors, and city managers are all in a sense servants of the state or city, but the act plainly does not extend to any of these persons, and they do not fall within the definition of the statute, which provides that—

“‘Employee’ shall include every person, including a minor, in the service of another under any contract of hire or apprenticeship, written or implied.”

The statute is to be liberally construed to the end that its wise and humane purpose may be advanced; but we cannot extend its provisions by construction, so as to cover persons or occupations not within its scope and intent.

The act, as its title shows, relates to industrial accidents, and its well-known purpose was to substitute for the unsatisfactory common-law remedies a speedier and simpler and more equitable form of relief for personal injuries sustained by persons engaged in hazardous occupations. It would seem clear from the history and purposes and general provisions of the act that the Legislature did not have in mind as beneficiaries any other persons than such as are commonly understood as falling within a contractual relationship of master and servant. It often happens that cities and towns employ large forces of men in connection with municipal undertakings, such as the construction of sewers, the building of streets, the operation of rock quarries, and other similar and more or less hazardous occupations akin to those undertaken by individuals and industrial corporations. The Legislature undertook to make an improvement upon the remedies hitherto existing in cases of employees receiving personal injuries, and who might or might not, according to the particular facts of the case, have a cause of action against the employer on the ground of negligence or breach of duty, and manifestly the idea was that this remedy should be provided for those who theretofore stood in such a relationship as that there might be in cases of negligence a liability on the employer. Griswold v. Wichita, 99 Kan. 502, 162 Pac. 276, L. R. A. 1918F, 187, 189, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 31. The case of a city policeman does not, as we think, fall within the reason and purpose of the act, and this conclusion is greatly strengthened by the language which the Legislature used in its enactment.

It is no longer open to question in this state that a policeman is a public officer. See Burch v. Hardwicke, 30 Grat. (71 Va.) 24, 32 Am. Rep. 640; Smith v. Bryan, 100 Va. 199, 40 S. E. 652; Sherry v. Lumpkin, 127 Va. —, 102 S. E. 658. And this is the holding generally in other states. See Blynn v. Pontiac, 185 Mich. 35, 151 N. W. 681, 683; Griswold v. Wichita, supra. The act in question, as we have seen, is limited to persons in service of the state or city under a contract of hire. A public officer does not perform his duties under contract, express or implied, but by virtue of the law creating the office. His compensation is a matter of statute or ordinance, and does not depend upon the amount or value of the services performed, but is incident to the office. Unlike an employee working under contract, an officer acquires no vested right to have the office continued during the time for which he is elected or appointed, since the authority creating the office may abolish the same during the term of the incumbent, or change the compensation and the duties to be performed. The following authorities may be cited as sufficient in support of the foregoing propositions: Booker v. Donohoe, 95 Va. 359, 363, 28 S. E. 584; Nichols v. MacLean, 101 N. Y. 528, 533, 5 N. E. 347, 54 Am. Rep. 730; Mechem on Public Officers, §§ 463, 855; U. S. v. Hartwell, 6 Wall. 385, 393, 18 L. Ed. 630; Hall v. Wisconsin, 103 U. S. 5, 26 L. Ed. 302.

While it is true, with respect to the decided cases in other states which have dealt with a similar question, that most of them have turned upon the peculiar language of the local statute, and therefore cannot be said to be of any very great assistance in the construction of the Virginia Compensation Act, the case of Sibley v. State, 89 Conn. 682, 96 Atl. 161, L. R. A. 1916C, 1087, is so pertinent in its reasoning that we feel justified in quoting from it at length. That was a case in which the Supreme Court of the state of Connecticut held that a sheriff was not an employee of the state within the operation of the Workmen's Compensation Act, which rendered the state liable for injuries to its employees, but defined an employee as any person who has entered into or works under contract of service with an employer. The commissioner held otherwise, and the Connecticut court, in reversing that finding, said in part:

“That the injury which caused Sheriff Sibley's death arose out of and in the course of his employment, so as to entitle him to compensation, provided he was an employee of the state within the meaning of the act, has not been questioned before us. The respondent's claim is that, according to the definition of the word ‘employee’ given in section 43 of part B of the act, Sibley was not an employee of the state.

“Part B, § 43, gives the following definition of ‘employee’ and ‘employer’: “‘Employee’ shall mean any person who has entered into or works under any contract of service or apprenticeship with an employer. “‘Employer’ shall mean any natural person, corporation, firm, partnership, or joint-stock association, the state, and any public corporation within the state using the services of another for pay; it includes also the legal representative of any such employer.”

an employee of the state within the meaning of the statute. As the statute, by defining 'employee,' leaves no question as to its meaning, the commissioner must have held, and his memorandum of decision shows that he did hold, that the sheriff was working under a contract with the state while performing the duties of his office. In this he was in error.

"* * * The office of sheriff is thus a public office as defined by us in State ex rel. Stage v. Mackie, 82 Conn. 398, 401, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 680, 74 Atl. 759, and numerous other cases, and by, so far as we know, all courts and text-writers. The incumbent of such an office holds it as a trust from the state not resting upon contract. State ex rel. Rylands v. Pinkerman, 63 Conn. 176, 182, 22 L. R. A. 653, 28 Atl. 110. He is a preserver of the public peace; he is not the hired servant of a master; no contract relation exists between him and the community or state. Farrell v. Bridgeport, 45 Conn. 191, 195. In Seymour v. Over-River School Dist., 53 Conn. 502, 509, 3 Atl. 552, as showing that a teacher in a school district is not a public officer, it was said: 'He is not usually elected or appointed, but is employed—contracted with.'

"Mechem, Public Officers, §§ 855, 856, says: 'The relation between an officer and the public is not the creature of contract, nor is the office itself a contract. So his right to compensation is not the creature of contract. It exists, if it exists at all, as the creation of the law, and when it so exists it belongs to him "not by force of any contract, but because the law attaches it to the office." * * * Unless * * * compensation is by law attached to the office none can be recovered.'

"Compensation to a public officer is a matter of statute, and not of contract, and it does not depend upon the amount or value of the services performed, but is incidental to the office. State ex rel. Evans v. Gordon, 245 Mo. 12, 149 S. W. 638, 641; Leonard v. Terre Haute, 48 Ind. App. 104, 98 N. E. 872. A salary is attached to the office to enable the incumbent the better to perform the duties of his office. State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Hawkins, 44 Ohio St. 98, 110, 5 N. E. 228. It is the substantially universal rule that a person who is elected or appointed to a public office to which no salary or compensation is attached by law can recover no compensation for his services, although he qualifies and performs its duties, and for the reason that no contractual relation exists between him and the governmental agency by whom he is elected or appointed.

"But it is urged in behalf of the claimant that the statute attaching a salary to the office of sheriff raises an obligation or duty on the part of the state to pay it, and that, if it refuses to pay, the law will give the sheriff an action quasi ex contractu upon the obligation, and that the officer was thus under a quasi contract of service with the state. If, for the argument's sake this were to be conceded, it would not advance the claimant's cause. A quasi contract is no contract. Maine, Ancient Law (3d Am. Ed.) 332, quoted with approval in Keener's Law of Quasi Contracts, p. 6. The term 'quasi contract' describes a situation where there is an obligation or duty arising by law upon which the same remedy is given as would be given if the obligation or duty arose out of contract.

The term itself implies that the obligation or duty is not a contractual one. As we said in Powers v. Hotel Bond Co., 89 Conn. 143, 145, 93 Atl. 245, the Workmen's Compensation Act is founded upon the theory of a contract existing between workman and employer. The contract may be established by evidence showing that an express contract was entered into by the parties or by evidence of facts and circumstances from which as an inference of fact it can legally be found that a contract of employment existed between them. There must be a real contract of employment either expressed or implied, or there is no employee within the definition and meaning of the statute.

"It is said in behalf of the claimant that the compensation act must be construed so as to be consistent with itself, and that as the definition of 'employer' specifically says that it shall mean the state when using the services of another for pay, the definition of 'employee' should be so construed as to be harmonious, and not contrary to the definition of 'employer.' And it is said that as an employer presupposes an employee and vice versa, and as the state was using the services of Sheriff Sibley for pay, it was his employer and the sheriff its employee. The argument is more ingenious than convincing. If, as it assumes, the state used the services of the sheriff for pay when he was exercising for the public good a portion of the sovereign power of the state as a public officer and received the salary attached to the office, and if this made him an employee of the state, he was not, as we have shown, an employee under a contract. But we think he was not an employee, and that the state was not using his services for pay. He was performing a duty which he owed to the state, and the salary which was attached to the office was not given in payment for his services, but, as is said concerning public officers in State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Hawkins, supra, to enable him to perform his statutory duty as one of the public functionaries of the state exercising a portion of its sovereign powers. The state, like public municipal corporations and private firms and individuals, may be and is a large employer of persons by contract. The state and the person or persons whom it employs to care for the lawns surrounding the Capitol are as much employer and employee as are the householder and the person who is employed by him to mow his lawns; but no one would say that the Governor and others public officers who exercise the sovereign powers of the state and receive as such officers the salary attached by law to their offices are mere employees of the state. While exercising those powers they represent the state. The office is a trust and not an employment; the salary attached is for the maintenance of the office, and not a payment for the incumbent's services." (Italics added.)

The case of McCarl v. Borough of Hous-ton, 263 Pa. 1, 106 Atl. 104, deals with the case of a policeman under a statute which is somewhat similar in its provisions to the Virginia statute, and reaches a conclusion different from that reached in the Sibley Case and approved by us in the instant case. In the McCarl Case, however, the statute involved did not use the expression, "contract of hire," nor, as we think, any exactly equivalent language in the definition of the term "employee," but declared that the term should be treated as "synonymous with servant," and includes all natural persons who perform services for another for a valuable consideration."

The decision in the McCarl Case seems to us to write into the statute terms which are not there, and to bring into the operation of the act a class of persons for whose benefit it was not intended. Of course, as already pointed out above, there is a sense in which every officer is a servant, and in which every officer performs services for pay, but this is no more true of policemen than of any of the other officers of the state or municipality. If any such officers are to be included within the provisions of the statute, the amendment should be made by the Legislature, and not by the tribunals called upon to construe and enforce the law.

It follows that we are of opinion that neither the city of Lynchburg nor the state of Virginia can lawfully be required to pay the compensation claimed in this proceeding.

REALTY CO. OF VIRGINIA, Inc., v.
BURCUM.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 17, 1921.)

1. Trial ⇐252(2)—Instructions must be supported by testimony.

A trial court is not required to give instructions presenting a plaintiff's or a defendant's theory of a case, unless these instructions are supported by the testimony, and it must be supported by appreciable evidence.

2. Contracts ⇐176(1)—Duty of court to construe deed or contract.

It is the duty of the court to construe a deed or contract, and the rule against peremptory instructions is not to be construed as applying to cases in which the verdict of the jury depends necessarily and exclusively upon a question of law, such, for example, as the legal effect of a deed or contract.

3. Brokers ⇐56(2)—Representation of purchaser that he was not under obligations to broker did not relieve owner of liability for commission.

A negative answer by purchaser to inquiry of owner of property whether purchaser was under any obligations to a real estate agent who had the land listed would not relieve the owner from liability, if as a matter of fact the real estate agent was the procuring cause of the sale.

4. Brokers ⇐53—Activities of realty company's agent held not procuring cause of sale.

Under a contract providing, "Should said property be sold to any one with whom the realty company has negotiated for the sale thereof or to whose attention it has directly brought the property, I agree to pay said realty company the said commission above mentioned," landowner reserving right to sell without compensation to the realty company, the realty company was not entitled to commissions, where its agent, while driving past the land with subsequent purchasers, called their attention to it and described it, and offered to drive in if they wanted to see it, but the purchasers declined, as it was late, and they had not the time; their interest in the property being subsequently aroused by other persons.

Sims, J., dissenting.

Error to Circuit Court, Nottoway County.

Action by the Realty Company of Virginia, Incorporated, against J. W. Burcum. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Henry E. Lee, of Crewe, and W. Moncure Gravatt, of Blackstone, for plaintiff in error.

H. H. Watson, of Crewe, for defendant in error.

SAUNDERS, J. This case is brought before us by a writ of error to the judgment of the circuit court of Nottoway county. The controversy relates to certain commissions alleged to be due by J. W. Burcum to the Realty Company of Virginia, plaintiff in error.

J. W. Burcum, the defendant in error, owned a farm near Nottoway Courthouse, Va. In December, 1915, he placed this farm, Blendon, containing about 120 acres, in the hands of the Realty Company of Virginia for sale. At the same time he signed a written contract of agency containing various agreements with the Realty Company. The Realty Company thereupon included this farm in its advertising matter which they distributed through the mails. In the year 1917, W. C. Dick and wife, of Ohio, having seen various advertisements of Southside Virginia, including the catalogue of the Realty Company, which attracted their attention, came to this state. Stopping at Blackstone, they called at the office of the company, stating that they wished to see a farm listed in its catalogue. Mr. E. L. Denton, manager of the company, thereupon showed them a number of farms. Returning in his automobile from one of these trips, Denton, while passing the Burcum farm, late in the afternoon, pointed out to the Dicks the lines of the property, described the house and other buildings, and, stating that it was listed with him for sale, asked if they wanted to see the property. Mrs. Dick said that they did not care to go in, that it was late, and they preferred to see the Dillemoth place. Accordingly the party proceeded to the Dillemoth place, and stopping, looked it over, securing Mrs. Dillemoth's price on her property. After this trip Mr. Dick did not return to see Mr. Denton about the Dillemoth or any other property, and later the Realty Company ascertained that Mr. Burcum had sold the Blendon farm to Mr. Dick. Thereupon the Realty Company brought an action of assumpsit against Burcum to recover a commission of $900 on the above sale.

The case was tried several times, resulting in hung juries. On the last trial the jury found for the defendant. The plaintiff moved to set aside this verdict, on the ground that it was contrary to the evidence, and for misdirection of the jury. This motion the court overruled. Thereupon the plaintiff applied for and obtained a writ of error from one of the judges of this court.

The plaintiff in error makes five assignments of error, as follows:

(1) The court erred in giving the instruction which was given because the same was mandatory, and required the jury to find a verdict for defendant.

(2) Because the court refused to give the nine instructions, or any of them, asked for by petitioner.

(3) Because the court failed to give any instructions presenting petitioner's theory of the case.

(4) Because the court overruled petitioner's motion to set aside the verdict of the jury as being contrary to the law and the evidence.

(5) Because of misdirection of the jury.

[1] A trial court is not required to give instructions presenting plaintiff's or a defendant's theory of a case, unless these instructions are supported by the testimony. The scintilla doctrine has not been revived in this state. It is true that this court said in Small v. Virginia Ry. & P. Co., 125 Va. 421, 99 S. E. 525:

"We are of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to an instruction upon his theory of the case."

But the court did not mean to say by this language, that merely because a plaintiff, or, for that matter, a defendant, has a theory of the case, he is thereby entitled to an instruction upon that theory. A sine qua non of his right to an instruction is that it is supported by some appreciable evidence.

In that very case the court said:

"The statute against peremptory instructions is not to be construed * * * as reinstating the scintilla doctrine, formerly prevailing in this state. * * *

"The duty and power of deciding finally whether there is evidence sufficient to take a case to the jury must reside somewhere, and, under the law as it now prevails, this duty and power rests upon this court."

125 Va. p. 427, 99 S. E. 527, 528.

It is error to give an instruction where there is no sufficient evidence upon which to base it, as it tends to mislead the jury. Va. Coal, etc., Co. v. Ison, 114 Va. 144, 75 S. E. 782. It is not error to refuse an instruction where there is no evidence upon which it could be properly based—some material fact, which is either admitted or supported by some appreciable evidence. Morton v. Southern Ry. Co., 112 Va. 398, 71 S. E. 561; Richmond v. McCormack, 120 Va. 553, 554, 91 S. E. 767.

Hence, after a trial court has given appropriate instructions, it is not necessarily error on its part to refuse to give further instructions in support of a view, or theory of a case which a defendant wishes to present to the jury.

In the case in judgment the court gave one instruction, which in effect was an interpretation of the contract, and refused, as appears from the record, to give any other or further instructions. Plaintiff in error complains that this instruction was peremptory, or mandatory, and therefore erroneous.

[2] It is the duty of the court to construe a deed, or contract, and, as stated in Small's Case, cited supra, 125 Va. 426, 99 S. E. 527:

"The statute against peremptory instructions is not to be construed as applying to cases in which the verdict of the jury depends necessarily and exclusively upon a question of law, such, for example, as the legal effect of a deed or contract."

This brings us to the consideration of the instruction complained of, the provision of the contract relied upon, and the evidence supposed to entitle the plaintiff to recover.

The clause of the contract upon which the plaintiff in error (plaintiff below) relies is clause 8, as follows:

"Should said property be sold to any one with whom the Realty Company of Virginia, Incorporated, has negotiated for the sale thereof, or to whose attention it has directly brought the property, I agree to pay to said Realty Company of Virginia, Incorporated, the said commission above mentioned."

The instruction given by the court is in the following terms:

"The court instructs the jury that, although they believe from the evidence that E. L. Denton, agent for the Realty Company of Virginia, did have a written contract as shown to the jury, and did take Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Dick by the Burcum farm, in showing him farms in the county of Nottoway that he had listed for sale, and did state in driving past said farm, that there was a farm with about 120 acres that he had for sale, that the boundary began at a hedge, which was pointed out, and that it had an old colonial house, which had no two floors on the same level, and a barn with a slate roof, that he asked Mrs. Dick if she wanted to see the place, and she replied she did not, that he did not remember stating the price or the terms upon which the property could be bought, and if they believe from the evidence of Mr. Keller and Mr. Graham, that Denton did state on passing by said farm as above stated, that the price for which said farm could be bought was $9,000, and that the said farm was subsequently sold to W. C. Dick by J. W. Burcum, and that the Realty Company of Virginia nor its agent, E. L. Denton, did nothing more to cause or bring about the sale of said farm, they must find for the defendant."

[3] This instruction, in substance, gives the evidence upon which the plaintiff bases his claim to recovery, and advises the jury that, if there is no further evidence of activity on Denton's part, the evidence recited does not entitle the plaintiff to a verdict under the contract, and they must find for the defendant. The instruction does not limit the jury to the consideration of the evidence recited, or advise them that they cannot find a verdict for the plaintiff, if, in their judgment, there was other evidence before them which, added to the evidence recited, would support a verdict. Nor was counsel for the plaintiff restrained, or hindered, by this instruction from pointing out to the jury that there was such additional evidence before them, and upon the basis of such evidence, plus that recited by the court, that his client was entitled to its commissions. Apparently the jury could not discover in the testimony, of their own initiative or with the aid of counsel for the plaintiff, the necessary "something more," on Denton's part, to "cause or bring about the sale of the Burcum farm, and support a recovery," since their verdict was for the defendant.

It remains for us to determine whether the trial court properly construed section eight of the contract, when it announced that the acts and words of Denton as revealed in the evidence—that is to say, the activities of Denton—did not afford the plaintiff company the right to recover commissions on the sale to Dick ultimately effected by the defendant, Burcum.

The words, to be construed are the following:

"Should said property be sold to any one with whom the Realty Company of Virginia, Incorporated, has negotiated for the sale thereof, or to whose attention it has directly brought the property, I agree to pay to said Realty Company of Virginia, Incorporated, the said commission above mentioned."

Section 9 should also be considered in this connection. This section retains a right of sale in Burcum as follows:

"I reserve the right to sell, or employ others to sell, said property without any compensation to said Realty Company of Virginia."

[4] The plain meaning of the two sections is that the defendant was free to sell his property without liability to the Realty Company, unless with respect to the sale subsequently effected the latter's initial activities had proceeded to such an extent that they were really the "procuring cause" of that sale. Hence Burcum's inquiry of the Dicks whether they were under any obligations to the Realty Company. But their answer in the negative would not relieve Burcum from liability, if as a matter of fact, as alleged in plaintiff in error's petition, the Realty Company was the "procuring cause" of the sale to Dick.

It appears from the evidence of Denton that on the day on which Denton took the Dicks to see the Lewis farm near Jennings's Ordinary—

"he called their attention on the return trip to the Burcum place, and as they were coming into the village of Nottaway Courthouse, and just about to pass the Burcum place, he slowed down his car, pointed out the lines, as to where the land began along the highway, stated that they extended along said highway over to the Norfolk & Western Railroad at the overhead bridge, that there were about 120 acres in the farm; that he had it listed for sale; that it contained an old colonial house of 12 or 14 rooms, no two of which were on the same floor, the roof being covered with slate, a fishpond and certain other buildings thereon, a large stable covered with slate; that he did not recollect whether he stated the price or not, but told them that it was listed with him for sale, and asked them if they wanted to see it, and while they were passing the property he slowed down his car to intermediate gear and offered to drive in."

"While they were passing, Mr. Dick stated that, if he owned the place, he would cut the hedge from around it. Upon asking whether they wanted to see the property, Mrs. Dick said, 'No;' that they preferred to see the Dille-muth place formerly owned by Gov. Mann, and as it was late in the afternoon, and they had only time enough to see one place, they would look at that."

The party thereupon proceeded to the Dille-muth place, looked it over, secured Mrs. Dille-muth's price on same, and "agreed to return next morning and look at it further."

The witnesses Graham and Keller confirm the above statements of the witness Denton. In addition, one of them states that Denton said the price on the property was $9,000, and the other adds that he was absolutely certain that Mr. and Mrs. Dick heard what Mr. Denton said to them.

The above was the sole interview between the Dicks and Denton relating to the Blendon property. Indeed, he did not see them again in reference to any other property, for they did not return next morning to look at the Dille-muth place. If the above recited occurrences do not support the Realty Company's claim for commissions, then there is nothing further in the case upon which it can be based. Mr. and Mrs. Dick, after looking at the Dille-muth place with Mr. Denton, went to Blackstone to spend the night, stopping with a Mrs. Chalkley. Next morning their landlady called their attention to the Burcum farm, described it as a beautiful place, and asked Mr. Primm, a son-in-law of Mr. Burcum, who was at the breakfast table, if it was for sale, and if he could take the visitors to see it. Mr. Primm replied that he could, if he was able to secure some one to take his place at the post office. He did effect this arrangement, and took Mr. and Mrs. Dick to Nottoway Courthouse to look at Blendon. The parties also saw Mr. Burcum on this trip with Primm. No sale was effected at this time, but in February, 1918, Mr. Dick returned, and on February 19 matters were closed, and a deed to the property was made on March 18, 1918. The price paid by Dick was $9,000.

Upon the above state of facts, was the Realty Company the "procuring cause" of the sale finally effected by Burcum? Did Denton's remarks and acts so interest the Dicks that they were moved thereby to prosecute further inquiries into the merits and desirability of Blendon as a home? Was their interest in that specific property so quickened by Denton's acts and Denton's words that, fairly speaking, those acts and words caused Dick's return to look over the same, thereby setting in motion the negotiations which culminated in a purchase? Looking to Mr. Denton's testimony, it does not appear that either what he said or did in relation to Blendon aroused the slightest interest in Mr. Dick or his wife. Mr. Dick's sole comment on passing was to say that, if he owned the Blendon property, he would cut down the hedge, while Mrs. Dick's response to Mr. Denton's inquiry as to whether they wanted to see the property was that they did not care to do so, and preferred to look over the Dillemath place. It is difficult to find in these responses to the brief comments of Denton on the Blendon property, the evidence of an interest which was to culminate in a later purchase. If the parties were not aroused to an interest in Blendon by the activities of Denton, but by the independent activities of others, then Burcum had a right to negotiate a sale of his property without liability for commissions to the Realty Company. We do not find in the evidence that the Realty Company negotiated with the Dicks for the sale of Blendon, or that what was said by Denton brought their attention directly to the property in the sense contemplated by the contract and necessary to fix responsibility for commissions upon the owner, Burcum. The quickened interest of the Dicks in Blendon was evidently aroused by the glowing comments on its beauty by Mrs. Chalkley, who enlisted the aid of Mr. Primm to show the place in detail to the visitors from Ohio. It was the interest that her comments aroused, followed by the trip to Blendon with Primm, that led to the negotiations with Burcum, and the ultimate purchase. Unless Denton's acts were the "procuring cause" of the ultimate sale, and we do not consider that they were, then Burcum had the right to sell to Mr. Dick "without any compensation to the Realty Company."

We do not find any error in the instruction given by the court, or in its refusal to give further instructions. The verdict of the jury was proper and should not have been set aside.

We affirm the judgment of the trial court. Affirmed.

SIMS, J. (dissenting). I concur in what is said in the majority opinion in regard to the duty of the court to construe the contract, and also in the holding that the instruction given by the court is not per se erroneous, for the reason that it is such a peremptory instruction as is forbidden by statute. There would be no error in the instruction if it was not upon a partial view of the material evidence—I. e., if the evidence therein stated, together with the other evidence thereby left to the consideration of the jury, embraced all of the material evidence in the case bearing on the issue. But did the instruction do this? I think it did not.

It is true that under the instruction the jury were left free to consider any other evidence there may have been in the case of other action of the Realty Company or its agent, Denton, tending to cause or bring about the sale to Dick, besides that set forth in the instruction. But that is immaterial, as there was in fact no such other action, and no evidence was introduced by the Realty Company tending to show any such further action, and it was not claimed in the court below, nor is it claimed before us by the Realty Company, that there was any such further action. There was no such issue made in the case. The instruction was therefore, as I think, misleading for the very reason that it did instruct the jury, in substance, that they were free to consider such other evidence. It erroneously diverted the attention of the jury to an issue not in the case, and as to which there was no evidence before them. This was in itself error.

The issue in the case was whether what the Realty Company did prior to the occasion when Denton took the parties to the farm, and on that occasion, "directly brought the [Burcum] property * * * to [the] attention" of Dick.

The instruction in question in effect stated to the jury that they could not, upon that issue, consider any other evidence than that set forth and alluded to in the instruction, and in so doing the instruction excluded from the consideration of the jury the following evidence for the Realty Company, viz.:

1. The evidence in the case tending to show that it was a fact, and that Dick at least realized it to be a fact, that prior to the time the sale from Burcum directly to the latter was negotiated the Realty Company had directly brought the Burcum property to the attention of Dick, and that Dick then knew (and, if he told Burcum the truth at the time of the negotiation of the sale, that Burcum also then knew) that the Realty Company was entitled, under the contract of Burcum with it, to the commissions in question in this case.

There is of such evidence the following in the record, viz.:

(a) The testimony of Keller—

"that he was absolutely certain that Mr. and Mrs. Dick heard what Mr. Denton said to them." Record, p. 31.

(b) The direct testimony of Denton to the effect that his action, which is set forth in the instruction, in fact called the attention of Dick and wife to the Burcum place. Record p. 22.

(c) The further testimony of Denton as follows:

"The next morning * * * Mr. Dick came by to see him and said he was going to Nottoway to look at a farm containing about 120 acres; that witness told him 'that must be the Burcum place with the hedge around it,' and Mr. Dick agreed it must be." Record, p. 22.

(d) The testimony of Denton that when Dick's attention was called to the hedge the evening before—

"Mr. Dick stated that if he owned the place he would cut the hedge down from around it." Record, p. 22.

(e) The letter of Mr. and Mrs. Dick, of date October 16, 1917, to Denton, in which they say that before leaving Virginia "we did not see what we wanted." Record, p. 28.

(f) The other testimony of defendant Burcum, introduced in the attempt to show that the sale to Dick was not made until February, 1918; whereas it appears from the admissions of both Mr. and Mrs. Dick, witnesses for the defendant, made on cross-examination, that the sale was in truth practically agreed upon at the time of the negotiation aforesaid, on their visit to the Burcum farm, when taken there by the son-in-law of Burcum, which was prior to October 16, 1917.

(g) The admission of Dick, on cross-examination, that on the day last named—

"Mr. Burcum told him that the farm was listed at $10,000, but that he (Burcum) had saved the witness $1,000; that Burcum asked him if Denton had not shown him properties in the county, and he told him he had, and that Burcum told him to keep it from Denton; that it would cost him $1,000 if Denton found it out, and not to let Denton know anything about it; that he did keep it away from Mr. Denton, and tried not to let him know anything about it, but that Denton found it out anyway." Record, p. 35.

(h) The admission of Mrs. Dick, on cross-examination—

"that when they were talking to Mr. Burcum about buying the property, he told them it was listed with real estate agents for $10,000; that if they bought direct from him it would save them $1,000, and told Mr. Dick not to let Mr. Denton know anything about their transaction; that if he did it would cost $1,000."

(i) The statement of Burcum in his testimony in his own behalf, on examination in chief, that—

"he did not recollect telling Mr. and Mrs. Dick not to tell Mr. Denton about his negotiations with them * * * Mr. Dick * * * entered into no negotiations while here" (in 1917); "that they had not sold their farm in Ohio; in February Mr. Dick came back; * * * that he wanted an abstract, etc.; that everything was closed up on the 19th of February"; that on cross-examination this witness "denied telling Mr. and Mrs. Dick to keep the matter secret from Mr. Denton."

(j) Other conflicts between the testimony of Denton and that of Dick and Burcum. Record, pp. 24, 34, 35, 36.

The evidence thus excluded from the consideration of the jury raised the question of veracity, certainly between Denton, witness for plaintiff, and Mr. and Mrs. Dick witnesses for the defendant, Burcum, if not between Denton and Burcum also, and raises such question upon the very issue in the case aforesaid. In the light of such evidence, the decision upon such issue depended upon the credibility to be given to the testimony of Mr. and Mrs. Dick and of Burcum. Thus was presented a question which was for the jury, and not for the court, and a vitally material question. The court by the instruction under consideration took that question wholly away from the jury and itself decided it. This was a further error, and, as I think, plainly reversible error.

FORD v. STREET et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 17, 1921.)

1. Specific performance \Leftrightarrow 30—Contract held not unenforceable for uncertainty as to amount payable.

Where building on land was destroyed by fire after option to sell land for $10,000 had been given, a contract entered into between the parties after they thought they had ascertained that insurance to the amount of $8,000 was due, providing for sale of the land for the sum of $10,000, payable "$100 cash, * * * $8,000 payable by and when the insurance is collected for the fire which destroyed the residence, * * * the remainder of the $10,000 not paid by the insurance company," on delivery of deed on specified date, held specifically enforceable as against the objection of uncertainty as to the amount payable, though there was $9,000 instead of $8,000 of insurance due, the contract not requiring purchaser to pay merely the difference between $10,000 and the amount of insurance paid, regardless of the amount thereof, but to pay approximately $2,000 for the vacant lot which was the subject of the contract.

2. Dower §10—No right of dower in proceeds of insurance policy on buildings on husband's land.

Wife has no contingent right of dower in the proceeds of insurance policy on buildings on husband's land.

3. Insurance §2—"Fire insurance policy" defined.

A "fire insurance policy" is a contract of indemnity whereby the assurer indemnifies the assured against certain loss on account of his interest in the property if destroyed by fire.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Fire Insurance.]

4. Specific performance §10(2)—When husband's contract to sell land without joinder of wife will be specifically enforced.

Husband's contract to sell his land will be specifically enforced, notwithstanding failure of wife to join therein, where purchaser is willing to accept deed without the wife's relinquishment of her contingent right of dower, and asks no abatement in the purchase price.

5. Vendor and purchaser §153—Agreement to deliver "good and sufficient deed of conveyance" requires execution of general warranty deed.

Contract requiring vendor to execute and deliver a "good and sufficient deed of conveyance" held to require execution of a general warranty deed.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Good and Sufficient Deed.]

6. Vendor and purchaser §153—Vendor considered as contracting for general warranty deed, unless contrary is shown.

On agreement for sale of land the vendor must be considered as contracting for a general warranty deed, unless the contrary is clearly shown.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Nottoway County.

Suit by J. A. Street against Culvin Ford and others. Decree for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals. Affirmed as amended.

W. Moncure Gravatt and L. S. Epes, both of Blackstone, for appellant.

H. H. Watson, of Creive, and T. F. Epes, of Blackstone, for appellees.

PRENTIS, J. This is an appeal from a decree requiring the appellant specifically to perform a contract for the sale of real estate. The pertinent facts are these: On September 6, 1919, the appellant gave an option in writing to J. A. Street, the appellee, which reads thus:

"Agreement made this 6th day of September, 1919, by C. Ford, of the town of Burkeville, party of the first part, and J. A. Street, of the town of Burkeville, party of the second part.

"Witness: That the said party of the first part has agreed to sell the said party of the second part, J. A. Street, his tract of land in the town of Burkeville, containing about seven acres, more or less, at the corner of Namozine avenue and Harris Spring road, for the sum of $10,000, terms to be arranged on or before the 17th day of September. In consideration of $1 as an option, cash in hand, paid to the party of the first part, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, said C. Ford agrees to deliver the said premises to the said Street on or before the 17th day of September, 1919."

Eight days later, September 14th, the dwelling house and its contents were totally destroyed by fire. The appellee had not exercised his right to close the option at that time, and on September 16th the vendor wrote at the bottom of this agreement: "This option is extended for 60 days." On the same date the parties concluded an agreement for the sale of the property, then consisting of a vacant lot upon which the improvements had been destroyed, and this agreement reads thus:

"This agreement made this 16th day of September, 1919, by C. Ford, of Burkeville, Va., party of the first part, and J. A. Street, of Burkeville, Va., party of the second part.

"Witnesseth: That the said party of the first part agrees to sell and the said J. A. Street agrees to buy, a certain tract of land lying and being in the town of Burkeville at the corner of Namozine avenue and Harris Spring road, containing seven acres, more or less, for the sum of $10,000, payable as follows:

"$100 cash in hand paid to the said party of the first part by the said J. A. Street, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and the sum of $8,000 payable by and when the insurance is collected for the fire which destroyed the residence on the 14th day of September, 1919, and on the 1st day of October, 1919, upon the delivery of a good and sufficient deed of conveyance and abstract of title to the said property, said Street agrees to pay the remainder of the $10,000 not paid by the insurance company, making the total sum of $10,000 to the said party of the first part when the property is fully paid for."

Before this contract of sale was executed, each of the parties had separately inquired of the insurance agent with whom the policies of insurance had been placed as to the precise amount of the insurance upon the buildings, and each was explicitly informed that it was $8,000. The appellant testified that he had directed $8,000 to be written upon the buildings and $4,000 upon the furniture. Shortly afterwards it was discovered that instead of the $12,000 insurance being thus apportioned there was $9,000 upon the buildings and $3,000 upon the furniture. It also developed that the wife of the vendor refused to unite in the deed which her husband had contracted to execute to the vendee, and thereupon the vendor repudiated the contract.

[1] The vendee filed his bill, agreeing to accept a deed for the property without the wife's signature and without demanding any abatement of the purchase price. It is claimed for the vendor that he is not bound to perform the contract of sale because of its uncertainty. We think, however, that a careful consideration of the pertinent facts shows that the only uncertainty which exists is the mistake or uncertainty as to the amount of insurance. We find no such uncertainty in the terms and conditions of the sale. When the contract was entered into, the buildings had been destroyed. The vendee was not undertaking to buy an assignment of the insurance policies. The contract related to the vacant lot, and, as we construe the testimony, it is sufficiently clear and definite to justify the decree of the trial court requiring the vendor to convey the property.

In order properly to construe every agreement, it is the duty of the court, as nearly as may be, to place itself in the position of the parties, and from this point of view no fair doubt arises out of the language used in this contract. Each of the parties clearly understood that of the $10,000 which the vendor was to receive thereunder, $8,000 was to come from the proceeds of the insurance policies and $2,000 was to be paid by the vendee.

One clause of the contract appears to us conclusive on this point. After acknowledging the payment of $100 in cash it recites that the sum of $8,000 is "payable by and when the insurance is collected for the fire which destroyed the residence on the 14th day of September, 1919."

The clause which is relied on for the contrary view immediately follows, and reads thus:

"And on the 1st day of October, 1919, upon the delivery of a good and sufficient deed of conveyance and abstract of title to the said property, said Street agrees to pay the remainder of the $10,000 not paid by the insurance company, making the total sum of $10,000, to the said party of the first part when the property is fully paid for."

This clause, if the attendant circumstances and the context are both disregarded, supports the contention that the purchaser was to receive the benefit of the entire amount of the fire insurance policies, and only to pay such part of the $10,000 as might not be thus provided for. It must be remembered, however, that the parties were not entering into a contract of hazard; that before agreeing upon the terms of sale they both inquired as to the precise amount of insurance upon the buildings and both entered into the agreement with the distinct mutual understanding that $8,000 was the amount of the purchase price which was to be paid out of the proceeds of the insurance policies.

There is little profit in considering what construction might have been put upon the contract if some other than the true state of affairs had developed, and yet it may assist us in construing the language used to consider what would have been the rights of the parties if the whole insurance of $12,000 had been placed upon the buildings and collected. Would it then be held that any court of equity would release the vendee from the payment of any part of the agreed purchase price for the vacant lot, and thus to make him a present of it? Or, taking another view, suppose it had developed that there was only $1,000 of collectable insurance upon the improvements. Would any court have required the vendee to pay $9,000 for the vacant lot, for which, by clear understanding with the vendor at the time the contract was signed, he was to pay $2,000?

In our view there can be but one answer to the questions presented by this record, and that is that the contract is clear, definite, and certain to the effect that the vendee was to pay approximately $2,000 for the vacant lot which was the subject of the contract, which, of course, justifies its specific enforcement.

It follows from what we have said that we think the court erred in decreeing that the vendee was entitled to credit for $9,000 upon the purchase price because there happened to be $9,000 of insurance upon the improvements. As he would not have been made to assume the loss if the property had been entirely uninsured, so he cannot be allowed to profit by the mutual mistake of the parties as to the true amount of insurance. At the time the sale was made the entire proceeds of these insurance policies, subject to the liens upon the property, belonged to the vendor, and he should not be held to have assigned $1,000 to the vendee when he had no intention of so doing, and the vendee had no idea that he was to receive such a gratuity.

[2, 3] It is suggested by the vendor that an uncertainty grows out of the fact that the wife of the vendee has a contingent right of dower in the proceeds of the insurance policy on the buildings which were burned. We hardly think this suggestion needs any extended treatment. A fire insurance policy is a contract of indemnity, whereby the assurer indemnifies the assured against certain loss on account of his interest in the property if destroyed by fire. When the loss accrues there arises under the contract a debt due by the assurer to the assured, and we know of no principle of law or reason for holding that the wife of the creditor has any interest in such a debt. Not being a party to the contract, she has no more claim thereto or interest therein than she has in any other debt due to her husband.

[4] It is claimed that the contract cannot be enforced against the husband leaving the wife's inchoate and contingent right of dower in the real estate unaffected. This question must be regarded as settled in Virginia, for it is expressly held in Steadman v. Handy, 102 Va. 383, 46 S. E. 380, that where the vendee is willing to accept such a deed without the wife's relinquishment of her contingent right of dower, and asks no abatement in the purchase price, the vendee is entitled to have the contract specifically enforced. The subject is also thoroughly discussed in the case of Haden v. Falls, 115 Va. 779, 80 S. E. 576, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1084, where the converse of the proposition is held—that, in the absence of any allegation of fraud, a court of equity will not, at the instance of the vendee, decree specific performance of a husband's contract to sell his land, in which his wife has a contingent right of dower which she refuses to release, where the purchaser demands an abatement of the purchase price, or an indemnity by reason of such refusal. It must be regarded as settled in Virginia that where, as in the case in judgment, the vendee is willing to pay the agreed price and to accept the deed without the wife's signature, the husband may be compelled to perform his contract and to convey what he has agreed to convey.

It is urged, however, that this case comes within the doctrine of Clinchfield Coal Co. v. Sutherland, 114 Va. 20, 75 S. E. 765, in which it was held that the wife could not be compelled by the court, when not a party to the contract, to convey her contingent right of dower; and it is claimed that to require the appellant in this case to convey the property operates as an indirect coercion upon the wife, and that the court should not indirectly do what it cannot directly do. But that case has little value here, because there is neither direct nor indirect attempt to coerce the wife. Her rights at the end of this litigation will be unimpaired and unaffected thereby. The mere fact that an obligation rests upon her husband because of his warranty can no more be said to coerce her than the existence of any of his other debts or pecuniary obligations may thus affect her. She has no present vested interest in his personal property, and can have none after his death, except in that portion of it which remains after the payment of his just debts.

[5, 6] It is also urged that the court erred in requiring the vendor to convey the property with general warranty. It is only necessary to say as to this that the cases of Rucker v. Lowther, 6 Leigh (33 Va.) 269, and Goddin v. Vaughn, 14 Grat. (55 Va.) 117, must be regarded as a conclusive refutation of this contention; for the accepted rule is that upon an agreement for the sale of land the vendor must be considered as contracting for a general warranty deed, unless the contrary is clearly shown. In this case the contract requires the vendor to execute and deliver a good and sufficient deed of conveyance, and the trial court did not err in construing this to require the vendor to convey by deed with general warranty.

Our conclusion, then, is to amend the decree appealed from by requiring the vendee,

J. A. Street, to pay $2,000 instead of $1,000, as purchase money for the property to be conveyed, and only upon such payment or deposit to the credit of this cause in the circuit court of Nottoway county will he be entitled to have the decree complained of enforced. As thus amended the decree will be affirmed.

Amended and affirmed.

SURRY LUMBER CO. v. WELLONS et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 17, 1921.)

1. Equity §51(1)—Possible future litigation not ground for jurisdiction to construe deed.

A grantee under a timber deed cannot confer jurisdiction in equity to construe the deed by allegations as to future litigation, which may flow from complainant's exercise of his rights thereunder.

2. Equity §17—Equity will not construe a deed merely to determine legal rights of parties.

A court of equity will not undertake to construe a will merely for the purpose of determining the legal rights of the parties.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Southampton County.

Suit by the Surry Lumber Company against J. F. Wellons and others. From a decree of dismissal on demurrer, complainant appeals. Affirmed.

Williams & Tunstall and J. N. Sebrell, Jr., all of Norfolk, for appellant.

Lewis & Harris and J. G. Martin, of Norfolk, for appellees.

KELLEY, P. This is an appeal from a decree dismissing on demurrer a bill in equity brought by the Surry Lumber Company v. J. F. Wellons and others.

The bill alleges that on the 5th day of April, 1902, the appellant purchased from the appellees certain timber and timber rights as set forth in a deed of that date filed with and made a part of the bill. The deed contained the following clause:

"And it is further covenanted and agreed by and between the parties hereto that the said Surry Lumber Company shall have five years in which to cut and remove said timber, from the time they commence to manufacture said timber into wood or lumber, but that they shall not be limited as to the time in which they shall commence to cut or remove the same."

After referring to and exhibiting the deed, the bill proceeds with the following allegations, and no others, to wit:

"Your orator since the execution and delivery of said deed has been in possession of the said timber thereby conveyed, and is now in possession of the same; that about six months ago your orator commenced to prepare to cut and remove said timber, as it had a right to do under the terms of said deed, and thereupon your orator was notified and warned by the said defendants not to cut or remove said timber, as said defendants claimed the right to the said timber under the provisions and limitations contained in the deed aforesaid, and objected to your orator's going upon the fee which they own, and not only objected to the cutting of the said timber by your orator, but are intending to cut the timber themselves, and thereby destroy the entire estate of your orator therein, and threatening that if your orator cut or remove said timber they would sue your orator for the trespass.

"Your orator is now ready and anxious to cut and remove said timber, but it cannot do so peaceably on account of the attitude of said defendants.

"That the said defendants' claim of the right to cut and remove said timber under the terms of said deed as construed by them is a cloud upon the title of your orator to said timber, and that your orator is entitled to have the same removed and quieted in order that it may enjoy its right to said real estate, and to have the said defendants enjoined from cutting the said timber and from interfering with your orator in the exercise of its rights."

As appears inferentially from the foregoing allegations, and as actually disclosed by the brief and arguments of counsel, the sole question which the complainant seeks to have determined is as to the meaning of the clause in the deed above quoted. The difference between the parties is stated thus in the appellant's petition and brief:

"The contention on the part of your petitioner is that human language could not be more explicit, and that the deed means what it says, namely, that your petitioner should not be limited as to the time in which it should commence to cut or remove the timber. The defendants claim that the deed does not mean this, and that it means something else, namely, that the timber must be cut within such time as some person, either court or jury, shall determine."

The prayer of the bill is that—

The court "will enter a decree deciding and adjudging that your orator has the right to cut and remove the said timber, and that the said defendants and neither of them have any right, title, or interest in the said timber, and that they be enjoined and restrained from cutting or removing any of said timber or claiming any rights therein, or in any wise interfering with your orator in its rights to cut and remove the same, and for such other, further, and general relief as to the court may seem meet."

The defendants demurred on the ground that—

"The bill does not show any jurisdiction in equity; it merely shows that defendants have threatened to sue plaintiff if plaintiff cuts the timber; it does not show that defendants will make any forcible resistance."

The court sustained the demurrer, and dismissed the bill.

[1] It is obvious that this is merely a suit for the construction of a deed under which the complainant itself claims title. The allegations as to future litigation which may flow from an exercise of appellant's rights under the deed as construed by it are not sufficient to bring the controversy within any of the recognized grounds of jurisdiction in equity. No authority whatever is cited in support of the jurisdiction. The bill does not charge that there will be any physical or forcible resistance to the cutting and removal of timber if undertaken by appellant, but merely that the appellees threaten in that event to sue for trespass. Nor is there any allegation that the appellees have in any way invaded the appellant's alleged possession of the timber, but merely a general charge that the appellees intend to cut the timber themselves, and thus destroy the estate as a whole. Under these naked facts a court of equity will not undertake to give relief.

[2] The argument principally relied upon for a reversal of the decree is that the construction placed upon the deed by the appellees results in a cloud upon the appellant's title. We will not say that this argument is unworthy of consideration or without inherent strength, but it involves a novel proposition, and one which cannot be maintained unless we are to extend the jurisdiction of equity for the removal of clouds from title to a class of cases which it has not heretofore been held to embrace. A court of equity will not undertake to construe even a will merely for the purpose of determining the legal rights of the parties. Hart v. Darter, 107 Va. 310, 58 S. E. 590, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 599, 13 Ann. Cas. 1. If the relief prayed for in this case can properly be allowed, then it would seem to follow that whenever a muniment of title is of doubtful interpretation the parties claiming, not against it but directly under it, would be entitled to have possible future controversies under it adjudicated and settled by appealing to equity for advice and guidance. Whether such extension of jurisdiction would be wise is a debated and debatable question; but whether wise or not, the courts would hardly undertake to make the extension without statutory aid.

The case, as it seems to us, is completely controlled by the decision of this court in Sulphur Mines Co. v. Boswell, 94 Va. 481, 27 S. E. 24, wherein it was held, in a forceful opinion by Judge Riely, that the jurisdiction to remove clouds from title is founded upon the necessity for cancellation or removal of some instrument or proceeding in writing constituting a cloud, and that in the exercise of that jurisdiction a court of equity will not construe a deed under which the complainant claims, merely to forestall future litigation.

The decree appealed from dismissed the bill in general terms, and it is contended that, even if the decree was otherwise proper, it should have stated that the dismissal was without prejudice to any future action which the plaintiff might be advised to take. Inasmuch as the record shows upon its face that the sole ground of the demurrer was the want of jurisdiction in equity, the legal effect of the decree would doubtless be the same as if the qualification suggested had been inserted therein; but the order of this court will contain an amendment in that respect, and as thus amended the decree will be affirmed, with costs to the appellee as the party substantially prevailing.

Affirmed.

SUSSEX COUNTY v. JARRATT et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 17, 1921.)

1. Taxation ⚡498—Equity may restrain unauthorized assessment for preceding years.

Equity had jurisdiction to restrain county from assessing taxes for preceding years after expiration of period during which levy thereon could be made had expired, notwithstanding Code 1919, § 2389, giving taxpayer the right to apply to the circuit court for relief where aggrieved by assessment, since the remedy under such statute exists only if an assessment has been made.

2. Taxation ⚡418—Bank stock held not assessed where assessment did not specify stockholders.

Assessment specifying name and place of bank, amount assessed, amount levied, and total levy for county and district, without specifying the names of the stockholders, the number of shares of stock held by each stockholder, the value of such stock, and the amount of taxes due, as required by Code 1904, § 1040a, for assessment of bank stock, held not an assessment of such stock but the assessment of the bank's capital stock.

3. Taxation ⚡128—Shares of stock taxable though capital is invested in nontaxable securities.

The shares of stock of a bank are distinct and different from its capital and may be taxed though the capital itself be invested in nontaxable securities.

4. Taxation ⚡319(1)—Assessments must be made in manner prescribed by law.

Officers must make their assessments in the manner prescribed by law.

5. Taxation ⚡301(1)—Assessment must rest upon proper levy.

Every assessment must rest upon a proper levy of a tax, and if there is no levy there can be no assessment.

6. Taxation ⚡295, 309—Difference between "levy" and "assessment" stated.

The "levy" of taxes is a legislative function and declares the subject and rate of taxation, while "assessment" is quasi judicial and consists in making a list of the taxpayer's property and fixing its valuation for appraisal.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Assessment; Levy.]

7. Taxation ⚡406—Assessment for omitted years unauthorized where there was no levy during such years.

Commissioner of revenue could not assess shares of bank stock for taxes for previous years under Code 1904, § 508, where there had been no levy on such shares of stock during such previous years.

8. Taxation ⚡300—Levy of tax against "real and personal property" held not a levy against shares of bank stock.

Board of supervisors' order that a tax be levied against "real, personal property of the county" held not a levy on shares of bank stock under Code 1904, § 1040a, providing for taxation of bank stock.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Personal Property; Real Property.]

9. Statutes ⚡245—Statute construed in favor of taxpayer against government.

Statutes imposing taxes are to be construed most strongly against the government and in favor of the citizen, and are not to be extended by implication beyond the clear import of the language used.

10. Taxation ⚡498—Court not empowered to make levy omitted in previous years.

The court has no power to make a levy for taxes omitted in previous years, since neither the commissioner of revenue, nor the board of supervisors, having failed to order levy, had power to make levy for such back taxes.

11. Taxation ⚡301(3)—Board of supervisors not empowered to make levy omitted during previous years.

Board of supervisors, having failed to order a levy on bank stock for certain years, had no authority to order a levy for taxes for such years in succeeding years.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Sussex County.

Consolidated suits by B. F. Jarratt and by S. B. Grant against the County of Sussex. Decree for complainants, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thos. H. Howerton, of Waverly, and Buford & Peterson, of Lawrenceville, for appellant.

Geo. Bryan, of Richmond, and Wm. B. Cocke, of Stony Creek, for appellees.

SAUNDERS, J. These are two suits in equity, brought, respectively, by S. B. Grant, for himself and other stockholders similarly situated, and B. F. Jarratt, suing in like fashion, against the county of Sussex. The complainant Grant is the owner of one share of the capital stock of the Bank of Waverly.

and the complainant Jarratt, of 33 shares of the capital stock of the Bank of Stony Creek, both banks situate in the county of Sussex. The object of these suits was to enjoin the treasurer of said county from levying certain taxes alleged to be due by the said complainants to the said county for the years 1912, 1913, and 1914. This alleged claim of the county arose in the following fashion:

The board of supervisors of the county of Sussex did not make a levy for the years 1912, 1913, and 1914 on the shares of the stock of banks in that county. Some years later the board essayed to collect these taxes. Its first order to this end was made on December 20, 1917, and is as follows:

"Walter Harrison, commissioner of revenue for district No. 1, is directed to assess back taxes on bank stock in district No. 1 for the years 1912, 1913 and 1914, and report at next meeting of this board."

The second order was made at a meeting of the board on January 7, 1918:

"Ordered that G. O. Wrenn, commissioner of the revenue for district No. 2, be and he is hereby instructed to make a levy, assessing the banks in district No. 2 with levy for the county and district purposes for the years 1912, 1913, and 1914, in accordance with an order heretofore entered in this matter, and the clerk is instructed hereby to certify a copy of same to said G. O. Wrenn, commissioner of the revenue."

This order is not very clear, inasmuch as it directs the commissioner in district No. 2

In January, 1918, the commissioner of the revenue for district No. 1 made an assessment for the years referred to in the order of December 20, 1917. This assessment, as will be noted from a copy of the same, was upon the banks in the commissioner's district, and on the aggregate amount of their capital. It contained neither the names of the stockholders of the banks, nor the number of shares held by them respectively. This assessment is as follows:

BANK STOCK OF THE BANKS OF STONY CREEK AND JARRATT.

Name of Person	Residence	Aggregate Amt. Assessed	Total Amt. Levied	Total Levy for County and District
Bank of Stony Creek	Stony Creek Va.
Creek	Va.
1912	"	18,020.00	1.30	216.24
1913	"	18,300.00	1.15	210.45
1914	"	20,900.00	1.30	271.90

The assessment of the Bank of Jarratt is to the like effect as the above, and need not be given.

About this same time the commissioner of the revenue for district No. 2 reported under the order of January 17, 1918. He testifies that he was instructed by the board to assess the bank stocks in his district for county and district purposes for the years 1912, 1913, and 1914. He filed his record book showing his official action under this instruction. All the banks in his district were assessed in the same fashion, so that an extract as to one bank only will be sufficient in this connection.

to "make a levy assessing the banks in his district with the levy for the county and district purposes, for the years 1912, 1913, and 1914 in accordance with an order heretofore entered in this matter." The order theretofore entered was an order directing Walter Harrison to assess back taxes on bank stock in his district (No. 1). Of course, strictly speaking, the board could not direct a commissioner to make a levy, nor could the commissioner in district No. 2 make a levy assessing the banks in his district in accordance with an order directing the commissioner in another district to assess back taxes on bank stock in that district. However, petitioner in error construes the second order to constitute a direction to the commissioner in the second district to assess the "bank stock" in his district for the years 1912, 1913, and 1914, and this construction will be adopted for the purposes of a decision of this controversy.

Commissioner Wrenn testifies that his record is entitled, "Assessment of Bank Stocks for County, District and Road Levies, for the Year 1917," and under the title, "Name of Person," are listed for the years 1912, 1913, and 1914 the Bank of Waverly, Waverly, Va., the Bank of Sussex and Surry, Wakefield, Va., and the Farmers' Bank of Wakefield, Wakefield, Va. Further that this was the only assessment made for the years 1912, 1913, and 1914 for county and district purposes. The assessments as made supra for the years 1912, 1913, and 1914 were furnished to the treasurer of Sussex in December, 1917, and January, 1918. No other assessments for these years were furnished him until some time in December, 1918, when Commissioner Wrenn furnished him with an itemized list of the stockholders of the banks in his district.

Upon receipt of these alleged assessments, the treasurer applied to the banks for payment of the taxes, and posted one notice. The banks asked for a little time for consideration. This was given. At its expiration, on advice of counsel, they refused to pay said taxes. The treasurer prepared to collect said taxes. Thereupon, in September, 1918, B. F. Jarratt, for himself and other stockholders of the Bank of Stony Creek, and S. B. Grant, for himself and other stockholders of the Bank of Waverly, filed their respective bills in equity against the county of Sussex for the purposes stated, supra.

These causes, by consent of counsel, were consolidated. Demurrers and answers were respectively filed, and depositions taken.

On the hearing, the court overruled the demurrers, entertained the bills, and enjoined the treasurer of Sussex county from taking any steps to collect the taxes alleged to be due to Sussex county upon complainants' shares of stock in their respective banks, for the years 1912, 1913, and 1914. An appeal from this decree was allowed by one of the judges of this court.

By a stipulation of counsel, it was agreed that the cases, supra, should be considered as test cases, in the matter of the several liabilities of the several banks of Sussex county and their respective stockholders, for county taxes alleged to be due to the county of Sussex for the years 1912, 1913, and 1914.

The same parties who are complainants above endeavored to secure, by motion, the same relief sought in their bills in equity. These motions were dismissed in the circuit court of Sussex county, and writs of error were secured to the rulings of the court by the county of Sussex.

The same stipulations were made between counsel in respect of these motions as were made in regard to the bills in equity. Should the proceedings in equity be sustained, there will be no occasion to make further reference to these motions.

Appellant, the county of Sussex, assigns the following errors in the consolidated proceedings in equity:

First. The court, sitting as a court of equity, was without jurisdiction, and erred in refusing to dismiss the bills, and require the plaintiffs to proceed by motion under section 571 of the Code 1887.

Second. The court, on the merits, erred in affording the relief prayed by the plaintiffs, instead of requiring them to pay the levies with which they were properly chargeable, and, to that end, exercising its power to correct defects and irregularities, if any, in the assessments.

The act of February 24, 1916, provides that—

"No suit for the purpose of restraining the collection or assessment of any tax, state or local, shall be maintained in any court of this commonwealth, except when the party has no adequate remedy at law." Laws 1916, c. 64.

A person assessed with county levies, and aggrieved by such assessment, can apply for relief to the circuit court of the county wherein such assessment was made, under section 2389, Code 1919 (sec. 571, Code 1887); but by the very terms of this section the remedy is afforded only to parties who have been assessed and who are aggrieved thereby. An assessment is a sine qua non of relief under this section.

[1] Appellant urges that the trial court was without jurisdiction in equity in the case in judgment, and cites Commonwealth v. Tredegar Co., 122 Va. 506, 95 S. E. 279, and Barrow v. Prince Edward Co., 121 Va. 1, 92 S. E. 910. In both of these cases the court held that the remedy at law was full and complete—in a word, adequate to afford the relief sought in equity. Hence the jurisdiction of equity was excluded by the very terms of the statute. It may be conceded that if there was an assessment of taxes against the complainants in the case under consideration, however erroneous such assessment may have been, the authorities, supra, would be in point, and the decree of the circuit court must be reversed. But the circuit court held, upon the facts, that there had been no such assessment, and that the remedy by motion did not apply. The following is taken from the opinion of the circuit court:

"The court is also of the opinion that the complainants' remedy is in equity, and not under the statute for the correction of erroneous assessments. To give jurisdiction under the statute, there must be an assessment, and a person aggrieved by such assessment (sections 567 and 571). In Main Street Bank v. City of Richmond, 122 Va. 574, 95 S. E. 386, decided March 21, 1918, the court says:

"It is unnecessary for us to consider in this case, whether or not the error on the part of the officials of the bank can be corrected upon the motion of any stockholder who may be entitled to relief; it is clear that it cannot be corrected upon the motion of the bank, under sections 567 and 571, for its property has not been assessed and its funds are in no way involved."

See, also, Commonwealth v. Carter's Ex'rs, 126 Va. 469, 102 S. E. 58, Withers v. Jones, 126 Va. 524, 102 S. E. 68, in which the court held that as the appellants were without remedy at law, the statute had no application to the cause before them. It is very evident from the citations made that we must determine primarily whether the complainants, supra, were aggrieved by an assessment of their property. Once this determination is made, a conclusion on the question of jurisdiction will be easily derived.

The statutes prescribe how bank stocks shall be taxed for state and county purposes. The law applicable to taxation of bank stock for the years 1912, 1913, and 1914, so far as the state tax was concerned, was contained in Acts 1912, p. 19. This law provided that no tax should be assessed upon the capital of any bank, but that the stockholders in such bank should be assessed and taxed on their shares of stock therein. The banks are required to report lists of all the shares of stock, and of their stockholders, and the actual value of the shares of stock held by each stockholder.

The commissioner of the revenue, upon the receipt of these reports, is required to assess each stockholder upon the value of the shares of stock owned by him as reported, less certain deductions. Three assessment lists are to be made out, one for the bank, one for the auditor, and the other for the commissioner.

The law applicable to the taxation of bank stocks for county purposes during the years 1912, 1913, and 1914 was section 1040a of the Code of 1904, as follows:

"(1) Hereafter each county or city in which any bank, either national or state, is so located may, subject to the conditions mentioned below, tax all the shares of stock issued by any such bank so located within its limits at the same rate as is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individuals residing in such county or city.

"(2) That in so taxing said shares the said county or city authorities, respectively, shall follow the mode of assessment and manner of collection prescribed by statute for the collection of state taxes upon said shares." Acts 1889-90, p. 111; Acts 1902-03-04, p. 412.

This statute very explicitly provides that in respect of taxing bank shares by a county, the proper authorities must follow the mode of assessment and manner of collection prescribed in respect of state taxes upon such shares.

[2] Looking to the reports of the commissioners, cited supra, it will be seen that these officers, in the alleged assessments of 1917 and 1918, did not comply in a single respect with the requirements of the statute prescribing the mode in which bank stock shall be assessed for county purposes: The names of the stockholders, the number of shares of stock held by each, and the value of the same, and the amount of taxes respectively due, are not afforded. The several banks are named as the parties assessed for the years 1912, 1913, and 1914, the property taxed in each case is the capital of the bank, and the total tax is the aggregate produced by the several rates on this capital. It appears, therefore, from the record, that whatever the commissioners may have had in mind, they actually assessed the capital stock of the banks. Of course, it is true that the aggregate of the stock held by the individual stockholders is the capital of a bank, but the shares are different from the capital, and an assessment of the capital is not an assessment of the shares in the names of the several stockholders.

[3] "The shares of stock of a bank are distinct and different from its capital and may be taxed though the capital itself be invested in nontaxable securities." Union Bank v. City of Richmond, 94 Va. 316, 28 S. E. 821.

[4] Officers must make their assessments in the manner prescribed by law. "The officers of the state, in the collection of revenue, are as much bound to observe the law and proceed in the mode pointed out by the statute as an individual is required to observe the law in the enforcement of any right." People v. Biggins, 96 Ill. 481.

Assessment being an indispensable element of jurisdiction in the statutory remedy, and assessment of the banks' capital not being an assessment of the shares of stock owned by the stockholders, the complainants in the case in judgment had no adequate remedy at law with which to meet the threatened attack upon their property. The statute excludes the jurisdiction of equity in those cases only in which the remedy at law is complete and effective. The trial court did not err in holding that the complainants' remedy was in equity.

Appellant contends that if the jurisdiction of equity is sustained, the court can proceed to make a proper assessment for the years in controversy—in a word, that the court can now do what the commissioners should have done when they assessed the capital of the banks for the omitted years. Conceding this contention to be sound, it becomes necessary to ascertain what the commissioners might have done under the orders of the board cited heretofore.

These orders conferred no authority upon the commissioners of the revenue to make nunc pro tunc assessments for the omitted years. That authority, however, is afforded by section 508 of the Code.

"Under section 508 of the Code [of 1904], it is the duty of the commissioner of the revenue to assess for taxation any property which he finds has not been assessed for taxation for any previous years within the limits prescribed by that section." Commonwealth v. Tredegar Co., supra.

[5-7] Hence it was the duty of the Commissioners, apart from the suggestions of the board, to assess for taxation within the prescribed limits any property which upon ascertainment appeared to have been omitted. But "the subsequent assessment must be made in the manner and within the time prescribed by law." Commonwealth v. United Cigarette Machine Co., 120 Va. 835, 92 S. E. 901. Every assessment rests upon a proper levy of a tax. In fact, it may be said, no levy, no assessment. "Levy and assessment have very different meanings. The levy of taxes is a legislative function, and declares the subject and rate of taxation." Hilliard on Taxation, p. 290. "Assessment is quasi judicial, and consists in making a list of the taxpayer's property, and fixing its valuation, or appraisalment." Id., 291.

"The first step in taxation, whether by the state or inferior political subdivisions of the state, is the levy by the proper legislative body. Until this is done, there can be no assessment, or collection." 27 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) p. 730.

"It is elementary that property, however taxable, that is, however liable to taxation, cannot be assessed and subjected to consequent taxes unless the authority which had the right to speak has been heard thus to command. In other words, property in itself taxable cannot be assessed and be made to contribute, by taxation, to government expenses, where the proper authority has not directed its assessment."

"Since it is a settled principle that, however clear the power may be, or even the duty, of the legislative body to levy a tax on any particular species of property, until that power has been exerted the burden cannot be imposed and the legislative intent to impose a tax must be explicitly and distinctly shown. It cannot be extended by implication beyond the clear import of the language used. Hence, where there was no legislative enactment directing the assessment on a man's income, such income could not be assessed and payment of the tax enforced."

"The levy, that is, the governmental act which determines that a tax shall be laid, as distinguished from the levy on property incident to the enforcement of the collection of the tax, has been embodied in constitutional provisions in some of the states without the assistance of the Legislature; but, as a general rule, a levy can be made only by legislative enactment or authority, within the limits and in the form prescribed by the organic law, and by a duly authorized and properly constituted body. Thus, where a law required a county levy to be laid by a majority at least of the justices of the county, it was held that any less number, although they might constitute a court for a different purpose, had no jurisdiction in the case of a levy." Id.

It becomes, therefore, necessary to inquire whether, if the court should now undertake to make an assessment of the bank stock for the years, 1912, 1913, and 1914, upon the theory that the court can do what the commissioners should have done, that assessment would rest upon any levy of local taxes for such years.

It is contended by appellant that the word "may," in section 1040a, providing for taxation of bank stock by counties, means "must." If it means "must," the query would still recur: Did the supervisors of Sussex county, by appropriate orders, levy a tax on bank stock within said county during the said years?

The orders of the board of supervisors of Sussex county ordering levies for the several years 1912, 1913, and 1914 are the same. Hence we need cite only the orders for one year, the year 1912. These orders are as follows:

"At a meeting of the board of supervisors for the county of Sussex, held at the courthouse thereof, Thursday, May the 16, 1912:

"Ordered that a levy of forty cents on the one hundred dollars assessed value of the real and personal property of the county be laid for general county purposes.

"Ordered that a levy of twenty cents on the one hundred dollars assessed value of the real and personal property of the county be laid for the county free schools," etc.

"Ordered that a tax be levied on the capital invested, used or employed by the merchants in the conduct of their business in accordance with an act," etc.

[8] It is insisted, in substance, that as bank stocks are personal property the words "assessed value of the real and personal property of the county of Sussex," included bank stocks in the county, and were efficient to levy a tax on same without regard to the intent of the board at the time these words were used. With that contention we cannot agree. A board need not consciously have in mind every species of personal property when a levy is ordered, to affect it with the levy, but property that they specifically do not intend to tax will not be taxed merely because general words are used. Further, it is doubtful whether, standing alone, the words used would levy a tax on bank stock.

Section 1040a prescribes that—

"A county may tax all shares of stock issued by a bank," etc., "at the same rate as is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individuals residing in such county."

The language used in this section suggests that a county intending to tax bank stock should use language more specific than the general terms used by the board in the orders cited. Moneyed capital is a form of personal property, but it is taxed by a special order in the orders, supra, to wit:

"Ordered that a tax be levied on the capital invested, used, or employed by the merchants of the county," etc.

Moreover, the board that used the words "real and personal property of the county" did not construe them to include bank shares. No effort was made during the years 1912, 1913, and 1914 to have the bank stocks assessed under these orders. Further, the members of the board testify that they did not intend to tax bank shares during these years. The president of the board testifies that they designedly omitted this taxation lest, if laid, the banks would increase the rate of interest to borrowers in the county. Other members of the board do not agree with the president that they did not tax bank shares as a matter of county policy, but that they omitted to do so because they were not aware that they possessed the necessary power of taxation. All the witnesses agree that as a matter of fact bank stock was not taxed during the years in question. Further, when the board was apprised in 1915 that they possessed the right to tax bank shares for county purposes, they did not rely upon the general language cited above as sufficient to effect such taxation, but specifically included bank stock, grouping it with capital invested in mercantile business, as will appear from the following extract taken from the proceedings of the board at its meeting to lay the tax levy for the year 1915-16:

"Ordered that a levy of 55 cents on the one hundred dollars of all the property in the county of Sussex, both real and personal, subject to local taxation, including bank stock, and capital invested or employed in mercantile business, as provided," etc.

Like words were used in the levy of county taxes in the year 1916, and presumably from that time forward. Apart from the direct and positive testimony of the members of the board, the above change in the wording of their orders very clearly shows that the board did not regard the language used in 1912, 1913, and 1914 as levying a tax on bank stocks.

[8] Further, in view of the doubt whether the orders of the years supra impose a tax on these stocks, the persons sought to be charged with such a tax are entitled to the benefit of the principle announced in Commonwealth v. Hutzler, 124 Va. 138, 97 S. E. 775, as follows:

"It is well-settled and familiar law that statutes imposing taxes are to be construed most strongly against the government and in favor of the citizen, and are not to be extended by implication beyond the clear import of the language used. Wherever there is a just doubt, that doubt should absolve the taxpayer from his burden."

See, also, Commonwealth v. Herbert, 127 Va. —, 103 S. E. 645, where it is stated:

"It is a well-settled and a just and important rule in the construction of all tax laws, * * * that no tax shall be exacted from the citizens of the Commonwealth except in those cases which are clearly embraced within the taxing statute."

To the same effect, Brown v. Commonwealth, 98 Va. 366, 36 S. E. 485:

"Laws imposing a license or a tax are strictly construed, and whenever there is doubt as to the meaning or scope of such laws, they are construed more strongly against the government and in favor of the citizen."

See, also, Supervisors v. Tallant, 96 Va. 723, 32 S. E. 479.

[10] We are clearly of opinion that the board of supervisors of Sussex county did not order a levy on bank stocks in that county for the years 1912, 1913, and 1914. This being so, upon discovery that there was no assessment upon such stocks for these years, there was no authority in the commissioners to make an assessment for the same. Therefore there is no present authority in this court to make an assessment, since we can only do in this respect what the commissioners might have done.

[11] The contention, however, is made that the orders of the board of date December 20, 1917, and January 7, 1918, in some fashion constitute a levy on bank stock in the county of Sussex for the omitted years. On their face these orders are not levies, but even conceding that they were intended to have that effect, and in nunc pro tunc fashion to levy a tax on the shares of bank stock in said county for the years referred to, the lack of authority to make such orders is apparent.

We are not aware of any statute empowering a board of supervisors to lay a levy for taxes omitted in antecedent years.

"There can be no collection of taxes except in the manner provided by law; and back taxes can be levied only by special legislative authority." Commonwealth v. United Cigarette Machine Co., 120 Va. 842, 92 S. E. 901.

"When authority is not conferred by statute, county commissioners cannot levy taxes upon property for the years that have passed, in which such property has escaped them." Blackwell on Tax Titles (5th Ed.) § 298.

"The powers of a municipal corporation are to be construed strictly, and the power to tax must be plainly and unmistakably conferred. In the absence of legislative authority, the corporation has no power to levy back taxes, and when the charter empowers the council to order the collection of taxes for any year, this refers to taxes previously assessed, there being nothing in the charter authorizing a retrospective assessment.

"It is a settled principle that, in the absence of legislative authority, a municipal corporation has no power to levy back taxes. Such authority can exist only by statute."

2 Dill. Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) § 751.

"The powers and duties of boards of supervisors * * * are fixed by statute, and they have no other powers than those conferred expressly or by necessary implication." Supervisors v. Powell, 95 Va. 635, 29 S. E. 682.

Hence, even if the orders, supra, were intended to operate as levies on bank stock in the county of Sussex for the omitted years, they were invalid.

Our conclusions summarized are:

First. There was no levy on bank shares in the county of Sussex for county purposes, during the years 1912, 1913, and 1914.

Second. That as there was no levy made on such shares during the years when it was competent for the board to make a levy, the board lacked the authority to make this levy in succeeding years.

Third. That as there was no levy on these shares during the years in question, and no authority to make it in succeeding years, the commissioners in succeeding years could not assess said shares for taxation.

Fourth. That this court has no present authority to do what the board of supervisors and commissioners of the revenue for Sussex county cannot now do—that is, “levy taxes upon property for years that are passed in which such property escaped,” or assess such property for taxation when no levy has been made.

We find no error in the decree of the circuit court of Sussex county of date January 30, 1919, and that decree is affirmed.

Affirmed.

STANDARD ICE CO., Inc., v. LYNCHBURG DIAMOND ICE FACTORY.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 17, 1921.)

1. Sales \S 71(4)—Agreement to deliver “full capacity of the plant” held to have reference to daily capacity.

A contract for the sale and purchase of ice, requiring plaintiff to furnish “the full capacity of the plant” when desired by defendant, held to require plaintiff only to furnish full capacity daily, and not to contemplate weekly capacity, and defendant could not demand on any one day any more than the capacity of the plant on that day.

2. Contracts \S 155—Clause construed against party in whose favor it was inserted.

If there is a doubt as to the construction of a certain feature of a contract, it should be resolved against the party in whose favor it was inserted, since such language should be regarded as that of such party, but such rule should not be invoked where the language of the contract is clear.

3. Contracts \S 170(1)—Sales \S 71(1)—Construction by parties persuasive; seller could waive strict compliance with contract without losing right to invoke subsequently.

Where ice company agreed to sell ice to defendant up to a certain amount on any particular day on notice, it did not lose the right to invoke a strict compliance with the contract, whenever it saw fit to do so at a later date, by reason of having delivered more ice than it was required to do when demanded by the defendant, although a course of dealing will place a practical construction on a contract in cases where the rights of the parties are doubtful.

4. Contracts \S 156—Ejusdem generis rule to be sparingly applied.

The ejusdem generis rule is to be sparingly and cautiously applied.

5. Contracts \S 156—Statutes \S 194—“Ejusdem generis rule” defined.

The ejusdem generis rule, which applies alike to statutes and contracts, requires that where general words follow particular words the former are regarded to be applicable to the persons or things particularly mentioned, and the rule applies even if the general words are broad enough to cover other persons and things, unless something in the instrument plainly indicates that they are to be otherwise applied.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series Ejusdem Generis.]

6. Sales \S 85(2)—Seller of ice not relieved from delivery by sickness of employees.

An ice company, agreeing to furnish ice demanded by defendant daily up to a certain amount, was not exempt from liability for failure to supply ice during a period of nine days in October, 1918, when it was unable to operate its plant because of sickness among its employees under a clause in the contract that, “In the event the plant * * * is partially disabled by breakdown, fire, high water, washout, or from any other causes whatsoever beyond its control, it shall not be required to furnish any ice,” etc.

7. Trial \S 253(10)—Instruction not objectionable as ignoring duty of plaintiff seller of ice.

An instruction that if the jury believed that defendant failed to take a minimum of ice contracted for during certain months, then they should find for the plaintiff and assess damages at such a sum as it may have lost, etc., was not open to the objection that it was confined to the duty of the defendant to take, and ignores the duty of the plaintiff to furnish the minimum quantity of ice provided for in the contract, as the jury could hardly have been unreasonable enough to find that defendant “failed to take a minimum,” or any part thereof, which plaintiff was obligated to furnish but failed and refused to furnish.

8. Sales \S 384(7)—Instruction as to damages for failure to take ice held erroneous in view of seller's opportunity to resell.

In an action involving damages for failure of defendant to take minimum quantity of ice provided under contract, an instruction that if defendant failed to take such minimum quantity, jury should assess damages at such sum as plaintiff “may have lost and have been damaged by reason of the failure to comply with said contract at $3.50 per ton,” was erroneous, as it might be understood to mean that plaintiff's measure of damage for every ton of ice which defendant failed to take within the minimum amount was $3.50 per ton, when plaintiff was in fact selling ice to other persons and had ready sale for all of its ice.

9. Damages \S 62(4)—Party must minimize damages resulting from breach of contract.

Where a party is entitled to the benefit of a contract and can save himself from a loss arising from a breach of it at a trifling expense or with reasonable exertions, it is his duty to do it, and he can charge the delinquent with such damages only as with a reasonable endeavor and expense he could not prevent.

Error to Corporation Court of Lynchburg.

Action by the Lynchburg Diamond Ice Factory against the Standard Ice Company, Incorporated. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Kemp & Barksdale, of Lynchburg, for plaintiff in error.

T. J. O'Brien, of Lynchburg, for defendant in error.

KELLY, P. This is a writ of error to a judgment obtained upon notice of motion by the Lynchburg Diamond Ice Factory, a corporation, against the Standard Ice Company, Incorporated, for a balance alleged to be due the former from the latter upon an account growing out of the dealings between the parties under a certain contract, which was as follows:

"Memorandum of an agreement, made this 4th day of January, 1912, between Lynchburg Diamond Ice Factory, party of the first part, and Standard Ice Co., Inc., party of the second part.

"Witnesseth, that for and in consideration of the mutual advantages to be derived herefrom and of one dollar ($1.00) cash in hand paid by each of the parties hereto to the other, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, the parties hereto agree to and with each other as follows, to wit:

"First. That the said party of the first part will, during the ten (10) years next following the first day of January, 1912, sell unto the said party of the second part merchantable ice suited for retail family trade in the city of Lynchburg at the rate of three dollars and fifty cents ($3.50) per short ton delivered upon the platform of the said party of the first part at and after five o'clock a. m. each day, except Sunday, said ice to be weighed by the said party of the first part upon scales approved by the inspector of scales.

"Second. The said party of the first part agrees to sell and the said party of the second part agrees to buy a minimum amount of ice which shall equal five thousand (5,000) tons per year to be distributed as follows:

"In November, December, January and February, 300 tons.

"In March, April, May and June, 1,500 tons.

"In July, August, September and October, 3,200 tons.

"And in addition to said five thousand (5,000) tons, said party of the first part hereby agrees to furnish at the option of the said second party, ice of the aforesaid quality and at the price above named up to the full making capacity of the plant of the said party of the first part, namely, forty-five (45) tons every twenty-four (24) hours.

"Third. The said party of the second part agrees that in the event that he shall require more than twenty-five (25) tons of ice per day that he will notify in writing the officer in charge of the plant of said party of the first part twenty-four (24) hours in advance of the amount of ice which he will expect the said party of the first part to furnish under this contract, the amount to be stated as nearly accurate as possible and within five tons per day of the amount that shall be required by the said party of the second part, and when so notified the said party of the first part hereby agrees to hold for said party of the second part and the said party of the second part hereby agrees to accept the amount so specified.

"Fourth. In consideration of the agreement by said party of the second part to purchase of said party of the first part ice as hereinafter set forth, the said party of the first part agrees for itself, its successors and assigns that it will not sell, within the ten years above specified, to any other person than the party of the second part, either at wholesale or at retail, ice to be delivered, sold or used within the city of Lynchburg or within one mile from its corporate limits as they now are or may be hereafter constituted. The party of the first part shall have the right to sell ice to be used outside of the above limits.

"Fifth. The said party of the second part agrees to pay said party of the first part for all ice delivered unto him, the said party of the second part, by the said party of the first part on the first day of each and every calendar month for the ice so delivered within the previous month. If the first day of said month fall on Sunday payments shall be made upon the Monday following.

"Sixth. In the event the plant of the party of the first part is partially disabled by breakdown, fire, high water, washout, or from any other cause whatsoever beyond its control, it shall not be required to furnish any ice under this contract until it is able by reasonable diligence, to resume operations, except such ice as it is able to manufacture during that time, and the party of the second part shall be entitled to a credit on the minimum amount of ice required to be taken under this contract for the proportionate time said plant is shut down or disabled. In event that the plant of the party of the first part is entirely destroyed, it shall be optional with the said party of the first part to rebuild within a reasonable time and to continue this contract, and the said party of the first part shall give due notice to the party of the second part of its intention to resume or discontinue operations."

Prior to the making of this contract both parties manufactured, stored and sold ice, the plaintiff company selling principally to Williams & Barnett Co., ice retailers in Lynchburg. Mr. G. A. Barnett was president of the plaintiff corporation and one of the owners of the Williams & Barnett Co. When the contract above quoted was made the Standard Ice Company purchased the retail business of Williams & Barnett Co., and this resulted in leaving the retail field in Lynchburg, so far as these three companies were concerned, exclusively to the Standard Ice Company.

The parties to the above-quoted contract have dealt with each other constantly from the date thereof to the present time. No difference arose between them with reference to the meaning and construction of the contract prior to the year 1918. The controversy here involved relates exclusively to transactions during the years 1918 and 1919, and arose because of the increased cost and selling price of ice.

We shall not attempt any analysis of the various items entering into the plaintiff's claim, and the defenses and offsets offered by the defendant. They are intricate and confusing. The fundamental differences between the parties arise out of the language of the contract itself, and may be stated as follows:

1. What is the maximum quantity of ice which the defendant had the right to demand, and in what daily quantities?

2. Did the sixth clause of the contract exempt the plaintiff from liability for failure to supply ice during a period of nine days in October, 1918, when it claimed to be unable to operate its plant because of sickness among its employees?

The answer to the first question depends upon what the contract means by "the full making capacity of the plant." Does it mean, as plaintiff contends, that the defendant is entitled upon proper notice to demand a maximum of 45 tons each day except Sunday; or does it mean, as the defendant contends, that no daily maximum is fixed, and that it is entitled to demand on any day of the week such quantity as it may need for its retail trade, not to exceed in any one week more than the total capacity of the plant for that week, including Sundays?

[1] Taking the contract as a whole and giving a fair interpretation to all its provisions bearing upon this question, we are of opinion that "the full capacity of the plant" had exclusive reference to the daily, and did not contemplate the weekly, capacity. The first clause provided for a sale of ice "for retail family trade * * * delivered upon the platform of the said party of the first part at and after 5 o'clock a. m. on each day, except Sunday." The second clause provided for a four-month minimum, to be taken by the defendant, in each of the three sections into which each year was by the contract divided, which minimum even in hot seasons was very materially less than the full capacity of the plant; and this clause further provided that the defendant at its option might require the plaintiff to furnish ice "up to the full maximum capacity of the plant * * * namely, forty-five (45) tons every twenty-four (24) hours." The third clause provided that if the defendant should require more than 25 tons per day, it should notify the plaintiff, in writing 24 hours in advance, of the amount which it would expect, to be stated as nearly accurate as possible and within five tons of the amount, and that when so notified the plaintiff should "hold" for the defendant, and the latter should accept the amount so specified in the notice. The fourth clause obligated the plaintiff to refrain, during the period of the contract, from selling ice at wholesale or retail within the city of Lynchburg, or within one mile of the corporate limits, but expressly permitted sales outside of those limits.

[2] The parties are agreed that the defendant was not bound to take ice every day; that it could take 25 tons on any day, except Sunday, without notice, and could not have more than 25 tons on any day in the absence of written notice, unless, of course, such notice was waived by the plaintiff. The real question is, Could the defendant upon proper notice demand more than 45 tons, the daily capacity of the plant, on any one day? We think it is fairly clear from the language of the contract as a whole that the amount over 25 tons per day which the defendant could require upon the notice aforesaid was intended to be limited to the full capacity of the plant for the day or days for which the notice was given. If there be a doubt as to the construction of this feature of the contract, it should be resolved against the defendant as the party in whose favor it was inserted. Where various stipulations are contained in a contract, some of which are particularly intended for the benefit of one of the parties, and others of which are particularly intended for the benefit of the other party, it is fair to say that the language of such provisions should be regarded as that of the party in whose favor they are inserted, and therefore to be construed most strongly against such party. This rule of construction is not favored by the courts, and should not be invoked where the language of the contract is clear. In this case we think the rule ought to be applied.

It is strongly urged upon us that both parties, when they entered into the contract, knew that the quantities of ice for retail trade depended largely upon weather conditions; that in Lynchburg ice was not delivered to the retail trade on Sundays; that therefore the daily requirements would vary; and that, certainly on Saturdays, the defendant would often need as much as two days' supply, which would be twice the daily maximum capacity of the plant. This argument is not without force, but it is not conclusive, and other considerations appearing in the case outweigh it. The defendant concedes that to sustain this contention we would have to construe the third clause of the contract as meaning that the plaintiff might often be required to hold at least one full day's output in refrigeration for the defendant, and this, we think, was never contemplated. What the contract meant by saying that the plaintiff should on notice "hold" the ice required in excess of 25 tons manifestly was that it should make no other disposition of the excess for that day. If the defendant meant to require the plaintiff to hold ice in storage, the contract failed to say so. The argument, based upon the theory that the parties knew the daily retail sales of ice would fluctuate with the weather, and that more ice would be required on Saturdays than on other days, is very largely met by the provisions of the contract itself. If the construction we have placed upon it is correct, there still remains a very wide play—from no ice at all to 45 tons in any one day—to cover varying daily demands. If the daily maximum was insufficient on certain days, it is as reasonable to assume, in the absence of more explicit terms on the subject than the contract contains, that the defendant, which had an ice plant of its own, would have to take from the plaintiff and store for itself the extra ice needed for such days, as it would be to hold that the plaintiff was obligated to store it for him.

[3-5] It is further very earnestly insisted that the course of dealing between the parties from 1912 to 1918 placed a practical construction on the contract in accord with that now contended for by the defendant. The dealings of the parties to a contract in relation to its terms are often conclusive upon questions arising as to its effect or meaning. This may be because the parties have deliberately and mutually disregarded its plain terms, or it may be because they have so dealt with each other as to definitely fix the meaning of the terms which would otherwise be of doubtful import. In the former case their plain rights have been waived, and this may apply to either a part or the whole of the period covered by the contract, depending, of course, upon the length of time during which the waiver has been in operation. In the latter case the doubtful rights of the parties have been fixed by their practical dealings with each other. In either case, however, if their course of dealing has been of doubtful purpose and import respecting the meaning of the contract, such dealings are themselves open to explanation and interpretation. In this case it is true that the plaintiff for years delivered ice to the defendant in such daily quantities as the latter demanded, regardless of any maximum provided for in the contract. This happened quite often on Saturdays, but also on other days. No point was made of this, and plaintiff charged and was paid for the ice at the contract price, whether more or less than 45 tons was delivered on any particular day. It is also true, however, that during that period the ice market was apparently not very active, the price was low, and both the plaintiff and the defendant had an average available supply of ice to an amount in excess of the demands of their trade. The defendant sometimes failed to take as much as the sectional minimum which he was plainly required under the terms of the contract to take, and was not required to settle for the shortage. In 1918 the price and demand had increased. Each party then could advantageously use and sell more ice. Prior to that time it had been to the plaintiff's advantage to waive a strict compliance with the contract as to quantity, for it could get no more than the contract price by selling elsewhere. This is the frank explanation given by the plaintiff for not insisting upon a strict conformity by the defendant with his contract. It is a reasonable explanation, and we cannot agree with counsel for defendant in charging the plaintiff with bad faith. Of course, if plaintiff was trying to violate his contract because prices had advanced, it was censurable to a high degree; if not, it certainly had the right to waive the terms of the contract for the time and to invoke a strict compliance therewith whenever it saw fit to do so at a later date. This, we think, is what was done. The plaintiff was not given by the lower court, nor do we intend by anything we have said to accord to it any rights which it might have insisted upon, but did not assert under the contract during any past period.

[4-6] We come now to the second question, which involves the sixth clause of the contract. It appears that for nine days in October, 1918, the plaintiff failed to furnish all the ice which the defendant was entitled to, because it was prevented from operating its plant by reason of sickness among its employees and inability to secure other men in their places. For this reason the plaintiff contended and the trial court held that it was entitled to the exemption provided for in the sixth clause. This we think was error. The ejusdem generis rule is to be sparingly and cautiously applied, but it has a proper place in the law, and is applicable here. This rule, which applies alike to statutes and contracts, is a familiar one, and requires that where general words follow particular words, the former are to be regarded as applicable to the persons or things particularly mentioned; and the rule applies even if the general words are broad enough to cover other persons and things, unless something in the instrument plainly indicates that they are to be otherwise applied. Am. Mang. Co. v. Va. Mang. Co., 91 Va. 272, 281, 21 S. E. 466. The language of the contract to be construed here is:

"In the event the plant of the party of the first part is partially disabled by breakdown, fire, high water, washout, or from any other cause whatsoever beyond its control, it shall not be required to furnish any ice," etc.

The idea manifestly is to provide against some physical disability of the plant—a thing which has not occurred in this case, for, as a matter of fact, the plant remained in perfect operating condition, but ice could not be harvested during the nine days in question for want of men. If there were any doubt about the meaning of the language, it would seem to be entirely removed by the next sentence in the contract, which again speaks of the plant, and makes provision for a case in which, instead of being partially disabled, it should be "entirely destroyed." Furthermore, applying the rule here which we applied above to the language used for the benefit of the defendant, as this language was plainly inserted in the contract for the benefit of the plaintiff, we must adopt a construction which will resolve the doubt, if any, against that party. The language in question cannot, in our opinion, be held to give the plaintiff exemption in case of inability to run its plant for want of men. Whatever the parties might have done if a situation of this sort had been in mind when the contract was written, it seems clear that they were not thinking about such a contingency, and therefore simply failed to deal with it one way or the other.

This disposes of the two main points of difference between the parties on this appeal. Certain other differences between them were settled at the trial, and are not made the subject of any assignments of error by either party, and this opinion is to be construed as approving the action of the trial court in all respects except where the contrary affirmatively appears.

The foregoing discussion makes it unnecessary to discuss seriatim the instructions as offered and given at the former trial of the case. What has been said will in the main be sufficient to indicate our views as to the instructions which should be given if the case is tried again.

Plaintiff's instruction A, however, given over the objection of the defendant, should be specifically adverted to. That instruction was as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that under the contract between the Lynchburg Diamond Ice Factory and the Standard Ice Company, Incorporated, that the Standard Ice Company was required to take at least 5,000 tons of ice a year, to be distributed as follows:

November, December, January, and February	300 tons
March, April, May, and June	1,500 "
July, August, September, and October	3,200 "

"If therefore, they believe from the evidence that during any four months, as aforesaid, the defendant failed to take a minimum, then you shall find for the plaintiff and assess damages at such a sum as it may have lost and have been damaged by reason of the failure of the defendant to comply with said contract, at $3.50 per ton."

[7] Two objections are made to this instruction. The first is that it is confined to the duty of the defendant to take, and ignores the duty of the plaintiff to furnish, the minimum quantity of ice provided for in the contract. This point is not well taken because the jury could hardly have been unreasonable enough to find that the defendant "failed to take a minimum," or any part thereof, which the plaintiff was obligated to furnish, but failed and refused to furnish.

[8, 9] The second objection is more serious.

The instruction might be understood to say that the plaintiff's measure of damage for every ton of ice which the defendant failed to take within the minimum amount was $3.50 per ton. It seems probable from the evidence that the plaintiff could, during the period covered by the account here sued on, have sold any ice it had ready, and which the defendant could have been compelled to pay for, at a higher price than the contract figure. The plaintiff was selling outside of Lynchburg and at times had ready sale for all of its ice, as the proof clearly shows.

"Where a party is entitled to the benefit of a contract, and can save himself from a loss arising from a breach of it at a trifling expense or with reasonable exertions, it is his duty to do it, and he can charge the delinquent with such damages only as with reasonable endeavors and expense he could not prevent." Warren v. Stoddart, 105 U. S. 224, 26 L. Ed. 117.

Judge Keith, quoting this proposition in Stonega Coal Co. v. Addington, 112 Va. 807, 813, 73 S. E. 257, 259 (87 L. R. A. [N. S.] 969), adds:

"Authorities upon this subject might be multiplied to an almost unlimited extent."

It may be that the instruction was intended to state the measure of damage in accordance with the rule just quoted. If so, it should have been more clearly expressed.

For the reasons stated above the judgment complained of will be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, if defendant shall be so advised, in conformity with the views herein expressed.

(129 Va. 350)

CAMP MFG. CO. v. GREEN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 17, 1921.)

1. Partition \S 44 — Quieting title \S 29 — Where suit is to remove cloud, and not for partition, doctrine of laches is not strictly applicable.

The general rule that laches does not apply to a partition suit by legal title holder within the statutory period, where no title has been acquired by adverse possession by the defendant or his predecessors is not applicable, where complainants' bill is not merely one for partition, where the parties' rights are clear, but shows adverse claims under deeds running through a period of 50 years, and alleges conveyances constituting a cloud on title, and prays that the rights of all parties be adjudicated.

2. Quieting title \S 1 — Equitable doctrine should control disposition of proceeding to remove cloud.

Where the only controversy in a case arises from deeds claimed void and the adverse claims thereunder, and the complainants seek relief by removal of cloud on title which only an equity court could give, equitable doctrines should control.

3. Quietling title §29—Laches applies to settling conflicting titles from danger of losing available evidence.

Underlying reason for the doctrine of laches as applied to conflicting land titles, in removing clouds, is that because of lapse of time and the death of the parties it is impossible to ascertain all the facts, and therefore it is just to leave the parties in the position in which they have placed themselves.

4. Evidence §69—Where actors in transactions are dead, honesty rather than questionable motives will be imputed to them.

In a proceeding to remove cloud from alleged void deed after a lapse of about 50 years, and after the actors in the transactions have died, conduct which would have required explanation from the living will be construed to impute intelligence, honesty, and integrity to deceased, rather than ignorance, fraud, chicanery, and intention to do wrong, and parties must be presumed to have known their rights when making a family settlement.

5. Evidence §66 — Presumption that complainants' ancestor had notice of sale of land and either received payment or waived right to collect.

Where neither complainants, seeking removal of cloud, nor their ancestors, made any claim of title for 52 years, it cannot be assumed, because it could not be specifically proved that an ancestor had notice of the transaction by which her husband sold the land, that she had no such notice; but, in the absence of contrary proof, it must be presumed either that the balance to be paid to the parties entitled thereto from the sale of land by the executor was paid to the parties entitled thereto, or that they have waived their right to collect it.

6. Evidence §236(5)—Heirs bound by admission of party from whom they inherit.

In a proceeding to remove cloud on title, consisting of a deed given by an executor, the admission in an affidavit in a chancery suit by one of the heirs that his mother had received her share of the purchase money from the executor is binding upon complainants, wife and children of the affiant.

7. Executors and administrators §149—Heirs barred after 52 years from asserting rights as against executor's deed.

Where an executor sold land without authority, heirs held barred from asserting rights which originally existed by the lapse of 50 years, and consequent loss of evidence, acquiescence, and ratification.

8. Estoppel §106—Executors and administrators §149—Available at law; executor's sale ratified by receipt of proceeds.

Equitable estoppel is available in an action at law as well as in equity, and an executor's sale, though void, is ratified, if, without fraud or mistake, the parties receive the proceeds therefrom.

9. Quietling title §29—One remaining silent, and not protecting title to land, until evidence is destroyed, is barred from relief.

While mere lapse of time or inaction by owner with clear record title without adverse possession will not defeat title, yet unexplained and unreasonable delay, with adverse claims and facts and circumstances brought home to the legal title holder, and his failure to act for such time as to destroy all of the evidence of the original transaction out of which adverse claims arose, will bar relief by removal of cloud after the rights and equities of others have supervened.

10. Executors and administrators §149 — Heirs held not entitled to attack deed of executor without accounting for proceeds of sale inherited by their ancestors.

Heirs, seeking to overthrow executor's deed given without authority, who are also heirs of such executor, so that, if executor did not account to their ancestors, they must have received such proceeds through descent from executor, cannot successfully assert title to the property without accounting for the proceeds of sale.

11. Executors and administrators §149 — Heir under whom complainants claim held to have ratified executor's sale.

In a proceeding by heirs to set aside a deed of executor, who was the husband of their ancestor, facts held to show that such ancestor was not merely silent, but expressly and conclusively ratified the sale and received the benefits, so that heirs are barred.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Brunswick County.

Suit by Joseph B. Green and others against the Camp Manufacturing Company and others. From a decree, the named defendant appeals. Reversed and rendered.

E. P. Buford, of Lawrenceville, for appellant.

E. R. F. Wells, of Norfolk, B. A. Lewis, of Lawrenceville, and Plummer & Bohannon, of Petersburg, for appellees.

PRENTIS, J. The material facts out of which this controversy arises are these: Miles B. Branch died in 1861, seized of a tract of 787½ acres of land in Brunswick county. By his will, which was probated in October, 1861, he gave his wife one-third of his estate for life, and subject to this life estate he devised the land to his four daughters, Ann R. Green, Rosa M. Branch, Susan E. Branch, and Mary E. Branch. George W. Green, who was the husband of his daughter, Ann R. Green, was named as executor and qualified. Besides his widow, he left surviving him nine children, five sons and the four daughters above named. After his death 266½ acres of the land was assigned to his widow, and this left 521 acres devised in fee to the four daughters. Notwithstanding the fact that the executor had no authority under the will to sell the real estate, he in 1863 sold this 521 acres at public auction. One of the sons, William J. Branch, became the purchaser, and the executor undertook to convey it to him by deed dated January 23, 1864. On October 24, 1878, this son, William J. Branch, executed a deed of trust thereon to secure certain of his own indebtedness, and thereafter he conveyed three parcels thereof, aggregating 150 acres to Goodwyn Grain, Sallie Penn and Lewis Penn, severally, and it is conceded that they have acquired good titles thereto by adverse possession. On August 26, 1882, Leake and Donnan, trustees under the deed of trust, sold and conveyed the residue thereof, 371 acres, to the administrator of Carter R. Bishop. On July 24, 1889, Davis and Mann, special commissioners acting under a decree of the hustings court of the city of Petersburg, sold this 371 acres at public auction to E. G. Temple and conveyed it to him. On September 15, 1889, Temple conveyed the same 371 acres to the Brunswick Lumber Company, and on November 1, 1902, the Brunswick Lumber Company conveyed it to the appellant, Camp Manufacturing Company. This 371 acres has been in a state of nature, covered with a growth of standing timber, since the death of Miles B. Branch, and has not been in actual possession of any of the parties.

The subject of this immediate controversy is only that share of the 371 acres which belonged to Ann R. Green, one-fourth of which she derived under the will of her father, Miles B. Branch, and one thirty-second thereof by descent from one of her four sisters, Rosa M. Branch, who died in 1864, making a total of nine thirty-seconds. George W. Green, the executor, lived until the year 1890, and his widow, the said Ann R. Green, survived him several years, but has been dead for many years. The accounts of the executor, of which he made two, show that he received $4,689 for the 521 acres so sold by him at public auction, and that a portion thereof was applied to the payment of the claim of Miles B. Branch, Jr., another son of the testator; the personal property for which he accounted being insufficient for that purpose. The purchaser, William J. Branch, died in 1910, more than 80 years old.

Ann R. Green and George W. Green left seven surviving children as their heirs at law. The complainants here are their son, Joseph B. Green, their daughter, Freddie Britton, and the widow and three children of their son, Sidney M. Green; so that J. B. Green and Freddie Britton claim directly as heirs at law of their mother, Ann R. Green, and the other complainants as heirs at law of her son, their father, Sidney M. Green, deceased.

Prior to this litigation (in 1909) the claimant of the undivided interests in the land which had been devised by the will to Susan E. Branch (who became Mrs. Dunn) and to Mary E. Branch (who became Mrs. Rae) instituted an action of ejectment and recovered eighteen thirty-seconds of the entire tract. The history of that litigation is found in Seward v. Camp Mfg. Co., 112 Va. 479, 71 S. E. 614. After this recovery the Camp Manufacturing Company instituted its suit in equity to enjoin the enforcement of that judgment, upon the ground that the original devisees, Mrs. Rae and Mrs. Dunn, were estopped by laches, and that their grantee, Seward, who had recovered in the action of ejectment, was likewise estopped. In that suit both Mrs. Rae and Mrs. Dunn testified that they had never received any part of the purchase money. The trial court refused the injunction, and this court refused an appeal November 9, 1911. More than 4 years thereafter, in January, 1916, the complainants instituted this suit, claiming their proportions of the nine thirty-seconds of the land as children and grandchildren and as successors in title to Ann R. Green. The bill recites the various conveyances under which the appellant claims title, and alleges that these conveyances constitute clouds upon the title of the complainants and of the other lawful owners thereof as successors in title to Ann R. Green, and so prevent the free alienation of their interests, and prays that, in the event partition in kind cannot be made, the land may be sold and the proceeds divided among those interested therein in accordance with their respective rights and equities, that the rights of all parties to this suit in and to the said land may be adjudged, and for general relief.

The appellant, as one of the defendants, filed its demurrer and answer to this bill, which demurrer the trial court overruled, and, having first established the title of the appellees to the interest in the land which they claimed, referred the cause to a commissioner to ascertain what damage, if any, they had suffered by reason of timber cut and removed from the premises by the appellant; and it is of these decrees that the appellant complains.

The case has been elaborately and ably argued, and this reduces and simplifies our own labor. The appellant here is not relying upon mere silence to bar the assertion of a title to land, originally good, but now alleged to be stale and antiquated, nor does it rely merely upon the doctrine of equitable estoppel by conduct to bar the assertion of the legal title. To use the language of the appellant's learned counsel, it relies upon—

"the defenses of laches and equitable estoppel upon the grounds: (1) That this suit was not brought until 52 years had elapsed after the execution of the deed by George W. Green, executor, which is now assailed; (2) that all the parties to the original transaction have long been dead, and evidence to prove the original facts and circumstances is no longer available; (3) that the suit was not brought by parties whose rights were affected by the executor's sale, but by members of the second and third generations; (4) that the ancestors of the plaintiffs evidently abandoned all claim to the legal title to the land in controversy; and (5) that the ancestors of the plaintiffs received the benefit of the whole of the proceeds of the sale."

[1] For the appellees it is contended that there is no evidence to sustain these propositions, and that the appellant's case rests entirely on allegations, assertions, and assumptions unsupported by sustaining evidence. It is claimed, and this must be conceded, that the general rule is that the doctrine of laches does not apply to a suit for the partition of land brought by the holder of the legal title within the statutory period, where there has been no title acquired by adverse possession by the defendant or his predecessors in title. It is said in Cole's Adm'r v. Ballard, 78 Va. 149, that—

"No principle is better established, or more uniformly acted on in courts of equity, than that in respect to the statute of limitations—equity follows the law—that is to say, if a legal demand be asserted in equity, which at law is barred by statute, it is equally barred in a court of equity; and if not barred by statute at law, neither is it barred in equity."

[2] And, relying upon this doctrine, the claim is made that because the deed from Geo. W. Green, executor, is void, and there has been no adverse possession of the property, the legal title of the complainants is perfect, and the defense of laches cannot be invoked to defeat such a title. In this case, however, the complainants themselves show by their bill that this is not a mere suit for partition, in which the rights of the parties are clear, but the bill itself shows adverse claims under deeds running through a period of over 50 years, alleges that these conveyances constitute a cloud upon the title, and prays that the rights of all of the parties may be adjudicated. This we think sufficient to take the case out of the general rule just alluded to. There is no other controversy in this case, except that which arises out of these deeds and the adverse claims thereunder. The complainants have sought the relief which only a court of equity could give—that is, the removal of the alleged cloud upon their title created only by these conveyances and the consequential adverse claims thereunder. Hence, equitable doctrines should control the disposition of the case.

[3] The underlying reason for the doctrine of laches is that because of the lapse of time, and the death of parties, it is impossible to ascertain all the facts, and therefore it is just to leave the parties in the position in which they have placed themselves.

In the case of Akins v. Hill, 7 Ga. 577, it is said:

"Equity will not aid in the enforcement of stale demands. Although statutes of limitations are obligatory in equity as well as at law, yet there are cases where that court will make time a bar, although not strictly pleadable as a limitation. * * * The peace of society requires that there should be limits put to litigation. The justice and sense of civilized communities have ever favored limitation laws. There is no principle of equity sounder, more conservative and more prolific, in all the fruits of peace, than this: That he who slumbers over his rights, with no impediment to his asserting them, until the evidence upon which a counterclaim is founded, may, from lapse of time, be presumed to be lost; until the generation cognizant of the transactions between the parties has passed away, and until original actors are in their graves, and their affairs are left to representatives—the law, in the exercise of an equitable sovereignty, presumes it to be unjust, that under such circumstances, a complainant should be heard; and in nine cases out of ten, it is unjust in fact, as well as in theory. It is presumed, and the presumption grows out of the principles of human nature, developed in universal experience, that men will use reasonable diligence to get what rightfully belongs to them."

[4] The fact that all of those interested in the property at the time the original void conveyance was made, all of the actors in the transactions out of which this controversy arises have died, makes it necessary, in order to do justice, to consider every circumstance from which any inference may be fairly drawn. Conduct which would have required explanation from those responsible for and familiar with the transactions under criticism will be construed so as to impute intelligence, honesty, and integrity to the actors who cannot now speak, rather than ignorance, fraud, chicanery, and intention to do wrong. The executor, who was the husband of Ann R. Green, and who sold her property, is dead; the purchaser, her brother, who paid for the land which he had bought at public auction, is dead, and another of her brothers who received a part of the proceeds of sale, claiming to be a creditor of their father, the testator, is dead. Thus all of those who were then interested in the property, and must therefore be presumed to have known their rights, are dead; so that we can only speculate as to the truth from the meager facts developed as to this long past family settlement made by these four thus bound by ties of affection and interest each to all the others.

[5] The time itself is most impressive—that is, the fact that for 52 years, until this suit was instituted, there was no claim of title by these appellees, their parents and their grandparents under whom they claim. What other inference can be fairly drawn from these circumstances than that Ann R. Green herself acquiesced in these transactions? Her husband was the executor, her mother lived upon that adjacent portion of the original tract of land which had been assigned to her for life, two of these sales were at public auction, and 150 acres of the original tract has been occupied by claimants under deeds equally invalid as those under which the appellant claims. It taxes human credulity too much to assume, because notice is not specifically proved, that Ann R. Green had no notice of these transactions.

While it is true under the doctrine of Leavell v. Smith's Ex'rs, 99 Va. 374, 38 S. E. 202, that the ex parte accounts of executors and administrators are not evidence of overpayments by them, or that the claims stated in such accounts were debts justly due by the deceased and chargeable upon his real assets, nevertheless, it is proper in this case that we should consider the fact that the accounts of the executor exist, that they indicate that the personal estate was insufficient to pay the debts of the testator, and if this was true that it would have been necessary to sell the real estate for the purpose of providing the funds for the payment of such debts. This, however, is not for the purpose of now establishing these debts against the estate of the heirs at law, for they have long since been barred, but in order to show that the fact thus indicated by the accounts was thereby called to the attention of the devisees, and therefore supplies the motive which may have gulded them in acquiescing in the illegal sale of their property. Then again that account can be adverted to for the purpose of showing that the executor himself admitted his own liability to the owners of the land for the balance of $3,434.58 shown to be due by him on December 31, 1863. Certainly, in the absence of contrary proof, there must be a presumption which would be enforced in every forum, either that this balance has been paid to the parties entitled thereto, or that they have waived their right to collect it. It inevitably follows that if Ann R. Green, under whom the appellees claim title, has received her share of this balance arising from the proceeds of sale of her land, they are estopped from asserting title to the land itself.

[6] As to the claim of the children of Sidney M. Green, there is still an additional circumstance to be considered—that is, that Sidney M. Green himself made an affidavit in the chancery suit of Camp Manufacturing Company v. Seward, in which that company was endeavoring to enjoin the judgment in the action of ejectment above referred to, which contains the statement that he was sure that his mother, Ann R. Green, had received her share of that purchase money. This statement is made in reply to a question which had no reference to Ann R. Green's interest, but only related to the interest of two of her sisters which was involved in that litigation, and as to one of these sisters he stated that she had received her share, while as to the other that she had not, and then he volunteered to say that he was sure that his mother had received her share, his impression however being based upon information received as a member of the family. While this deposition in its entirety may not be admissible as evidence in this case, it is certainly true that the admission of a party in interest against his own interest, however and whenever such admission may be made, can always be introduced when it affects either his own claim or that of those claiming under him. It is proper to observe in this connection that although this statement was made in 1911, he, Sidney M. Green, the eldest son of Ann R. Green, the husband of one and the father of three of these complainants, lived until 1915, and this suit was not instituted until 1916. It may be regarded as absolutely certain that if Sidney M. Green thereafter, in his lifetime, had brought suit asserting such a claim of title as his widow and children here assert, this admission on his part would have defeated it.

[7] It does not seem necessary to cite authority for our conclusion that these parties are barred from asserting the rights which originally existed by reason of the lapse of time, and consequent loss of evidence from which the court might ascertain the truth, as to such acquiescence and ratification; but such authority is not lacking in cases resembling this.

[8] In Tracy v. Roberts, 88 Me. 310, 34 Atl. 68, 51 Am. St. Rep. 394, it is held that the doctrine of equitable estoppel is legally available in an action at law as well as in equity. Hence, if a guardian has made a void sale of his ward's real estate, but in good faith, there being no fraud or mistake, and the ward has received the benefits of the proceeds of such sale, and has, by his conduct, ratified and affirmed it after he became of age, with full knowledge of the facts, the doctrine of equitable estoppel applies, and neither the ward nor those claiming under him, can afterwards recover the land itself. We do not mean by this citation to weaken the force of the rules generally applicable when the doctrine of equitable estoppel is invoked, for one of the essentials of that doctrine is that the party claiming the benefit of it has been deceived by the action of the party having the legal title to land, and where the facts are disclosed by the record itself, as in this case, the doctrine does not apply. C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Walker, 100 Va. 69, 40 S. E. 633, 914.

In Dunbar v. Green, 66 Kan. 557, 72 Pac. 243, it is held that, where the land of a Shawnee Indian (and there are special statutes protecting Indians from the defense of laches) was sold, while he was a minor, by a guardian appointed by a probate court, and the Indian, after coming of age, delayed for more than 21 years to question the validity of the deed, and the property had in the meantime greatly increased in value, and passed into the hands of different owners, no fraud or concealment or other exceptional circumstances tending to excuse the delay being shown, he cannot afterwards be permitted to attack the deed on the ground that the proceedings upon which it was based were void for want of jurisdiction.

In Choteau v. Klapmeyer, 68 Kan. 829, 75 Pac. 1009, there is the same result where a void deed had been given for land of a half-breed Indian, and he did not begin his action for it until after the lapse of 24 years. He was held barred of his right by his own laches.

In Howe v. South Park Commissioners, 119 Ill. 101, 7 N. E. 333, it is said that the principle that lies at the foundation of all cases in that court on this subject is:

"The party who challenges the title of his adversary to real property must be diligent in discovering that which will avoid the title, or render it invalid, and diligent in his application for relief. Unreasonable delay, not explained by equitable circumstances, has always been declared evidence of acquiescence, and will bar relief."

[9] We do not mean that mere lapse of time or inaction on the part of the owner of real estate by clear record title, where there is no adverse possession, will defeat such title, but that unexplained and unreasonable delay, the existence of adverse claims of title, and of facts and circumstances fairly brought home to the knowledge of the owner of the legal title, and the failure to act for the protection of such legal title for such a length of time as to destroy all of the evidence of the original transaction out of which such adverse claim arises, will and ought to bar such relief, for the sound reason, so often stated that he who fails to speak when he ought to will not be heard if he attempts to speak after the rights and equities of others have supervened, when he ought to be silent.

The bill in this case recites the chain of conveyances running through half a century, shows that the appellant and its predecessors have claimed thereunder, but does not allege either ignorance of their rights or any other matter constituting any impediment whatever to an earlier prosecution of his suit. In Hogg v. Shield, 114 Va. 403, 76 S. E. 934, this is said:

"A party who seeks the aid of a court of equity, after long delay in the assertion of a claim, should set forth in his bill specifically what were the impediments to an earlier prosecution of his claim, how he came to be so long ignorant of his rights, and the means, if any, used by the defendant to fraudulently keep him in ignorance, and how and when he first came to a knowledge of the matters alleged in his bill; otherwise the chancellor may justly refuse to consider the case, on his own showing, without inquiring whether there is a demurrer, or formal plea of the statute of limitations contained in the answer."

Here there were both the demurrer and the answer, setting up the defenses alluded to, so that the doctrine as stated in the case cited, and in many others which might be cited, applies.

[10] There is still another circumstance which is sufficient to defeat the relief prayed for in the bill. All of these appellees are either children or grandchildren of George W. Green, or claim under them. He received, according to his own executorial accounts, the entire proceeds arising from the sale of this land. If he has not accounted therefor, then his heirs at law and distributees or those claiming under them, have thus received the proceeds of the sale by so much as George W. Green's estate was thereby augmented, if he did so fail to account. Upon equitable principles, it is evident that, before these appellees can successfully assert title to this property, they must account for the proceeds of its sale which their ancestor received.

This from Merwin's Equity and Equity Pleading, § 908, cited by this court in Inge v. Inge, 120 Va. 329, 91 S. E. 142, is appropriate:

"From the nature of the case, no rigid rule can be laid down as to what delay will constitute laches; every suit must depend upon its own circumstances. But whenever the delay fairly justifies the inference of acquiescence in the adverse claim, or whenever it has been of such a character as to induce other persons to alter their circumstances or conduct, so that the element of estoppel is introduced, a court of equity will commonly hold the delay to operate as an absolute bar."

In Parker v. Stephenson, 127 Va. —, 104 S. E. 39, which was a suit for partition and the removal of a cloud, this is said:

"The infant complainant in the present suit has come into a court of equity, asking its aid and assistance to have the deed of trust and the deed made to the appellee in pursuance of the sale made thereunder 'declared void and of no effect as to said two-thirds of your orator,' and hence removed as a cloud on his title. Where the situation is such that equity can be done between the parties, the infancy of a complainant does not exclude him from the operation of the maxim that he who asks equity must do equity."

[11] The logic of these meager facts leads us irresistibly to these conclusions: While true, as a general rule, that the mere silence of the owner will not defeat a good record title to real estate, we have here the unequivocal declaration of the husband of one and the father of three of these claimants that his mother, Ann R. Green, received her share of the proceeds of sale, and this language is the antithesis of mere silence on his part. So, also, if the statement be true, such action on Ann R. Green's part, under whom all of the appellees claim, is not mere silence, but express ratification, which is conclusive against all who claim under her, and it may be added that the truth of Sidney M. Green's statement is also fairly inferable from her own conduct, both during her husband's life and during the many years in which she survived him.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the appellees are estopped by facts and circumstances which show that the evidence of the parties to the transaction, which might have established a complete defense, has been lost by lapse of time; that from the facts which do appear it may be fairly inferred that Ann R. Green, their common ancestor, under whom they claim, consented to the sale, and abandoned her title, and received her share of the purchase price; and in addition to this, because all of the claimants are either heirs at law of George W. Green, or claim as their successors in title, and so cannot repudiate his deed without accounting for the purchase price to the extent that his estate was increased thereby.

For the reasons indicated, we are of opinion that the trial court should have dismissed the bill, and in accordance with the prayer of the cross-bill of the appellant, should have entered a decree confirming its title to the land in controversy, and we will enter such a decree here.

Reversed.

CITY OF CLIFTON FORGE v. VIRGINIA-WESTERN POWER CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 17, 1921.)

1. Electricity ☞11—Franchise covering night electric light service held not to cover day service also.

Where the franchise of an electric light and power company required it only to furnish incandescent lights "at all hours from sunset to sunrise, or as much earlier or as much later as weather conditions make it necessary," the franchise did not cover both night and day service in respect to compensation to be charged, notwithstanding that the company in fact had also been furnishing day service.

2. Estoppel ☞62(2), 78(1) — That electric light company furnished additional service held not to estop it from claiming that the franchise did not cover such additional service.

Where a light and power company operating under a franchise covering night service had for more than 10 years also furnished day service, such fact held not to estop the company from denying that the franchise covered day service also, and the police power of the state as exercised through the State Corporation Commission could not be ousted by such an estoppel in pais operating on the parties.

3. Appeal and error ☞1097(1)—Adverse decision on former hearing of same case not subject to review.

A contention fully considered and answered adversely to appellant on a former hearing of the same case is not subject to review on appeal.

4. Electricity ☞11—State Corporation Commission may fix rates for electric service not covered by franchise.

Where the use of streets, alleys, and other public property in a city for the purpose of furnishing electric service has been in existence without objection on the city's part for over 10 years, but no rate therefor has ever been fixed by contract, the State Corporation Commission may under Act March 27, 1914 (Laws 1914, c. 340), as amended (Laws 1918, c. 407), fix rates therefor, the act of the Commission being not a grant of a use, but a determination of rates for a use already in existence.

5. Electricity ☞11—State Corporation Commission may on its own motion alter rate schedules and substitute rates for light and power deemed just and reasonable.

The State Corporation Commission may on its own motion or on complaint of a proper party alter schedules of electric light and power rates filed before it and substitute therefor such rates as it may deem just and reasonable in view of Code 1919, §§ 4058-4073.

6. Electricity ☞11—Procedure for fixing light and power rates held to provide reasonable opportunity for hearing on part of city.

Since under Code 1919, § 4071, it is the duty of the State Corporation Commission to fix and order substituted for electric light and power rates filed, such rates as shall be just and reasonable, such procedure gives a city wherein the light and power company is operating ample opportunity to be heard as to the justness and reasonableness of the rates charged.

Appeal from State Corporation Commission.

Petition by the Virginia-Western Power Company before the State Corporation Commission for permission to withdraw in the City of Clifton Forge electric light and power service or for a determination of adequate service and to fix rates therefor. From the order of the Commission, the City appeals. Affirmed.

O. B. Harvey, of Clifton Forge, for appellant.

F. W. King, of Clifton Forge, for appellee.

BURKS, J. This is a continuation of the litigation involved in the case of the Virginia-Western Power Co. v. City of Clifton Forge, 125 Va. 469, 99 S. E. 723, 9 A. L. R. 1148. On the former appeal the respective rights and duties of the parties were very fully considered and passed upon, and the validity and binding effect of the contract of franchise between the city and the predecessor

In title of the appellee were upheld as to the service stipulated for in the franchise. It was also held that as to services not so stipulated for jurisdiction over the same was vested in the State Corporation Commission, and it was its duty to exercise the same. On that appeal the cases of several cities and towns, involving practically the same questions, were heard together, and the Commission refused to take any jurisdiction whatever of them and dismissed the application of the appellee for an increase of rates on the ground that it could not approve rates within the corporate limits of such cities and towns in excess of those fixed by the respective franchises. This court affirmed the holding of the Commission as to franchise rates for franchise services, but in concluding its opinion said:

"For the foregoing reasons we find no error in the orders of the State Corporation Commission under review, save to the extent that they, without any investigation or consideration thereof, refuse approval of the rates filed with the Commission by the plaintiff in error which apply to services within the respective corporate limits of the defendants in error which are not attempted to be fixed or affected by the franchises involved in these cases. As to the latter rates, the Commission has jurisdiction under the statute of 1914, aforesaid, and it should assume such jurisdiction, make the investigation, and otherwise act with respect thereto in accordance with the provisions of the 1914 statute."

The powers and duties of the Commission under this decision were very plain. It was to ascertain whether or not the appellee was supplying any services within the corporate limits of the appellant which were not attempted to be fixed or affected by the franchise granted by the appellant, and, if so, to exercise jurisdiction over the same according to the provisions of the 1914 statute (Laws 1914, c. 340).

After the above-mentioned opinion was handed down, to wit, on April 7, 1920, the appellee filed its petition before the State Corporation Commission in which it undertook to set out the facts of the case and prayed that it might be permitted to withdraw in the city of Clifton Forge all service not required by the franchise granted by said city, or in lieu thereof that the Commission would determine what was an adequate and sufficient service in said city and fix just and reasonable rates for same. The city of Clifton Forge appeared by counsel and filed a lengthy plea to the jurisdiction of the Commission, the grounds of which will be more particularly noticed hereinafter. The appellee moved to strike out the plea. The Commission heard the case "upon the entire record and especially upon the said petition, the said plea, and motion to strike out, and the order of the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia," and struck out the plea, but refused to allow the appellee to withdraw the present service from the city of Clifton Forge. The Commission thereupon ordered:

That, so long as the appellee "renders an electric service within the city of Clifton Forge other than that required by the franchise agreement aforesaid, it shall keep on file with this Commission a schedule showing its rates, tolls, charges, rules, and regulations applicable to such service as required by law, and that until the further order of this Commission the said company shall, so long as it renders within the city limits of the city of Clifton Forge, the service now being rendered, charge uniformly therefor the rates as set out in its schedule filed with the Commission on March 20, 1918. But this order shall be without prejudice to the right of the city of Clifton Forge to require the Virginia-Western Power Company to reinstate the service required of it by the franchise agreement and at the rates therein specified for the franchise service."

From this order the present appeal was taken.

The chairman of the Commission, in an elaborate and able opinion copied into the record, maintained the jurisdiction of the Commission over the rates for services rendered in the city which were not covered by the franchise and rightly interpreted the mandate of this court in that respect.

Under the franchise, the predecessor in title of the appellee and its successor or assigns were granted the right—

"to conduct, maintain, and operate for a period of 15 years from the granting of this franchise an electric light system in, and for the said city and the citizens thereof. And the said company is hereby granted permission to conduct, erect, and maintain in the streets and alleys of the said city all poles and wires and other appliances and use such currents of electricity that may be necessary for it to operate its said system to light said city and supply the citizens thereof with electricity and from time to time make such repairs and alterations therein as may be considered necessary for the conduct of its business."

In consideration for the grant, the grantee agreed to pay the city $800, to furnish the city a specified number of arc lights at $50 each per annum, others in excess thereof at $40 each per annum, and to furnish incandescent lights to citizens at a scale of prices set forth in the franchise. As to the lights to be furnished to citizens, the franchise provides:

"Upon the completion of the said electric lighting system the said company shall furnish electric lights to all the citizens of said city who shall agree to take it and equip their houses with the necessary appliances therefor at all hours from sunset until sunrise, or as much earlier and as much later as weather conditions may make it necessary."

A few months after the franchise was granted the grantee thereof, without other consideration than has been stated, began to furnish a continuous day and night service for lighting, and also a like service for heat and power, and this service has thence hitherto been and is now being furnished. It was conceded before the Commission that the night and day service could not be so dissociated as to permit the Commission to regulate rates for the latter service while maintaining the contract rate for the former, and the city not only refused to assent to the abrogation of the day service, but insisted upon its maintenance without increase of rates. The Commission was of opinion and decided that the continuous day and night service of lighting was a new service differing from and not covered by the franchise, as was also the service of heat and power, and that it had jurisdiction to fix the rates therefor. Its order, however, was "without prejudice to the rights of the city of Clifton Forge to require the Virginia-Western Power Company to reinstate the service required of it by the franchise agreement and at the rates therein specified for the franchise service."

Nearly every question raised on this appeal was settled on the former appeal, which we have neither the power nor the inclination to disturb.

In the petition for appeal it is said that three questions are involved in the case. They will be stated and numbered as in the petition:

[1] 1. "Does the franchise of April 13, 1907, and the contract of March 4, 1911, cover both night and day service in the city of Clifton Forge?" A mere reading of the franchise hereinbefore copied would seem sufficient to show that it did not cover such service. The grantee was only required to furnish incandescent lights "at all hours from sunset to sunrise or as much earlier and as much later as weather conditions make it necessary." There was no undertaking for a daytime service, and the city could not demand it. The contract of March 14, 1911, as shown on its face, was a mere compromise agreement to settle a dispute between the city and the power company as to the right of the latter, under its franchise, to charge citizens a minimum rate of $1 for electrical services. It dealt with no other question connected with the franchise, and in no way affects the jurisdiction and power of the Commission over matters not covered by the franchise of April 13, 1907; nor was it a recognition that the franchise applied to both day and night service, nor a construction by the parties of any other feature of the franchise except the right to make a minimum charge under the franchise for the franchise service.

The occupation of the streets of the city by the poles and wires of the appellee was fully warranted by the franchise hereinbefore quoted. Sending the current along said wires in the day time, without objection from the city, did not subject the appellee to the franchise agreement for the night service.

As pointed out by the Commission, the continuous day and night service is an inseparable service and one that is essentially different from that provided for by the franchise, hence, under the very terms of our former decision, is subject to the jurisdiction of the Commission.

[2] 2. "Has the Virginia-Western Power Company by rendering a continuous service within the city of Clifton Forge for more than 10 years estopped itself from denying that the said franchise does cover all classes of service?" The poles and wires of the power company were already occupying the streets of the city under the terms of the franchise, and for the mutual benefit of the citizens and of the power company a daylight service and heat and power were furnished the citizens at the same rate at which the night service had been furnished, but there was no obligation on the power company to furnish it at that price, the city had no right to demand it, nor was the rate for that service fixed by the franchise. It is said in the opinion of the chairman of the Commission that the contention that the day service is covered by the franchise contract is based "upon the theory that the voluntary rendition by the company, over a period of years, of the day service has resulted in a contract by estoppel. We can find no authority, statutory or otherwise, in support of such a contention, and cannot agree that the police power of the state, as exercised through the Commission, the constitutional repository of that power, can be rendered ineffective by an estoppel in pais, effective, if at all, only upon the parties to the contract." We concur in the conclusion reached by the chairman.

[3] 3. "Has the State Corporation Commission jurisdiction to fix any rates to be charged the citizens of the city of Clifton Forge for any services rendered them by said company?" In the reply brief for the appellant the contention of the appellant under this head is put thus:

"The city further maintains that the General Assembly has not conferred upon the State Corporation Commission jurisdiction to consider and determine any rates to be charged for electric service rendered wholly within the corporate limits of the city."

[4] This contention was fully considered and answered adversely to the appellant on the former hearing of this case, and is not now subject to review. Steinman v. Clinchfield Coal Corp., 121 Va. 611, 93 S. E. 684. The city further insists:

"That, if the said act of 1914, as amended, be construed as giving the State Corporation Commission power to grant the right to use the streets, alleys, and other public property for the purpose of furnishing day electric service, when the city has granted no franchise for such service, said act is unconstitutional and void."

The use of the streets, alleys, and other public property for the purpose of furnishing day electric service has been in existence, without objection on the part of the city, for over 10 years, but no rate therefor has ever been fixed by any contract between the city and the power company. The Commission is not granting a use, but fixing a rate for a use already in existence and not covered by the franchise agreement. In this it was entirely within its powers. The reserved police power of the state and the manner of its exercise has been so fully considered and discussed in cases recently decided by this court that it is not deemed necessary to do more than refer to them. Virginia-Western Power Co. v. Clifton Forge, supra.; City of Richmond v. Ches. & Potomac Tel. Co., 127 Va. —, 105 S. E. 127.

The city further contends:

"That the record shows that the State Corporation Commission made no investigation as to the rates which it authorized to be charged the citizens of Clifton Forge and changed the same as fixed by franchise provisions without investigation and without an opportunity by the city to be heard."

This contention is fully answered by the Commission as follows:

"Under the provisions of the act of March 27, 1914, as amended (Acts 1913, c. 407), schedules of rates filed with the Commission by public utilities automatically become effective 30 days after filing unless suspended by the Commission upon its own motion or upon complaint of interested parties. The rates filed by the company on March 18, 1913, are not out of line with rates approved by the Commission in other communities in which the equipment in use and the operating conditions are substantially similar, and there appears to be no reason why the Commission, of its own motion, should suspend the rates as filed. No complaint has been filed with the Commission, and no representation made that said schedule of rates is 'unjust, unreasonable, unjustly discriminatory, or preferential,' and, the Commission having jurisdiction of such rates, the schedule filed with the Commission on March 18, 1913, is legally effective until changed in the manner prescribed by the statute."

[5, 6] The Commission had no power to change franchise rates for franchise services and did not attempt to do so. The power company had filed with the Commission in March, 1913, a schedule of rates for an entirely different service. This the Commission had power to change if, upon investigation, the rates were found to be unjust or unreasonable. The Commission does not initiate rates, but may alter schedules filed before it and fix and order substituted therefor such rates as it may deem just and reasonable. Code, c. 160. This it may do of its own motion, if it deems it proper, or on complaint of a proper party. In the case at bar the Commission made no investigation and no change because the rates filed "are not out of line with rates approved by the Commission in other communities in which the equipment in use and the operating conditions are substantially similar and there appears to be no reason why the Commission, of its own motion, should suspend the rates as filed," and there have been no complaints. The appellant is in no wise hurt, as it may at any time hereafter go before the Commission and make complaint that the rates are unjust and unreasonable, and, if the complaint is well founded, it will be the duty of the Commission to fix and order substituted for the rates filed such rates as shall be just and reasonable. Code, § 4071. This procedure gives the city ample opportunity to be heard as to the justness and reasonableness of the rates charged.

We find no error in the order of the State Corporation Commission, and it is accordingly affirmed.

Affirmed.

CITY OF RICHMOND v. CARNEAL et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 17, 1921.)

1. Constitutional law ⇨38—Constitutionality depends upon what may be done under statute.

The test of the validity of a statute claimed to be unconstitutional is, not merely what has been done under it, but what may be done under it.

2. Eminent domain ⇨66—Whether land is taken for a public use is a judicial question for the court.

The question of the necessity, propriety, or expediency of resorting to the exercise of the power of eminent domain is a legislative function, in the absence of a constitutional inhibition, but the question of what constitutes a "public use" within the rule that private property can be taken only for a "public use" is a judicial question to be decided by the courts, not as a matter of discretion, but in the exercise of sound judgment under all the facts and circumstances of a particular case.

3. Constitutional law ⇨52—Legislature cannot conclude constitutionality of its statutes.

The Legislature cannot conclude the constitutionality of its own enactments.

4. Eminent domain ⇨13—Private property can be taken only for public use.

Under the Constitution, the power of eminent domain is limited to the taking or damaging of private property for public use.

5. Eminent domain §19—Statute authorizing city to acquire land additional to that required for street held unconstitutional as authorizing the taking for other than a "public use."

Acts 1916, c. 71, in so far as it amends Acts 1906, c. 194 (Code 1919, § 3065, par. 2), authorizing city in street opening proceedings to acquire land in excess of that required and to replat and dispose of the excess in such manner as it may see fit, where such land is injuriously affected by the taking of a portion thereof for street purposes, held unconstitutional; the taking of such excess portion of the land not being for a "public use" within the Constitution limiting the taking or damaging of private property to a "public use."

Error to Hustings Court of Richmond.

Petition by the City of Richmond to condemn land, opposed by James D. Carneal and others. Petition dismissed as to a portion of the land sought to be taken, and the city brings error. Affirmed.

H. R. Pollard, of Richmond, for plaintiff in error.

J. Thomas Hewin, Jas. T. Carter, J. Samuel Parrish, D. C. O'Flaherty, and H. W. Goodwyn, all of Richmond, for defendants in error.

BURKS, J. The chief point involved in this case is the constitutionality of an act of assembly approved February 29, 1916, amending a previous act, relating to the opening and widening of streets by cities and towns. Acts 1916, pp. 112, 113. So much of the act as need be quoted is as follows:

"Any city or town in this commonwealth proposing to open or widen a street by taking any part of a block or square in such a manner that the value of the property abutting the proposed street, would be injuriously affected unless the property on such block or square is replatted and the property line readjusted, then and in that event the city or town * * * may * * * acquire by * * * condemnation * * * all or any part of the property on such squares or blocks and may subsequently replat and dispose of the property so acquired, in whole or in parts, making such limitations as to the uses thereof as it may see fit."

The city had annexed to its boundaries the town of Ginter Park, and under the decree of annexation was required to open a suitable and adequate highway from said town to the business center of the city. Pursuant to that decree, and by virtue of the authority of said act of assembly, the city by its constituted authorities petitioned the hustings court of the city to open a boulevard 80 feet wide between two designated points in the city as enlarged, and filed with its petition a map or diagram of the proposed boulevard showing the land proposed to be taken for the location of the boulevard, and also the land on each side thereof proposed to be taken. The petition states that the land proposed to be condemned is needed for the opening and maintenance of a public street. The map or diagram filed with the petition shows that the proposed boulevard is of a uniform width of 80 feet, with a parkway in the center, and that it cuts diagonally across one or more squares or blocks of the city, so that the residue of lots therein not taken for the boulevard would touch the said boulevard obliquely and not on perpendicular lines. In some instances it would take a large portion of the lot through which it runs, in others only a small portion. It is stated in the resolution of the city council directing the condemnation, and also in the petition, that the city council is of opinion that not to acquire all or parts of the proposed property on certain blocks, squares or lots, through which the said proposed street will pass, would render it impracticable, without extraordinary expense, to make the proposed improvements, and it was also of opinion that certain of the properties abutting on the strips or parcels of land so to be acquired for the opening of the said street would be injuriously affected in value unless the whole or certain parts of the property in such blocks or squares are replatted and the lines readjusted to the new proposed street lines. The map or plat shows distinctly not only the lines of the street or boulevard proposed to be taken, but also the land on each side thereof proposed to be taken. Certain of the proprietors of lands proposed to be taken appeared and moved to dismiss the city's petition on several grounds, but chiefly on the ground that the statute aforesaid and the ordinance of the city passed in pursuance thereof are unconstitutional and void in so far as they authorized the taking of the lands outside of the strip 80 feet wide which was to be used for the street, because the use to which they were to be applied was not a public use. The hustings court took this view of the case, and while it directed the establishment of the street or boulevard, of the uniform width of 80 feet as shown on the map or plat, it dismissed the petition as to the lands outside of said street or boulevard. To this order a writ of error was awarded by this court.

The ordinance of the city and also the petition cite and rely upon the act of February 29, 1916, as authority for the right to condemn the lands outside of the lines of said street or boulevard. It is obvious, therefore, that the determinative question in the case is the validity of the statute aforesaid.

The only evidence offered in the cause was the map aforesaid and the resolution of the city council, which were filed as exhibits with the petition, and which are also referred to by the commissioners who assessed the damages.

[1] We remark in limine that the test of the validity of the statute is not merely what has been done under it, but what may be done under it. Violett v. Alexandria, 92 Va. 561, 23 S. E. 909, 31 L. R. A. 382, 53 Am. St. Rep. 825.

Under the act above quoted, if the proposed street takes only a small portion of a lot, leaving the owner's dwelling or place of business, or both, untouched, the city may nevertheless take the residue also, if the other conditions mentioned in the act exist, and the statement in the brief of counsel for J. D. Carneal is that just this condition exists in the instant case. That statement is that—

"The street or parkway cuts off a little corner of his lot; outside of that is a house, which is a home and a place of business, where the owner has been for 30 or 40 years."

So that the question presented for consideration is not merely what is possible under the act, but what is actually proposed to be done under it. We must consider, therefore, whether the taking of such residue, not needed for the street, is a taking for a public use.

The statute requires the petition to state the object for which the condemnation is asked. Code, § 3464. The petition in this case states the object as "the opening and maintenance of a public street." The opening of a public street is recognized everywhere as a public use, and the taking is not resisted as to so much of the land as is needed for the street. It is resisted only as to what is termed the "excess condemnation." As to the taking for the purpose of "maintenance of a public street," we know of no law to warrant it.

It has been urged upon us that "forward looking legislation has broadened state control over private property to meet social needs, and that the courts have likewise advanced, in sustaining the broadening legislation," and that within the last half century there has been a continued movement toward the enlargement of the powers of municipal corporations. Amongst other illustrations given are condemnations for public parks, boulevards and pleasure drives, public baths, playgrounds, libraries, museums, and the like, and even for æsthetic purposes. No such use is proposed in the present case, and it is beside the mark to discuss it. What is here proposed is to condemn land not needed for the street, replot it and sell it to others, presumably at a profit as no reason is assigned for the "excess condemnation," except that the city council is of opinion "that not to acquire all, or parts of the property on certain blocks, squares or lots, through which the said proposed street will pass, would render it impracticable, without extraordinary expense, to make the proposed improvement." The lot owners are no more concerned than other taxpayers of the city with the cost of opening the street, but they have the right to insist that their property adjacent to the street shall not be taken from them and sold at a profit, either to pay or to reduce the expense of opening the street. Such a transaction may be good financing on the part of the city, and greatly to its benefit, but such use of private property is not a public use. "Public use" and "public benefit" are not synonymous terms.

Counsel for the city has been affluent in his citation of cases and text-books on the subject of "public use," and some of the cases thought by him to be most apposite will be hereinafter noticed, but none of them has gone to the extent here claimed. There have been a number of decisions in this state on the subject of what constitutes a public use, some of them of recent date, and while none of them involved the precise point now before us, they throw sufficient light upon the subject to guide us to a sound conclusion. We shall consider these first.

[2, 3] While the question of the necessity, propriety, or expediency of resorting to the exercise of the power of eminent domain is a legislative function, in the absence of a constitutional inhibition (Zircle v. Southern Ry. Co., 102 Va. 17, 45 S. E. 802, 102 Am. St. Rep. 806), what constitutes a "public use" is a judicial question to be decided by the courts. The Legislature is forbidden to enact "any law whereby private property shall be taken or damaged for public uses, without just compensation," which in effect carries out the fundamental law of England and America that private property cannot be taken for private use, with or without compensation, but can only be taken for a public use. This inhibition, like other constitutional provisions, it is the duty of the courts to enforce. The Legislature cannot conclude the constitutionality of its own enactments. Miller v. Pulaski, 109 Va. 137, 63 S. E. 880, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 552; Jeter v. Vinton-Water Co., 114 Va. 769, 76 S. E. 921, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 1029; Boyd v. Ritter Lumber Co., 119 Va. 348, 80 S. E. 273, L. R. A. 1917A, 94.

In Roanoke City v. Berkowitz, 80 Va. 616, 622, this court referring to the general statute on eminent domain which required the condemnation of the fee, and which was attacked as repugnant to the Constitution, said:

"The Constitution imposes no other limitation on the power of the Legislature in this particular than that contained in the clause which forbids the taking of private property for public use without just compensation; and the authorities all agree that under a general statute, like the one in question, no more can be rightfully taken, without the owner's consent, than the necessity of the case requires.

Thus, where a part only of a man's land is needed for a court house or other public purpose, the necessity for the appropriation of that part will not justify the taking of the whole against his will, even though compensation be made therefor."

In Fallsburg v. Alexander, 101 Va. 98, 43 S. E. 194, 61 L. R. A. 129, 99 Am. St. Rep. 855, the subject of "public use" is carefully considered and many authorities are cited to support the conclusion of the court, which is expressed in paragraph 2 of the syllabus as follows:

"A use to be public must be fixed and definite. It must be one in which the public, as such, has an interest, and the terms and manner of its enjoyment must be within the control of the state, independent of the rights of the private owner of the property appropriated to the use. The use of property cannot be said to be public if it can be gainsaid, denied, or withdrawn by the owner. The public interest must dominate the private gain."

In the course of the opinion Cooley's Constitutional Limitations is cited with approval, for the statement that "the public use implies a possession, occupation and enjoyment of the land by the public at large, or by public agencies; and the due protection of the rights of private property will preclude the government from seizing it in the hands of the owners and turning it over to another on vague grounds of public benefit to spring from a more profitable use to which the latter may devote it" (italics supplied); and section 165 of Lewis on Eminent Domain, for the statement that "'public use' means the same as use by the public, and this, it seems to us, is the construction the words should receive in the constitutional provision in question."

In Miller v. Pulaski, 109 Va. 137, 63 S. E. 880, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 552, the subject of "public use" is again discussed, and the powers and duties of the Legislature and of the courts, respectively, are defined, and it was held that an act which authorizes a town to condemn land for the purpose of supplying the inhabitants of said town "or other persons, companies or corporations" with electric lights or power embraces an object which is constitutional with one which is unconstitutional, and where they are so united as to be inseparable, the whole grant of power is unconstitutional, and that the right to furnish lights or power to "other persons, companies or corporations" is a private use, and where a private use is so combined with the public use that the two cannot be separated, the whole act is void.

The subject of "public use" is also discussed at length and a similar conclusion reached in Jeter v. Vinton-Roanoke Water Co., 114 Va. 769, 76 S. E. 921, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 1029.

In Boyd v. Ritter Lumber Co., 119 Va. 348, 89 S. E. 273, L. R. A. 1917A, 94, many of the previous cases in this state, as well as cases from other states, are reviewed, and the conclusions stated is that "public use" means a use by the public, and that whether a particular use is public or not is a question for the judiciary and not for the Legislature, and that the Legislature cannot make a private use public by calling it so, in order to justify the exercise of the power of eminent domain. The opinion quotes with approval from Bloodgood v. Mohawk, 18 Wend. (N. Y.) 9, 31 Am. Dec. 313, as follows:

"When we depart from the natural import of the term 'public use' and substitute for the simple idea of a public possession and occupation, that of public utility, public interest, common benefit, general advantage, or convenience, or that still more indefinite term 'public improvement' is there any limitation which can be set to the exertion of legislative will in the appropriation of private property? The moment the mode of its use is disregarded and we permit ourselves to be governed by speculations, upon the benefits that may result to localities from the use which a man or set of men propose to make of the property of another, that moment we are afloat without any certain principle to guide us. * * *

"Mr. Lewis, in discussing this identical proposition in section 165, after giving a history of the earlier decisions, concludes as follows:

"Public use means the same as use by the public, and this, it seems to us, is the construction the words should receive in the constitutional provision in question. The reasons which incline us to this view are:

"First, that it accords with the primary and more commonly understood meaning of the words; second, it accords with the general practice in regard to taking private property for public use in vogue when the phrase was first brought into use in the earlier Constitutions; third, it is the only view which gives the words any force as a limitation, or renders them capable of any definite and practical application. If the Constitution means that private property can be taken only for use by the public, it affords a definite guide to both the Legislature and the courts."

In School Board v. Alexander, 126 Va. 407, 412, 413, 101 S. E. 349, 851, it is said:

"The taking of private property, however, is a matter of serious import and is not to be permitted except where the right is plainly conferred and the manner of its exercise has been strictly followed. There must be no doubt or uncertainty about the existence of the power. If it is not plainly conferred it does not exist. The state may grant the power generally to condemn any property for a public use, or it may place such restrictions upon the power, the manner of its exercise or the character of the property, that may or may not be taken as it pleases, and when such restrictions are imposed they must be obeyed. If the limitations or restrictions imposed involve public convenience, or retard the progress of public improvements, the remedy is an appeal to the Legislature. They cannot be removed by judicial construction. The courts cannot enlarge a power which the Legislature has restricted. Charlottesville v. Maury, 96 Va. 383, 31 S. E. 520; A. & F. R. Co. v. A. & W. R. Co., 75 Va. 780, 40 Am. Rep. 743. It is said that, in the construction of statutes conferring the power of eminent domain, every reasonable doubt is to be solved adversely to the right; that the affirmative must be shown, as silence is negation; and that unless both the spirit and letter of the statute clearly confer the power, it cannot be exercised. Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U. S. 659, 666, 24 L. Ed. 1036; Providence, etc., R. Co. v. Petitioner, 17 R. I. 324, 21 Atl. 935, 972; Ligare v. Chicago, 139 Ill. 46, 28 N. E. 934, 32 Am. St. Rep. 179."

[4] We have no disposition to curtail or embarrass the exercise of the power of eminent domain in proper cases, even if we had the power to do so; but the remedy is a drastic one and its application is restrained by the Constitution to those cases where the taking or damaging of private property is for "public use." What is a "public use" is not a matter of discretion with the courts, but is one of sound judgment, under all the facts and circumstances of the particular case. Different courts sometimes arrive at different conclusions upon the same state of facts; but, whenever the remedy is applied, it should always be because there is a direct "public use" of the property taken, and not a mere incidental or indirect public benefit.

We have not been referred to, nor have we found, any case directly in point which upholds the contention of the city. The case of State ex rel., etc., v. Houghton, 144 Minn. 1, 176 N. W. 159, 8 A. L. R. 585, much relied on by counsel for the city, involved the validity of a statute creating restricted residence districts in cities of the first class. The districts were established by the exercise of the power of eminent domain, and apartment houses, among other classes of buildings, were prohibited therein. It was held that the restrictions, as applied to apartment houses, were based upon a "public use," and that the statute providing for condemnation was valid. Upon the first hearing the statute was held to be invalid (see 144 Minn. 1, 174 N. W. 885), the court being divided three to two; but upon a rehearing the former decision was reversed, the court against standing three to two.

The decision is rested largely on aesthetic grounds, and while we do not dissent from much that is said about the expansion and application of the term "public use," the majority holding is of no value to us in arriving at a proper conclusion upon the facts of this case, which are entirely different from the facts in that case.

In the petition for the writ of error it is said:

"For a case which is practically on all fours with the one in judgment, your petitioner cites with great confidence the case of Bond v. Mayor, etc., of Balto, 116 Md. 683," 82 Atl. 978.

Section 1 of the act there under review (Acts 1910, c. 110) gave the termini of the highway to be constructed, and authorized the city to "acquire for said purposes landed or other property in the bed of said highway and adjacent thereto on either or both sides thereof." In another section of the act it was provided:

"That any landed or other property acquired under the provisions of this act, excepting lands lying in the bed of said highway, may, after said highway has been laid out, be sold by the mayor and city council of Baltimore or said commission, if power to make such sales be, as it may be, delegated by ordinance to said commission, for such prices, at such times and on such terms as may by ordinance be provided." Section 4.

The court held that the words, "landed or other property acquired," mentioned in other sections than section 1, manifestly refer and relate to landed or other property acquired for the purposes set forth in section one; that it clearly appears that the purpose for which the land is to be acquired is that of construction of the public improvement. In other words, that the land could only be acquired for the purpose of constructing the highway, and the court says that the validity of the power to acquire land adjacent to the highway on either or both sides thereof, incident to and for the purpose of constructing the highway and its connections, has uniformly been upheld by the courts. This is far from being on all fours with the case at bar. It is further said in the opinion in that case that—

"It cannot be assumed in this case that the city will undertake to condemn or take property for purposes other than those authorized by the act. The presumption is that the city will act within its rights and not beyond them. It will be time enough to pass upon this question when it properly arises before us."

In the case at bar, not only are we dealing with a statute under which "excess condemnation" is permitted, but are also confronted with a case in which the city is attempting to take from the owner his private property which confessedly is not needed for the proposed new street. The case cited cannot be accepted by this court as authority for the contention of the city in this case.

The cases from Massachusetts are more in accord with our views. In the business part of the city of Boston certain of the streets were narrow, nonparallel, and of tortuous nature, and there were a great number of small sized and irregular shaped individual estates abutting on these streets, and under the existing statutes facilities could not be furnished for laying out and constructing new thoroughfares or streets and the sale or lease of such odd parcels or remnants of land as might be left in the hands of the public authorities if proper streets were laid out under the existing statutes. The city was anxious to provide broad and convenient thoroughfares for the transportation of goods and merchandise, and for the existence upon such thoroughfares of sites adequate in size and means of access, both front and rear, for the construction and use of warehouses, mercantile establishments, and other buildings suited to the needs of trade and commerce as then carried on in the principal cities of other states and countries. The House of Representatives thereupon applied to the Supreme Judicial Court to know whether the Legislature could authorize the city to exercise the right of eminent domain in connection with laying out proper streets and taking land adjoining outside of the proposed thoroughfares, with a view to conveying and leasing it to private individuals who might promote trade and manufacturing by the erection of suitable buildings on the land. This question the court answered in the negative, saying in part:

"The proposed legislation to which the inquiry relates, necessarily would contemplate action by the city in the procurement, management and control of land along a street within the city, for no other purpose than to induce and promote a use of it by merchants or traders. It would contemplate a taking of private property in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, and an expenditure of money to pay for it and fit it for occupation.

"It is a rule of law universally recognized in this country, that neither of these things can be done unless the taking or expenditure is for a public use. This has been stated so often, and the principles on which it is founded have been considered so fully, that it is unnecessary to discuss it or to cite authorities. The only question about which there is a possibility of doubt is whether the proposed use of the land outside of the thoroughfare is a public use. It is plain that a use of the property to obtain the possible income or profit that might enure to the city from the ownership and control of it would not be a public use. The city cannot be authorized to take the property of a private owner for such a purpose, nor can the city tax its inhabitants to obtain money for such a use. It could as well tax them to raise money to carry on any other private business with a hope of gain. Such proceedings are entirely outside the functions of a state or of any subdivision of a state."

After discussing the authorities to sustain the foregoing views, the court said further:

"An affirmative answer to this question would make it possible for the city to take the home of a resident near the line of the thoroughfare, or the shop of a humble tradesman, and compel him to give up his property and go elsewhere, for no other reason than that, in the opinion of the authorities of the city, some other use of the land would be more profitable, and therefore would better promote the prosperity of the citizens generally. We know of no case in which the exercise of the right of eminent domain or the expenditure of public money has been justified on such grounds." Opinion of Justices, 204 Mass. 607, 91 N. E. 405, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 483.

This opinion was given March 4, 1910. Subsequently, the Senate propounded to the same court questions which the court says "differ but little in substance" from those previously propounded by the House of Representatives. To the latter questions the court replied on April 10, 1910, and it is said in the petition in the instant case that this last reply "modified in no small degree the holding in the former opinion," and there is vouched in support of that conclusion a part of a sentence in the first syllabus of the case. No such conclusion can be properly drawn from the second opinion. The syllabus to the second opinion is fully sustained by the opinion, and in its integrity is as follows:

"It is not within the power of the Legislature, in connection with the widening of a highway or the laying out of a new highway in the city of Boston, to authorize that city to take by right of eminent domain real estate in excess of those parcels which in whole or in part are necessary for the highway itself, with a view to the subsequent sale by the city of such excess of real estate at its full value subject to restrictions or conditions designed to promote the commercial and industrial welfare or growth of the municipality by insuring an opportunity for the construction along such highway of buildings adapted to the requirements of commerce, trade and industry and especially to the requirements of those forms of business which to a large extent employ teaming, thereby relieving, or helping to prevent the increase of, congestion of teaming traffic and so facilitating the transportation of freight and passengers through the section of the city in which such highway is to be widened or laid out.

"Although the Legislature cannot authorize a city or town to take land outside a public work for the purpose of selling it, there may be, as contemplated by St. 1904, c. 443, § 6, a remnant of an estate, of which the greater part necessarily is taken for the public purpose, which is so small or of such a shape and of so little value that the taking of it in the interest of public economy or utility, or in some other public interest, may be fairly incidental to and reasonably necessary in connection with the taking of the greater portion of the land for the public work; but this exception cannot be extended so as to permit the taking of land outside the public work with a view to its sale afterwards in violation of the limitation of power stated above."

In a still more recent case, decided June 21, 1913, it was held that private property cannot be taken ostensibly for a public use and then diverted to a private use, and that legislation so designed or framed as to permit such a result is invalid. Sallsbury Land & Imp. Co. v. Commonwealth, 215 Mass. 371, 102 N. E. 619, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1196.

[5] We deem it unnecessary to cite further authorities. We concur with the judge of the hustings court of the city of Richmond that so much of the act of assembly, approved February 29, 1918, found in Acts of 1916 at pages 112, 113, as is an amendment of the act of assembly approved March 14, 1906, found in Acts of 1906, at page 317—said amendment now constituting the second and last paragraph of section 3065 of the Code—is unconstitutional, null, and void, and so much of the joint resolutions of the council of the city of Richmond, approved March 5, 1919, as was adopted in pursuance of said amendment, is likewise invalid.

In the order made by the hustings court in this cause, it is ordered:

"That the title to the several parcels of land for which such compensation and damages were allowed be and the same is hereby absolutely vested in the city of Richmond in fee simple."

The record does not disclose, and we have no means of knowing, whether or not the order applies to land outside of the lines of the proposed new street. If it does, the said order should be amended by said hustings court, in which the cause is still pending, as to the land lying outside of the lines of said street.

Affirmed.

KELLY, P., absent.

(83 W. Va. 173)

HALE et al. v. GROW et al. (No. 4110.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 8, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Attachment \S 103—Affidavit disclosing elements of claim which would suffice in declaration or bill held sufficient.

A statement of the nature of the plaintiff's claim in an affidavit filed for an attachment, which makes such a disclosure of its elements as would suffice in a declaration or bill setting it up, is sufficient.

2. Attachment \S 116—Defendant's title need not be stated in affidavit as fully as is necessary in a pleading.

The defendant's title to property need not be stated as fully nor with the same degree of accuracy, in such a statement or a pleading filed by the plaintiff, as would be required in setting it up, if it were the title of the plaintiff, because the character of the title of the defendant lies peculiarly within his own knowledge.

3. Attachment \S 116—Affidavit held sufficient as against assignee of lease in attachment for rentals.

In an affidavit for an attachment against an assignee of a lease, for rentals accrued under the terms thereof, and in a bill in equity filed in the suit in which the affidavit was filed, it suffices, as to the assignment required by law to be effected by deed, to state and allege that the lease had been assigned and conveyed to the defendant.

4. Attachment \S 105—Affidavit for attachment in equity held not vitiated on ground of departure from statute.

An affidavit for an attachment filed in a suit in equity against a real debtor and others who are merely formal defendants is not vitiated, on the ground of departure from statutory terms, or omission thereof, by the use of the words "that in said suit the plaintiffs, as affiant verily believes, are justly entitled to recover, at the least, against the defendant [naming the debtor], the said sum" demanded, specifying the amount thereof.

5. Landlord and tenant \S 208(2)—Assignee liable for rent, though not in possession.

An assignee of a lease in which there is a covenant to pay the lessor rent, in specified amounts, at stated periods, assumes the obligations imposed by such covenant, and is liable for the rent, even though he has not entered into possession of the leased premises, unless he was prevented from so doing by the lessor.

6. Mines and minerals \S 55(2)—Clause in deed held exception of title to minerals in place.

A clause in a deed conveying a tract of land, which, in terms, reserves the right to all oil, coal and other minerals taken from the land, with the privilege of entering thereon and obtaining the same and binds the grantor to pay to the grantee, as rental, one-tenth of such minerals, if any should be obtained, constitutes an exception and retention of the title to minerals in place.

7. Landlord and tenant \S 80½—Proof of assignment in writing under seal makes a prima facie case of assignment by deed.

Proof that an assignment of a lease was effected by the execution of an instrument of writing under seal makes out a prima facie case of assignment thereof by deed.

8. Evidence \S 368(12)—Failure to produce instrument held to raise presumption that paper exists.

If the party against whom such case is so made out in litigation presumptively has such instrument in his possession and does not deny possession thereof nor produce it, upon demand therefor, these circumstances raise a presumption that it is such a paper as is described in the evidence.

9. Landlord and tenant \S 232—That remote assignment may be defective held not to authorize denial of relief for failure of consideration.

If, in an action or suit against an assignee of a lease, to recover rent accrued to the leasor on a covenant therein, it appears that a remote assignment thereof may be defective and insufficient as to an undivided half thereof, recovery cannot be denied on the ground of total failure of consideration, and, if partial failure of consideration has not been set up and relied upon in the defensive pleadings, as a ground of defense, the judgment or decree should be for the entire amount of the rent accrued.

10. Limitation of actions §24(2)—Five-year statute inapplicable to demand for rents against assignee of written lease.

To a demand against an assignee of a written lease, for rent accrued thereon, the 5-year statute of limitations is inapplicable.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wirt County.

Suit by B. T. Hale and others against O. E. Grow and others. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

William Beard, of Parkersburg, for appellants.

L. N. Tavenner, of Parkersburg, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. On the ground of nonresidence of the principal defendant, this suit in equity with an attachment was instituted and prosecuted to a final decree for the sum of $1,168.80, which is a lien upon the leasehold interests in five several tracts of land, and certain personal property located thereon, by virtue of the levy of the attachment issued in this cause, on that property. Said leaseholds are oil and gas properties and the personal property involved consists of machinery and materials used in oil and gas operations. The money demand sued for consists of rentals alleged to have accrued on one of the leases, at the rate of $120 per year, payable quarterly, in a period of more than six years. The five leases levied on include the one under which the rentals sued for are alleged to have accrued. The two general assignments of error found in the petition are based upon the overruling of a motion to quash the attachment and the final decree. Lack of a sufficient statement of the cause of action and departure from statutory requirements are asserted in the attack upon the sufficiency of the affidavit. Under the other assignment, it is urged that the demurrer to the bill should have been sustained, and also that the evidence adduced does not prove any cause of action.

A motion to quash the attachment on the ground of insufficiency of the affidavit, made by G. N. Grow, principal defendant, on a special appearance, was overruled. A year or two later he died, and the cause was revived against Geo. C. Grow and Otis E. Grow, executors of his will. They interposed a demurrer to the bill, which was overruled, and filed an answer.

The affidavit for the attachment states, in substance, that the claim of the plaintiffs is for recovery of rentals for oil rights and rights to operate for oil on a tract of 46½ acres of land, which is sufficiently described; that it is based upon a lease executed January 7, 1902, executed by B. T. Hale and wife, Emily Keys and husband, Anna C. Miller and husband, and J. C. Hale and wife, by which the tract of land was demised and let to Stuart and Young, in consideration of the payment of certain moneys and their agreements to be kept and performed, one of which was that they would pay to the lessors, quarterly in advance, the sum of $30 beginning with the 1st day of January, 1902; that, by virtue of the last will and testament of J. C. Hale, Mamie S. Hale had succeeded to all of his rights; that Stuart and Young, by certain deed, had assigned and conveyed all of their rights, titles, and interests in the agreement and the land to Henry W. Brown; that Brown had conveyed away certain interests to William C. Edwards, H. H. Burns, and H. J. Parker; and that afterwards, Brown, Parker, Edwards, and Burns had "assigned and conveyed" all of their rights and interests in the agreement to the defendant G. N. Grow; that Grow had agreed for the use and benefit of the plaintiffs and thereby became, and had been, and was, liable to pay to the plaintiffs said sum of $30 quarterly in advance; that the claim sued for was for quarterly payments for the years 1910, 1911, 1912, 1913, 1914, 1915, and three quarters of 1916, with interest on all of such payments, as they became due under the terms of the lease; and that the plaintiffs were "justly entitled to recover, at the least, against the defendant G. N. Grow," the sum of $972.60, with interest thereon from the 1st day of August, 1916. Other persons against whom no demand is set up were made codefendants with Grow, on account of their relation to the lease and the rentals sued for.

[1-3] Failure of the affidavit to state that the lease was assigned by a deed, relied upon as the principal ground of criticism and objection, does not vitiate it. The nature of the cause of action need not be set forth in an affidavit for an attachment with a greater degree of strictness or certainty than is required in a pleading, nor with the extremely high degree of certainty required in the statement of the grounds of attachment. The statute requires mere disclosure of the "nature" of the claim. Some of our decisions require such a statement as discloses a cause of action. Sommers v. Allen, 44 W. Va. 120, 28 S. E. 787; Home Distilling Co. v. Himmel, 74 W. Va. 756, 82 S. E. 1094; Eplin v. Blessing, 73 W. Va. 283, 80 S. E. 458. Others do not go even that far. Hudkins v. Haskins, 22 W. Va. 645; McCluny v. Jackson, 6 Grat. (Va.) 96. In its requirements as to the statement of facts in support of the ground of attachment, however, the statute is much more rigid and exacting. The facts stated must conclusively show existence of the ground set up. The statement must be certain to a certain intent in particular, and exclude every hypothesis inconsistent with such ground. Teter v. George, 103 S. E. 275. Though some of the decisions above referred to require disclosure of a cause of action, they do not require such disclosure in any particular or formal manner, nor with the detail of particulars characteristic of a pleading. In Sommers v. Allen, cited, the first case in which anything more than a general and indefinite statement was required, Judge Brannon impliedly said "mere details" need not be stated. Here there is no omission of the necessary element of assignment. It is positively stated and the manner of it is indicated by the word "conveyed," which is equivalent in law to the word "granted." Uhl v. Ohio River R. Co., 51 W. Va. 106, 114, 41 S. E. 340. If this were an allegation of the plaintiff's title in a pleading, it might not suffice, but, if it were an allegation of the defendant's, it would. The omission of the manner of the assignment is justified by the fact that the character of the assignment lies peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendant. Andrews' Stephen's Pl. p. 353, citing numerous authorities. As the statement of the assignment in the affidavit would suffice in a pleading in a court of law, it suffices in the affidavit.

[4] There is no actual nor logical departure from the language of the statute, in the part of the affidavit that relates to the amount of the claim. It uses the statutory terms "justly entitled" and "at the least" in the assertion of right to recover and in description of the amount of the claim. Though it omits the word "amount," it is necessarily implied in the statement of the amount. In its limitation of liability to G. N. Grow, one of the several defendants, there is no departure from the statute, and the limitation conforms to the cause of action described in the affidavit, which states no ground of liability against any of the other defendants who were made formal parties, on account of their connection with the lease and the assignment thereof.

Lack of an allegation that the assignment of the lease was by deed is one of the grounds of demurrer to the bill, which charges that it was "assigned, granted, transferred, and conveyed" to Grow, after having alleged that the records of the county in which the lands are do not show any conveyance to him from his alleged assignors. A conclusion already stated, respecting the affidavit, makes this ground untenable.

[5] If there was such a lease and such an assignment as the bill sets up, omission of an allegation of possession of the premises by the assignee is immaterial. Nor does it matter whether the promise alleged was made for the sole benefit of the plaintiffs. A single legal proposition obliterates the contentions in argument based upon the omission and the supposed lack of soleness of benefit. "A person who accepts an oil or gas lease with a stipulation therein contained to pay a monthly rental until a well is completed or until the expiration of a certain fixed term is bound to pay such rental, although he does not within such term enter upon the land and complete such well, unless he was prevented from doing so by the plaintiffs, and not by mere personal default." Lawson v. Kirchner, 50 W. Va. 344, pt. 3, syl. 40 S. E. 344. See, also, the numerous cases cited in Archer, Oil and Gas, p. 364, applying the principle to assignees of oil and gas leases. As there is no proof of possession of the land embraced by the lease in question, on the part of the assignee, these contentions are renewed and repeated in the assault upon the decree, and in that connection they are equally unavailing. These authorities impose liability on the ground of acceptance of an assignment of the lease, by the assignee, not on his express agreement to pay rent, wherefore it is not necessary to say whether the promise to pay was made for the sole benefit of the plaintiffs.

Correctness of the decision of the issue raised by the pleadings, as settled by the court below, is challenged on several grounds, the principal of which are: That the plaintiffs had no title to the subject-matter of the lease; that the lease was not assigned to Grow by deed; that it had not been validly assigned by Stuart and Young to Brown, because Young alone, one member of the firm, had executed the deed of assignment, professing to act under a power of attorney from Young; and that part of the claim was barred by the statute of limitations.

[6] The plaintiffs claim the title to the minerals in the land, under an exception or reservation in a deed from their ancestors, Joseph W. Hale and his wife, to Jas. V. Nutter, conveying the land, subject to the reserved or excepted mineral right. The clause under which title is so claimed reads:

"The said parties of the first part expressly reserve, however, the right to all oil, coal or other minerals pumped or excavated from the land herein conveyed, with the privilege of working upon said land for the purpose of obtaining such oil or minerals, the right of ingress and egress to and from the portion of said land necessarily occupied by such mining or pumping, paying therefor as rental to the second party the one-tenth part of all such oil, coal or other minerals, if any should be obtained."

Notwithstanding inconsistent expressions, importing intent only to reserve minerals after severance thereof and to pay a royalty to the grantee in the deed, as in the case of landlord and tenant, the intention of the parties to except the minerals is reasonably clear. The right to all oil, coal, and other minerals is expressly reserved. Obviously, "right" may mean title. With this right, the privilege of taking out the minerals was retained. Reservation of right to take out all of the minerals negatives intent to retain a mere mining privilege to be enjoyed with the grantee also mining as owner. If it were a lease, it would be assignable, and a lease of the minerals by the lessee to a third party would confer a right and constitute consideration for an obligation to pay rent. But it does not purport to be a reservation of a term in the land or minerals. There is no time limit in it. The provision conferring right to one-tenth of the minerals, upon the grantee, may be a grant thereof or a stipulation for compensation. It does not necessarily import intention to make the parties landlord and tenant. Conferring unlimited right to take out all of the minerals and absolute title to at least nine-tenths of them, the clause falls within the principle enunciated in Higgins v. Round Bottom Coal Co., 63 W. Va. 218, 59 S. E. 1064, and List v. Cotts, 4 W. Va. 543, and retains title to minerals in place.

[7, 8] There is oral evidence tending to prove that the assignment to Grow was made by an instrument under seal. Ordinarily, such an instrument purporting to pass title to a term for years in land is a deed, wherefore this evidence makes out a prima facie case of assignment by deed, which the defendants have not rebutted by production of the instrument. There is no denial in evidence that they have it, nor any specific denial of its existence in the answer. Their failure to produce it raises a presumption that, if produced, it would be an instrument under seal. Stout v. Sands, 56 W. Va. 663, 49 S. E. 428.

[9] The assignment from Stuart and Young to Brown bears date December 4, 1902. It carried other leases of adjoining land, as did the assignment to Grow. Mining operations seem to have been conducted on two of the leases, when Grow got them in 1900, since which date they have continued. At no time from 1902 until now has Stuart ever raised any question about the disposition of his interest in these properties. For a period of about 14 years, he had acquiesced in it, before the institution of this suit, and continues to do so. During about 5 years of that period, mining operations were conducted on some of the leases, under the assignment. The power of attorney under which Young executed the assignment has not been produced for some reason. It is unnecessary to inquire whether failure to produce it would limit the relief sought by the plaintiffs, if its absence had been relied upon in the answer. The deed executed by Young passed his interest in the leases, wherefore there could not have been a total failure of consideration. Gaffney v. Stowers, 73 W. Va. 420, 80 S. E. 501. The defect, if any, would have afforded ground only for abatement or reduction of the rentals, for which no basis was laid in the answer. In it there is not even a specific denial of authority in Young to execute the deed on behalf of Stuart. To make the defect in title available as partial failure of consideration, it was necessary to plead it and rely upon it by way of defense. Gaffney v. Stowers, cited. Moreover, if such defense had been made, the power of attorney might have been found and put into the record.

[10] As the demand asserted by the plaintiffs accrued under the stipulations of the lease, a written instrument, the 5-year statute of limitations does not apply, and the plaintiffs were entitled to a decree for the entire amount claimed, right of action for all of which had accrued within 10 years before this suit was instituted.

Seeing no error in the decree, we will affirm it.

HECK v. MORGAN et al. (No. 4174.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 1, 1921.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Acknowledgment ¶4—Conveyance of realty need not be acknowledged except in case of married woman.

It is not necessary to the validity of a conveyance of real estate that the same be acknowledged, except in the case of a married woman, and if a grantor under no disability signs, seals, and delivers a deed without acknowledgment, it will be effective between the parties to pass his title.

2. Deeds ¶208(3)—Possession by grantee is prima facie evidence of delivery.

Possession by the grantee of a deed or instrument conveying an interest in real estate is prima facie evidence of its delivery.

3. Deeds ¶60—Deed to realty cannot be delivered to grantee in escrow.

A deed or other instrument conveying an interest in real estate cannot be delivered to the grantee in escrow. A delivery to him, even though stipulated to be upon certain conditions, will be treated as an absolute delivery.

4. Escrows ¶3—Deed cannot be delivered to grantee's agent to procure it.

A deed cannot be delivered in escrow to the agent of the grantee, who is charged by his principal with the particular duty of securing it, and who represents the principal in the particular transaction resulting in the deed. The conditional acceptance of the deed by such an agent under such circumstances is inconsistent with his duty to his principal.

5. Deeds ¶56(7)—Return of deed by grantee to grantor for acknowledgment not a surrender of title.

Where the grantee in a deed returns it to the grantor for the purpose of having it acknowledged, he does not thereby surrender the title acquired by the deed.

6. Vendor and purchaser ¶229(1)—Law imputes information which would be conveyed by actual viewing of premises.

The law imputes to a purchaser of real estate, or an interest in real estate, all information which would be conveyed to him by an actual view of the premises.

7. Mines and minerals ¶81 — Possession of lessee under unrecorded oil and gas lease is notice to subsequent lessee.

Where the lessee in, an unrecorded oil and gas lease enters upon the premises, locates a well, and employs a force of men thereon in the building and construction of roads leading from the highway to such location, which roads and the work being done upon such premises by said lessee could be for no other reasonable purpose than the development of said premises for oil and gas, such lessee is in possession under his lease, and such possession will be notice to a subsequent lessee of his claim to the oil and gas in the lands.

8. Vendor and purchaser ¶235 — Rights of grantee under unrecorded deed not subordinate to rights of subsequent grantee with notice who has not paid price.

The rights of a grantee under an unrecorded deed are not subordinate to the rights of a subsequent grantee from the same grantor of the same land, where it appears that such subsequent grantee, at the time he becomes fully informed of the prior grantee's rights, has not paid the purchase money. He is not a complete purchaser, and his rights are subordinate to the rights of the first grantee.

9. Equity ¶65(3)—When maxim that "He who comes into equity must come with clean hands" affects right to sue stated.

The maxim "He who comes into equity must come with clean hands" does not deprive a suitor of a right to appeal to a court of equity on account of general iniquitous conduct, unconnected with the act of the defendant, which the complaining party sets up as his ground or cause of action, but only when the evil practices and wrongful conduct pertain to the particular matter or transaction in respect to which judicial protection or redress is sought.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Roane County.

Suit by A. S. Heck against O. B. Morgan and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

R. E. Bills, of Parkersburg, and Thos. P. Ryan, of Spencer, for appellants.

Walter Pendleton and S. P. Bell, both of Grantsville, for appellee.

RITZ, P. The defendant O. B. Morgan is the owner of a small tract of land situate in Reedy district in Roane county. The plaintiff conceived the idea of developing or testing the territory in that neighborhood for oil and gas. At that time it was what is termed in the nomenclature of the oil and gas fraternity "wildcat" territory, that is, such territory as has not been reasonably demonstrated to be productive of these minerals. O. J. Brown and G. B. Davis, two residents of that neighborhood who were interested in having the same tested, undertook to assist the plaintiff in procuring leases upon such of the territory as he might desire. The plaintiff advised them that if he could procure leases on several thousand acres of land in a solid block he would incur the expense of drilling a well to determine whether or not there was oil or gas underlying the lands. Brown and Davis, together with one Byron L. Morford, plaintiff's son-in-law and agent for the purpose of procuring the leases, went into the neighborhood and secured such leases from a great number of the landowners. On the 17th of March, 1919, while Morford and Brown were engaged in this work, they went to the residence of the defendant Morgan for the purpose of securing such a lease upon his 17-acre tract. He was not at home, but they were advised by his wife that he would return in all probability in a short time. Shortly after leaving his house they met him in the road, and Brown, being acquainted with him, accosted him in regard to securing the lease. He was advised that the plaintiff had determined to test the territory for oil and gas if he could secure leases upon a solid block containing several thousand acres, and that they had already procured such leases upon practically all of the land in proximity to his tract. It was explained to him that Heck was paying only a nominal consideration of 5 cents an acre for the leases, with the provision to deliver one-eighth of the oil or gas produced to the credit of the lessor, or to pay $200 a year for each producing gas well. Morgan stated that he had talked with another party about leasing his land, and thought he might get more favorable terms if he waited until the land was tested and it should turn out that it was oil-producing territory, but finally agreed that he would not stand in the way of securing the development in the neighborhood, and agreed to execute a lease upon the terms proposed to him. It then began to rain, and in order to prepare the lease the parties stepped into a hay shed by the wayside, and plaintiff's agent, Morford, filled in the blanks upon a printed form, and Morgan thereupon signed the paper and turned the same over to Morford; Morford at the same time giving him a check for 85 cents. It seems that Morford's instructions were to pay a minimum of $1, but he overlooked it in this case and only made the check for 5 cents an acre. It was there understood between the parties that in the next day or two the lease would be taken to Morgan's residence to be executed by his wife. Morgan says that he delivered the lease to Morford with the understanding that he was to have a copy of it, and that it was not to be a binding contract unless he was furnished a copy; that if he was furnished such copy it would be all right. Morford and Brown both testify that there was no such understanding as this. On the next day the lease was executed by Morgan's wife, but was not acknowledged by either of them before a notary public, or other officer authorized to take acknowledgments. Morford says that Morgan did ask for a copy of the lease at the time he executed it, and that he was informed that a copy would be made at the office, and when a notary came around to take the acknowledgment of his wife and himself to the paper such copy would be delivered to him.

Morford turned this paper over to the plaintiff, Heck, with the advice that Morgan desired a copy. The plaintiff thereupon procured one C. S. McClung, a notary, to take all of the leases which he had secured and make copies of those of which the lessors desired to have copies, and then go to the residences of the various lessors and take their acknowledgments to the leases, at the time delivering the copies. McClung did make a copy of the Morgan lease among others, and did call upon the various lessors to take their acknowledgments. When he called at the Morgan residence for the purpose of taking the acknowledgment of Morgan and his wife he was advised that Morgan had gone to Gilmer county to work on a bridge, but was given his post office address. Mrs. Morgan acknowledged the lease at that time. McClung returned the lease, together with the copy of it, to the plaintiff, with the advice that Morgan was not at home, and also furnished the plaintiff with Morgan's post office address, in order that he might be communicated with. There was one other lease executed by a man by the name of Wade, who was also absent, and who was at work at the same place with Morgan. Heck was in the neighborhood very shortly afterward and made further inquiries as to Morgan's address, and receiving confirmation of the information given him by McClung he wrote a letter to Morgan, inclosing the lease, together with the Wade lease, and asked him to acknowledge it and have Wade acknowledge his lease and return the same to him, and in this letter inclosed a check for $1 to pay the fees of the notary for taking the acknowledgment. He got no reply to this letter.

A short time thereafter he was informed that Morgan was at home, and with a view to getting the lease acknowledged he called up Brown and asked him to go to Morgan's residence in his automobile, and get both Morgan and his wife and take them before a notary and have the lease acknowledged. Brown did call up Morgan and advised him that he desired to call upon him and take him and his wife before an officer and have the lease acknowledged, upon which Morgan advised him that he had left the lease over in Gilmer county, where he had been at work; that when he left there he did not expect to come home, but only to go to Clarksburg to have some machinery repaired, and finding that it would take longer to make the repairs than he expected he determined to make a visit to his home. Brown communicated this information to Heck. The next morning Heck met Morgan on the train returning to his work and approached him in regard to acknowledging the lease and returning it. Morgan at that time called his attention to the fact that the lease recited a consideration of $1, when he had only received 85 cents. Heck thereupon informed him that this was a mistake, and that it was the first he knew of it, and offered to pay him the difference at that time, but Morgan informed him that that made no difference; that he would execute the lease whether he got any consideration or not. He made some suggestion in regard to the term being rather long, and stated that he had had a notion to change the ten years to two years and acknowledge it and return it. Heck replied to him that development would be begun at once; that he intended to begin the well immediately, and if the territory was found to be producing territory the development would be continued, and that if he had changed the lease to two years he (Heck) would likely have accepted it. He insisted upon Morgan acknowledging the paper at once and returning it to him, advising him that he desired to at once proceed with his development, but did not want to do so until he had all of the matters closed up. Morgan thereupon advised him, according to Heck, that he need not delay his operations awaiting the lease; that just as soon as he returned he would acknowledge it and return it, and that he (Heck) might go on with his plans for development with the full assurance that the lease would be acknowledged and returned to him.

Heck did immediately begin operations on an adjoining tract of land known as the Hess tract. Not receiving the lease from Morgan after waiting a considerable time, Heck wrote him a letter calling his attention to his promise to acknowledge it and return it, and advising him that he was relying upon that promise, and asking him to comply with it immediately, and also to return the Wade lease which he had theretofore sent him. To this letter Morgan made an equivocal reply in which he returned the Wade lease, but for the first time, according to Heck, raised some question about the payment of 85 cents not being legal, and about having a copy of the lease furnished to him which had not been furnished, and advised that they would let the matter rest until some future time. Upon receipt of this letter Heck immediately wrote him again, inclosing him $1 to take the place of the 85 cents which had been paid him, and advising him that as soon as he acknowledged the lease and returned it he would be furnished a copy, and asked him to do so at once. To this letter Morgan replied, returning the check, and advised that he did not know where the lease was unless it had been returned to him with his former letter. This letter was written about June 17, 1919.

It seems that no further communication was had with Morgan until some time in the early part of September. Heck pursued his developments, and on the 11th of September his well on the Hess land came in a substantial producer. It seems about this time that he had another conference with Morgan, in which Morgan told him he did not know what he was going to do about his lease; but he wanted to do what was right, but he did not know what that was. It became apparent to Heck by this time that Morgan did not intend to acknowledge the lease and return it, but was endeavoring to escape the effect of it if he could do so.

In the meantime Heck had consulted counsel as to his rights upon the Morgan land, and was advised that the acknowledgment was not necessary in order to make the lease a valid one so far as Morgan was concerned. On the evening of September 11th, at the time the well came in on the Hess land, Heck, for the purpose of protecting his interest in the Morgan land, announced to his employes and others who were present that he was going to the Morgan land and make a location for a well. Accompanied by several of his employes he did go to the Morgan place and called at the Morgan residence. Morgan was not there, but he informed Mrs. Morgan that he had secured a good well on the Hess land adjoining, and was then going to locate a well on the Morgan 17 acres. She stated that she wished Mr. Morgan was at home, and Mr. Heck also advised that he would have been glad if Morgan were present, but that he could not delay making the location; that he thereupon measured the distance from the house, and the distance from several other points, and made a location, to indicate which he took a broom handle and with a knife flattened off one side of it, and marked thereon "O. B. Morgan, No. 1," and drove it into the ground; that he then advised Mrs. Morgan, upon his return from the point of location, that the same had been made, and that work would begin at once.

He instructed his men to proceed to this Morgan land on the next morning and commence the building of a road from the highway to the point at which the well had been located, so that material could be moved upon the land preparatory to drilling a well, but on account of some happening at the Hess well the services of the men were required there, and they did not go upon the Morgan land for the purpose of commencing the work there until Monday morning, the 15th day of September. At that time a force of men did go upon the Morgan land and begin the construction of a road leading from the highway to the point where the well had been located. Mrs. Morgan advised these men that they were trespassers upon the land and demanded that they cease their work. They disregarded her request and proceeded therewith.

On the next day Morgan and his wife went to the city of Parkersburg and there got in communication with the defendant R. E. Bills, as a result of which, they executed to him a lease for oil and gas development upon this same tract of land. The terms of this lease were agreed upon, according to the testimony of Bills and Morgan, on the 16th, but the lease was not executed until the next day. Bills paid for this lease, according to the evidence, the sum of $1, and by a collateral contract gave Morgan a one-sixteenth interest in the operations to be carried on upon the land, agreeing to furnish the money for Morgan's one-sixteenth interest to the extent of drilling in one well, after which time Morgan should pay his share of the expenses of operation. On this same day a notice was prepared by Bills to Heck, requiring him to cease trespassing upon the land, and notifying him that he had no right thereon for the purpose of operating for oil or gas. Morgan brought this notice back with him upon the evening of the 17th, and on the next morning, shortly after 8 o'clock, when the men resumed their work on the construction of the road, he served the same upon the foreman in charge, who immediately called the plaintiff on the telephone and read the notice to him. The plaintiff advised him to pay no attention to it, but to proceed with the work, and this was done. The work upon the construction of the road proceeded continuously until it was completed about the 24th of September, and on the next day Heck began hauling material upon the ground for the purpose of beginning operations.

Likewise, on the 24th of September, Heck instituted this suit for the purpose of setting up the lease, which Morgan and his wife had executed, as a lost instrument; Morgan claiming that he had lost it or destroyed it, and for the purpose of canceling the lease executed by Morgan to Bills as a cloud upon his right to develop the land for oil and gas. On the 23d of September it appears that Bills had some negotiations with the defendant C. T. Smith, which resulted in an assignment of this lease by Bills to Smith; Smith assuming all of Bills' obligations to Morgan under the collateral contract above referred to. At the time the plaintiff brought this suit he was not advised of this assignment of Bills to Smith, and did not make Smith a party defendant. In fact, the assignment to Smith was not placed upon the record until some days after the suit was brought. While the assignment to Smith is dated on the 23d of September, and consists of only a few lines, it was not acknowledged until the 24th, and not recorded until the 26th of September. In addition to assuming Bills' obligations to Morgan, it is claimed by Bills and Smith that Smith paid Bills $800 for the assignment, and a check is filed dated the 23d of September for this amount, which it is shown was paid on the 27th of that month. Plaintiff then filed an amended bill making Smith a party defendant, and in addition to the relief asked for in the original bill asked that the assignment from Bills to Smith be also canceled and set aside as a cloud upon his title. Bills claims that at the time he took the lease from Morgan he knew nothing about any claim that Heck had to the land, and that Morgan assured him at that time that there was no lease upon the land, and that he had a clear right to make the lease to him, notwithstanding on the very same day Bills prepared the notice to Heck above referred to. He claims, however, that this notice was prepared after the lease had been executed and delivered. Smith likewise claims that at the time he took the assignment from Bills he had no notice of any claim upon the part of Heck, or anybody else. Bills admits that he was fully advised that Heck was claiming the right to drill this land for oil and gas at the time he made the assignment to Smith, and that while Smith was a partner of his in business and closely associated with him, he withheld the information he had in this regard from Smith.

It is insisted that the plaintiff is not entitled to the relief he asks, for the reason that the paper executed by Morgan and delivered to Morford on the 17th day of March was not effective because the same had not been acknowledged; that it was delivered to Morford upon condition that it would take effect only in the event that a copy thereof was furnished to Morgan, and that, this copy not having been furnished, there was never any delivery of the paper; that even though the paper executed by Morgan was valid as a lease between him and Heck, Bills as a bona fide purchaser without notice of Heck's claim could not be affected thereby, inasmuch as the record did not disclose Heck's interest, and that even though it should be held that Bills purchased with notice of Heck's rights, still the defendant Smith was such innocent purchaser and is protected.

The circuit court entered a decree establishing the plaintiff's lost lease as a valid and binding contract, and from a copy of it which was duly proven fixed the terms, and further canceled the lease made by Morgan to Bills and the assignment by Bills to Smith as constituting clouds upon the plaintiff's rights, and enjoined the defendant Morgan from interfering with Heck in his operations upon the land.

[1] Is there any merit in the contention of the defendant Morgan that the paper was not effective because he had not acknowledged it? As between the parties, there is no necessity for the acknowledgment of a deed. If it is properly signed, sealed, and delivered, it is just as effective to convey the grantor's title as though it had been acknowledged. The purpose of an acknowledgment is to supply the proof necessary to have it admitted to record, except in the case of a married woman, where, by the language of the statute, an acknowledgment is necessary to the validity of the deed. State v. Proudfoot, 38 W. Va. 736-745, 18 S. E. 949; Washington County v. Dunn, 27 Gr. (Va.) 608; Webb v. Ritter, 60 W. Va. 193, 54 S. E. 484; 1 C. J. 750.

fendant Morgan, however, is that this lease was delivered by him to Morford upon condition that it would be valid only if a copy were furnished him, and that inasmuch as this copy has never been furnished there was never any effective delivery, and when the lease came back into his hands he had a perfect right to destroy it. The evidence does not bear out his contention that this lease was delivered upon any such condition as he now sets up. Morford and Brown swear positively that there was no such condition attached to the delivery. Morford admits, as we have before stated, that he did agree to furnish Morgan a copy, and it is shown that a copy was made for that purpose, but that this was a condition to the validity of the instrument is denied emphatically by both Brown and Morford. Possession of an instrument of this character by the grantee is prima facie evidence that it was delivered to him with the intention that it should convey the grantor's title, and it might be very well said that Morgan has failed to overcome this presumption. Aside from this, however, it is well settled that a deed, or any instrument conveying an interest in real estate, cannot be delivered to the grantee upon condition, or, in other words, delivered in escrow. Such conditional delivery can only be made to a stranger to the transaction. Dorr v. Midelburg, 65 W. Va. 778, 65 S. E. 97, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 987, and authorities there cited. The delivery in this case, of course, was not made direct to the grantee, but it was made to Morford, his agent. It seems that formerly a conditional delivery could not be made to an agent of the grantee, but the tendency of the modern holdings is that the grantee's general agent may be intrusted with the instrument to be held in escrow. This doctrine has been extended no further, however, than to permit the delivery upon condition to such an agent as owes no duty towards his principal in regard to the particular transaction. In other words, if the conditional delivery is made to the agent who is conducting the particular negotiations on behalf of the principal, it would be entirely inconsistent with the specific duty with which he is charged, and the delivery to him would be, in effect, a delivery to the grantee. 10 R. C. L. title "Escrow," § 13; J. I. Case Threshing Machine Co. v. Barnes, 183 Ky. 321, 117 S. W. 418, 19 Ann. Cas. 246, and monographic note at page 250. In this case Morford being the agent of the plaintiff for the very purpose of conducting this transaction, and receiving on behalf of his principal the lease, it would be entirely inconsistent with this duty for him to act in the capacity of agent for both parties to hold the instrument in escrow. The delivery to him was therefore an absolute delivery, even though there may have been attached thereto the condition to which Morgan testifies.

[5] Nor is there anything in the contention of the defendant Morgan that when the lease executed by him came back into his possession for the purpose of having it acknowledged it deprived the plaintiff of any rights which he might otherwise have had thereunder. If this paper was effective to vest in the plaintiff any interest, he could only be divested thereof by a grant from him or in some other way provided by law. The fact that the grantor came into possession of the instrument for the purpose of acknowledging it would not have the effect to divest the grantee of his title acquired thereunder. Rootes v. Holliday, 6 Munf. (Va.) 251.

The defendant Bills, however, claims that he was a purchaser for value in good faith, and without notice of the plaintiff's rights under the lease which had been theretofore executed to him by Morgan, and that therefore his rights under the lease executed to him by Morgan in September, 1919, are superior to the rights of the plaintiff, and this would be correct if the facts justified this conclusion, for under our recording statutes the plaintiff's lease would be void as to a purchaser for value in good faith without notice. Is the defendant Bills such a purchaser? It is contended: First, that he had actual notice of the plaintiff's rights, notwithstanding his denial, and that even if he did not have such actual notice Heck had such possession of the premises at the time of his purchase as to amount to notice; and, second, that even though he had no notice whatever, still he was not a complete purchaser, for the reason that he had not paid the consideration agreed upon between him and Morgan. Bills swears that at the time he took the lease from Morgan he did not know of Heck's claim, and had no information whatever in regard thereto, and Morgan swears that he gave him no such information, but, on the contrary, had told him that there was no adverse claim of any kind to the land. It is significant, however, that on the very day on which this lease was executed and delivered Bills prepared a notice to Heck advising him to cease trespassing upon the land, and further advising him that he had no right to operate the same for oil and gas. This notice clearly implies that the one who prepared it knew that Heck was making some claim of a right to conduct operations upon this land for oil and gas. But Bills says that while this notice was prepared by him on the 17th it was after the delivery of the lease to him, and after that transaction was closed. This may be true, but it is hardly credible. Morgan puts himself in the position of making a clear-cut false and fraudulent representation to Bills, for he admits that he himself knew that Heck was claiming a right to develop the land for oil and gas at the very time that he made the representation to Bills, and it may be said that the evidence of one who swears that he is willing to commit positive fraud of this kind is not entitled to very much credence when in conflict with the circumstance of the preparation and giving of the notice to Heck.

[6] However, it is unnecessary to determine whether Bills had actual notice of Heck's claim or not. The evidence shows that Heck had taken possession of this land prior to the execution of this lease to Bills; that he was then at work upon it with a force of men building a road leading to the location he had established for an oil well. The surface of the land is a part of the record of which a purchaser must take notice, and it is clear from the evidence that had Bills looked at this land at the time he took his lease he could have come to no other conclusion but that some one was preparing to conduct operations thereon for oil and gas, and it would then have been his duty to make inquiry as to the rights claimed by such party. In Pocahontas Tanning Co. v. St. Lawrence Boom & Mfg. Co., 63 W. Va. 685, 60 S. E. 890, it was held that one who has knowledge or information of facts sufficient to put a prudent man on inquiry as to the existence of some right or title in conflict with that which he is about to purchase is bound to pursue the same, and to ascertain the extent of such prior right.

[7] There can be no doubt that the conduct of Heck upon this tract of land was sufficient to put any one upon notice that oil operations were about to be carried on upon it. The road which was under construction at the very time of the making of the lease to Bills was consistent only with that purpose. It appears that the tract of land had not been farmed for some time; that it had grown up in sprouts and brush, and that it had a small orchard upon it; that a wagon road over which heavy hauling could be done, such as was being constructed by Heck, was entirely useless for any purpose to which the farm was being devoted by Morgan, and particularly is this true when we consider the point to which the road led. Then, too, oil development was going on in the neighborhood; a well had just come in on an adjoining tract of land, and it was perfectly apparent to any one that the purpose of the work being done by Heck upon this land was to produce oil therefrom. It is, therefore, quite clear that if Bills had looked at the land at the time he took the lease he would have been informed from the appearances that some one else was asserting a right to the oil and gas, and it would have been his duty to have made inquiry and ascertained just what this right or claim was. But Bills says he did not in fact look at the land, and that he can only be charged with such information as he actually had. Was Bills charged with knowledge of the facts of which he would have been informed had he made an examination of the land? If he is, then he had notice, or is charged with knowledge of such facts as would give him notice of Heck's rights. In Mills v. McLanahan, 70 W. Va. 288, 73 S. E. 927, the defense of innocent purchaser was made. Mills was in possession of the land under a title bond which had been executed many years before, and which had been lost, and a subsequent purchaser from Mills' grantor claimed that he was not chargeable with any knowledge as to Mills' rights, but this court held that the law imposed upon such subsequent purchaser the duty to make an investigation, and imputes to him notice of all facts which such an investigation would have disclosed, and of all the rights of those in possession. Many authorities are cited in that case to support that view, and it seems to be the established law of this state. It therefore follows that Bills, being under a duty to take notice of all facts which an investigation upon the land would disclose, is not an innocent purchaser without notice of Heck's rights; the situation being such as to disclose facts which would inform him of those rights.

[8] There is another reason why Bills is not such a purchaser as is protected, and that is that he had not paid the consideration at the time he admittedly was fully informed of the situation. The real consideration which Bills was to pay for this lease was to bear Morgan's share of the expense of drilling the first well thereon. He only gave, according to his own contention, a nominal consideration of $1 at the time the lease was executed, while the real consideration, assuming that it would cost as much to drill a well on this land as the evidence shows it did on the adjoining land, would be between $700 and $800, no part of which had been paid, or has even yet been paid so far as this record discloses. Notice of prior existing rights received by a purchaser of property before he has paid the purchase money is equivalent to notice before the contract of purchase. He is not a complete purchaser until the consideration has been paid. He was in a position, after he was fully informed of the rights of the prior purchaser, to fully protect himself by withholding the consideration which he was to give. Welch v. King, 82 W. Va. 253, 95 S. E. 844; Webb v. Bailey, 41 W. Va. 463, 23 S. E. 644.

For either of the foregoing reasons Bills is deprived of the defense of innocent purchaser for value without notice. What we have said as to the duty of Bills to ascertain what was being done upon the land, and its effect to deprive him of the defense of innocent purchaser, applies with even greater force to the defendant Smith. At the time Smith took the assignment from Bills, the road was completed and indicated unmistakably its purpose.

[9] The appellees contend that the plaintiff's bill should be dismissed, for the reason that he attempted to practice a fraud upon the defendant Morgan subsequent to the bringing of this suit. There is evidence that after this suit was brought the plaintiff discovered what he conceived to be a defect in the title of Morgan to the land in controversy, and went to Morgan's vendor, and procured from him upon what are termed fraudulent representations a quitclaim deed for the land, because of which conduct the appellee Morgan now insists the plaintiff should be denied relief. It is quite true that equity will not lend its aid to enforce an unconscionable contract or one procured by fraudulent means. Ordinarily one who comes into equity must come with clean hands, but this maxim extends no further than to deny relief to one who has acted fraudulently or inequitably in regard to the contract involved in litigation. It does not extend to the conduct of a party generally. The matter set up here which it is claimed should defeat the plaintiff's right to maintain this suit has no connection with the contract sought to be enforced. It was conduct subsequent to the making of that contract, and subsequent to the institution of this suit to establish it, and even admitting that the plaintiff's conduct in regard to that transaction was not free from censure, it has no bearing upon the contract involved here, or upon the rights of the parties involved in this litigation. The evil conduct or iniquitous practice which is relied upon to defeat the suit must be in connection with the particular matter or transaction in respect to which judicial protection or redress is sought. 10 R. C. L. title "Equity," § 140.

Our conclusion is to affirm the decree complained of; and it is so ordered.

MILLER v. UNITED FUEL GAS CO.
(No. 3661.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 1, 1921.)

1. Master and servant §365—Compensation act applies unconditionally only to employees in intrastate commerce.

With respect to an employer engaged in both interstate and intrastate commerce, section 52 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (chapter 15P, Code 1918, Code Supp. 1918, c. 15P, § 52 [sec. 708]) applies the provisions of the act unconditionally only to those of his employees whose work is wholly intrastate and clearly separable and distinguishable from work in interstate commerce.

2. Master and servant §365—Compensation Act must be accepted by employer and employees engaged in interstate and intrastate commerce.

But where the work done within the state is so closely related to the interstate business of the employer that it cannot clearly be distinguished and separated from it, the act is made to apply only upon the condition that the employer and such employees voluntarily accept its provisions by filing with the commissioner written acceptances approved by him.

3. Master and servant §365—Employer engaged in interstate and intrastate business not deprived of common-law defenses in absence of acceptance of Compensation Act.

Where the employer and his employees have not so elected to submit to the act, the former is not deprived of his common-law defenses.

4. Commerce §16—Master and servant §365—Inspection of interstate pipe line for gas held "interstate commerce," requiring mutual acceptance of Workmen's Compensation Act.

An employee of an interstate carrier of gas, inspecting within the state an integral part of its pipe line transportation system, through which gas continuously passes destined for indiscriminate interstate and intrastate use, in search of a leak known to exist, is engaged in work so closely related to interstate commerce as to be part of it; and, in the absence of a mutual election to submit to the Workmen's Compensation Act (Code 1913, c. 15P [secs. 657-711]), the employer is not deprived of his common-law defenses at the suit of the employee for injuries sustained by him while engaged in such inspection and repair work.

5. Master and servant §284(1)—Employment in interstate commerce held question for court.

Where, in such case, there is no conflict in the evidence respecting the character of defendant's business and the nature of plaintiff's employment, the question whether the latter was or was not so closely identified with interstate commerce as to be part of it is for the court, not the jury, to determine.

6. Trial §252(20)—Instruction including element of permanency of injury and probability of future loss not sustained by evidence erroneous.

In the absence of evidence reasonably tending to establish permanent injury of the plaintiff, or the probability of future pecuniary loss resulting therefrom, an instruction including such elements among those proper to be considered by the jury in determining its verdict is erroneous.

7. Master and servant §351—Employer failing to accept Compensation Act not liable for injuries not caused by his negligence.

Though an employer within the terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act (Code 1913,

c. 15P [secs. 657-711]) fails to avail himself of the benefit of the statute, he is not liable for an injury sustained by an employee in the course of his employment, in the absence of negligence on the part of the former which is the proximate cause of the injury.

8. New trial ¶70—Verdict based on conjecture should be set aside.

In an action for tort, the plaintiff bears the burden of proof, and a verdict for him, based upon evidence which affords a mere conjecture that liability exists, and leaves the minds of the jurors in equipoise and reasonable doubt, should be set aside upon proper motion. The evidence must generate an actual, rational belief in the existence of the disputed fact.

9. Master and servant ¶101, 102(8)—Reasonable care to furnish reasonably safe place for work sufficient.

An employer has performed his duty to provide a reasonably safe place within or upon which his employees may work, when he has exercised reasonable care and diligence in that regard.

Error to Circuit Court, Roane County.

Proceedings by Otha A. Miller against the United Fuel Gas Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

R. G. Altizer, of Charleston, C. C. Douthitt, of Huntington, and Pendleton, Mathews & Bell, of Spencer, for plaintiff in error.

Thos. P. Ryan, of Spencer, and Chas. E. Hogg, of Point Pleasant, for defendant in error.

LYNCH, J. The purpose of this writ is to review a judgment for plaintiff entered upon a verdict in an action to recover damages for personal injuries resulting from the bursting of defendant's gas pipe line on July 29, 1916. At the time of the accident plaintiff and a fellow employee were engaged in searching for a leak which had developed in the line, to which duty they had been assigned by defendant's superintendent. The line in question was a gathering or feed line, four inches in diameter, designed to collect and confine gas from numerous wells in the vicinity and transport it in succession to another 4-inch line, thence through an 8 or 10 inch line to a compressor station, and by an 18-inch main trunk line to Ravenswood on the Ohio river, where the gas is metered, sold, and delivered to the Ohio Fuel Supply Company, by whom it is transported across the river and sold and distributed to patrons of the latter in Ohio. A minor portion of the gas so gathered and transported is sold en route to various consumers in this state, but the remainder is carried in the line without material break across the state line into Ohio, thereby becoming a commodity of interstate commerce. The two portions, however, that sold within the state and that without, are commingled in the one transportation system, and no attempt is made to separate them. We have hitherto had occasion to refer to the combined interstate and intrastate character of this portion of defendant's business, and therefore it is unnecessary to enter into further discussion of it. Roberts v. United Fuel Gas Co., 84 W. Va. 368, 99 S. E. 549; United Fuel Gas Co. v. Hallanan, 105 S. E. 506, 516, 517.

Plaintiff and W. B. Hughes had ascertained the approximate location of the leak and were engaged in digging along the side of the line, which was buried about 18 inches beneath the surface of the ground, in order to determine the exact source of the leakage and repair the line to stop the flow. Hughes was digging with a pick, and plaintiff was removing the loosened dirt with a shovel, when, from some unaccountable and unexplained cause, the pipe burst, throwing both of them a considerable distance, filling their eyes with dirt, mud, and gravel, and dazing them by the force of the explosion. A physician hastily summoned removed the dirt and other substance from their eyes as best he could and rendered other necessary assistance. Plaintiff was removed to his home, where his eyes were kept bandaged for four days. After two weeks he returned to his work and remained with the company for more than a year, usually engaged in performing the same character of work as before the injury. Since then he has been and now is employed by the Atlantic Refining Company as foreman in charge of its line repair work at an increased daily compensation.

The declaration and its three counts charge defendant with negligence in a threefold aspect: (1) In failing to keep its pipe line in a reasonably safe condition and state of repair, and in permitting too great a volume of gas to remain in the pipe at high pressure; (2) in failing to shut off the gas in the line before directing plaintiff to locate the leak; (3) in failing to lay a line sufficiently strong to carry with reasonable safety the volume of gas transported through it. The declaration also averred the failure of the defendant to comply with the requirements of the Workmen's Compensation Act (Code 1913, c. 15P [secs. 657-711]) by paying into the compensation fund the premiums required by law.

In addition to its demurrer to the declaration and plea of not guilty, defendant tendered and the court permitted it to file three special pleas denying that it was subject to the Workmen's Compensation Act of this state and setting up the common-law defenses of contributory negligence, assumption of risk, and fellow servancy.

Plaintiff's instructions Nos. 1 and 2, given, and defendant's instruction No. 2, refused, raise the question whether the failure of the latter to elect to contribute to the workmen's compensation fund operated to deny it the protection of the common-law defenses invoked by the special pleas. In effect plaintiff's two instructions informed the jury that if they believed from the evidence that at the time of the injury the defendant was engaged in both interstate and intrastate commerce, and that plaintiff was engaged in work affecting the latter only, and that such work was clearly separable and distinguishable from the defendant's interstate business, then as to the work in which plaintiff was engaged defendant was subject to the Workmen's Compensation Act, and, not having availed itself of the provisions thereof, could not rely upon the common-law defenses.

[1-3] With respect to an employer engaged in both interstate and intrastate commerce, we have held that section 52 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, as it appears in Barnes' 1916 Code, c. 15P (Code Supp. 1918, c. 15P, § 52 [sec. 708]), applies the provisions of the act unconditionally only to those of his employees whose work is wholly intrastate and clearly separable and distinguishable from interstate commerce. Suttle v. Hope Natural Gas Co., 82 W. Va. 729, 97 S. E. 429; Roberts v. United Fuel Gas Co., 84 W. Va. 368, 99 S. E. 549. But where the work done within the state is so closely related to interstate commerce that it cannot clearly be distinguished and separated from it, the act is made to apply only conditionally, that is, when the employer and employees voluntarily accept its provisions by filing with the commissioner written acceptances approved by him; and, where they have not so elected to submit to the act, the employer is not deprived of his common-law defenses. Barnett v. Coal & Coke Ry. Co., 81 W. Va. 251, 94 S. E. 150.

[4, 5] Was the work engaged in by plaintiff at the time of the injury clearly separable from the interstate portion of defendant's business, or were both so closely allied or related as to be inseparable? The gas line was an integral part of defendant's general and extensive pipe line system through which gas passed for indiscriminate interstate and intrastate use. It was already in existence and dedicated to the transportation of gas. Though not a main trunk line, yet it fed and supplied the latter with the article of commerce which both were designed to carry and then did carry, just as the least important spur and lateral railroad lines gather and concentrate the commodities they carry towards the main trunk lines for transportation to their ultimate destination. Plaintiff's work in locating the leak in the line had for its purpose and object the repair and improvement of existing interstate transportation facilities already devoted to the purposes intended to be served by them. The Suttle and Roberts Cases, cited, are unlike this case in that neither of them relates to the transportation phase of the gas industry, but rather to the production and preliminary construction features. In the former, plaintiff's decedent was assisting in the erection of a derrick over a gas well preparatory to cleaning it out. In the opinion the court said:

"The production department of the gas industry is clearly separable from the transporting or marketing branch. All work in connection with the production of gas, that is, with bringing it to the surface where it may be confined and reduced to possession, is local in nature and clearly separable and distinguishable from the marketing or interstate portion of the industry." 82 W. Va. p. 738, 97 S. E. 433.

Similarly in the Roberts Case, plaintiff was engaged at the time of his injury in excavating a ditch preparatory to laying a pipe line to be used in the interstate and intrastate transportation of gas, but not yet completed or put in use. Therefore the line was not yet stamped with the character of the commerce which it was to carry after completion. Work on it was merely preliminary to the transportation to which later it would be devoted, and hence was wholly intrastate. See, also, McKee v. Ohio Valley Electric Ry. Co., 78 W. Va. 131, 88 S. E. 616.

But when the instrumentality has already been devoted to interstate commerce, and has assumed its place as a link in the chain of such transportation, employees engaged in repairing it or doing other work thereon generally are held to be engaged in work so closely allied to interstate commerce as not to be clearly separable from it. Pedersen v. Del., L. & W. R. Co., 229 U. S. 146, 33 Sup. Ct. 648, 57 L. Ed. 1125, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 153; Southern Ry. Co. v. Puckett, 244 U. S. 571, 37 Sup. Ct. 703, 61 L. Ed. 1321, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 69; New York Cent. R. Co. v. Porter, 249 U. S. 168, 39 Sup. Ct. 188, 63 L. Ed. 536; Kinzell v. Chi., M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 250 U. S. 130, 39 Sup. Ct. 412, 63 L. Ed. 893; So. Pac. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Com., 251 U. S. 259, 40 Sup. Ct. 130, 64 L. Ed. 258; Erie R. Co. v. Collins, 253 U. S. 77, 40 Sup. Ct. 450, 64 L. Ed. 790; Erie R. Co. v. Szary, 253 U. S. 86, 40 Sup. Ct. 454, 64 L. Ed. 794. In the Pedersen Case, cited, it was held that an employee carrying bolts to be used in repairing an interstate railroad was engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of the federal Employers' Liability Act. The test there laid down and followed in subsequent cases is:

"Was that work being done independently of the interstate commerce in which the defendant was engaged, or was it so closely connected therewith as to be a part of it?"

"True, a track or bridge may be used in both interstate and intrastate commerce, but when it is so used it is none the less an instrumentality of the former; nor does its double use prevent the employment of those * * * engaged in its repair or in keeping it in suitable condition for use from being an employment in interstate commerce."

The cases cited all relate to actions for injuries brought under the federal Employers' Liability Act, but they are especially applicable here on the question whether plaintiff's work was clearly separable and distinguishable from interstate commerce, or so closely identified with it as to be part of it. For reasons already stated we are of opinion that it falls within the latter class, and therefore that defendant, not having elected to accept the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act as permitted by section 52, is not debarred from availing itself of the common-law defenses. The act applies unconditionally only to such employment as is clearly separable from interstate commerce.

There is no dispute upon the facts relating to the character of defendant's business and the nature of plaintiff's employment, and therefore the question whether it was or was not so closely identified with interstate commerce as to be part of it was one of law for the court and not one of fact for the jury. Hence plaintiff's instructions Nos. 1 and 2 were improperly given. The giving of similar instructions in the Roberts Case, cited, was held to be harmless error because the jury there correctly decided the question of law, while here they have rendered an erroneous decision. For the same reasons defendant's instruction No. 2 should have been given.

[6] Plaintiff's instruction No. 3 also is erroneous in telling the jury they are at liberty to consider the permanence of plaintiff's injury, and to include "any losses that may occur in the future to the plaintiff" which are proximate results of the alleged negligence. There was no serious attempt to prove permanent injury. Plaintiff and some witnesses testify to a slight deafness and loss of weight, but the evidence on that point is weak and inconclusive. The physician who attended him, introduced as a witness for defendant, did not regard his injury as serious or permanent, and it is significant that plaintiff made no attempt to cross-examine him further than to ask two or three unimportant questions. Plaintiff resumed his work with defendant two weeks after the date of the accident and continued for more than a year in its employ, and now holds a still better position with another company as foreman in charge of its line repair work.

[7] But there is more serious error in the case than we have yet discussed. We are of opinion that plaintiff has failed to establish any negligence on the part of the defendant. Even if the latter had been within the terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act, failure to comply with its provisions would not render defendant liable in the absence of negligence on its part which operated as the proximate cause of the injury. Watts v. Ohio Valley Electric Ry. Co., 78 W. Va. 144, 88 S. E. 659; Louis v. Smith-McCormick Construction Co., 80 W. Va. 159, 92 S. E. 249; Wilkin v. H. Koppers Co., 84 W. Va. 460, 100 S. E. 300. There is no evidence that the pipe line was improperly constructed or maintained. On the other hand, defendant had constructed it only six months before the accident, and in its construction had used none but entirely new material, obtained from La Belle Iron Works of Toledo, Ohio, the manufacturer, whose test showed a resistance sufficient to withstand a pressure of 1,500 pounds for each square inch of surface. The superintendent who had charge of the work testifies to its proper construction, and no one contradicts him. The explosion did not occur at a coupling, but in the pipe itself, near a point where it was bent to conform to the curve of an embankment over which it ran. But there is nothing to show that the pipe was improperly strained in bending it, or that the work was done carelessly or negligently; indeed, the testimony is to the contrary. The declaration charges failure to shut off the gas pending the search for the leak, but that alone does not constitute negligence, because the usual and customary and perhaps the only way to locate a leak in one of several pipes forming parts of a pipe line system is by means of the escaping gas. Though tested to withstand a pressure of 1,500 pounds, the line on the day of the accident did not carry more than 350 pounds, and there is testimony to the effect that the pressure was even less than that.

[8] In view of the positive testimony clearly disclosing the proper construction of the line out of new pipes so tested, its periodic inspection, the absence of any knowledge on defendant's part of a fatal defect likely to cause such an accident, and the failure of plaintiff to show by proof that it was due to some negligent act or omission to act on the part of defendant, there is nothing to support a finding of liability against it, and the mandatory instruction directing a verdict for defendant should have been given. Plaintiff was engaged in a dangerous work and well knew the risk and hazard attending it. Before he can recover for the injury he must show actionable negligence on the part of defendant. McCreary v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 77 W. Va. 305, 87 S. E. 374. "In an action for tort, the plaintiff bearing the burden of proof, a verdict for him cannot be found on evidence which affords mere conjecture that the liability exists, and leaves the minds of jurors in equipoise and reasonable doubt. The evidence must generate an actual rational belief in the existence of the disputed fact." Point 1, Syl., Moore v. Heat & Light

Co., 65 W. Va. 552, 64 S. E. 721. When the employer has exercised reasonable care and diligence in providing a reasonably safe place within which his employees may perform the work assigned to them, he has fulfilled his duty to them in that regard. Schilling v. H. Koppers Co., 83 W. Va. 737, 99 S. E. 75.

[9] In so far as the action of the circuit court in overruling defendant's demurrer to the declaration and each of its three counts relates to the failure of defendant to comply with the Workmen's Compensation Act, and the duty to remove or reduce the gas pressure on the line while it was being repaired, and to exercise a reasonable diligence to provide a reasonably safe place to work, what has been said is perhaps sufficient. The latter requirement, however, is not universal in its application but is subject to modification in some circumstances. It was part of plaintiff's business to repair leaks, and he was proficient in performing that service and had knowledge of its dangerous character. In effect the work assigned to him was to make safe an unsafe portion of an interstate gas pipe line system, and while the rule referred to is not without some degree of applicability, it does not apply to its fullest extent because the employee assumes the ordinary danger and risk incident to such employment. This is one of the exceptions to the general requirements for a safe place and safe instrumentalities. 3 Labatt's Master & Servant (2d Ed.) § 924; note, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 321. See, also, Miller v. Berkeley Limestone Co., 70 W. Va. 643, 75 S. E. 70. In other respects the declaration seems unobjectionable.

For the reasons stated in this opinion, we reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, and remand the case for retrial.

WILES et al. v. WALKER et al. (No. 4065.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 8, 1921. Rehearing Denied
March 29, 1921.)

1. Forcible entry and detainer §6(2)—Where entry peaceable and under color of title, right to possession depends on title.

In an action of forcible entry and detainer, wherein the relation of landlord and tenant does not exist, and the entry of the defendant was peaceable, without violence or threats of violence, express or implied, under claim of right and color of title, the right to possession depends upon the true ownership of the land.

2. Forcible entry and detainer §6(2)—Right to possession may depend on proof of title.

Though an action of forcible entry and detainer relates only to possession and does not settle or adjudicate title, yet, where the entry of the defendant was peaceable, the result may depend and turn on proof of title as showing the one entitled to the possession.

3. Forcible entry and detainer §6(4)—Mere fact that entry was against plaintiff's will does not make it forcible.

The mere fact that the entry was against the will of the plaintiff does not constitute it a forcible entry, if in other respects it was peaceable.

4. Forcible entry and detainer §29(1)—Plaintiff has burden of proving possessory rights superior to that of defendant.

In such action the plaintiff carries the burden of proof, and cannot prevail, unless, by a preponderance of the evidence, he shows a possessory right superior to that of the defendant.

Action by G. R. C. Wiles and others against W. J. Walker and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Reversed and rendered.

Goodykoontz, Scherr & Slaven, of Williamson, for plaintiffs in error.

Lafe B. Chafin and B. Randolph Bias, both of Williamson, for defendants in error.

LYNCH, J. By this action of unlawful entry and detainer, heard by the court sitting in lieu of a jury, plaintiffs sought and obtained a judgment awarding them possession of two lots, Nos. 1 and 2, block G, of Keller addition to the town of Gilbert, from which order defendants prosecute this writ. To sustain their claim to possession of the lots in question, plaintiffs rely upon three deeds: One dated June 20, 1907, by which R. A. Keller, trustee, conveyed the lots to A. J. Campbell; one of January 23, 1913, from A. D. Dickey, clerk of the county court of Mingo county, conveying them to A. A. Gaujot, trustee, pursuant to a tax sale and purchase in 1911 for an alleged delinquency in the payment of taxes assessed against the lots in 1909 in Campbell's name; and the last, dated April 4, 1913, by which Gaujot conveyed the property to plaintiffs. The latter immediately or soon thereafter assumed possession through a tenant. The lots were unimproved, save for a wire fence inclosing them, and were used by the tenant chiefly for garden purposes. Later he sublet to another tenant who used the property "as a lot for his cows, horses and calves—whatever he happened to want to put in there." The possession of the latter, however, seems to have been fitful, and some time during 1917, 1918, or early in 1919, the exact date not being disclosed by the record, defendants entered upon the lots pursuant to a purchase of the property in 1917, removed the wire fence, and readjusted it so as to inclose the lots with adjoining property owned by them, and have since ex-exercised continuous dominion and control over them. No force, violence, or threats of violence characterized their entry. On this question at least the evidence is clear and positive. Defendant W. J. Walker testifies that no one was in possession when he entered upon the lots, and the subtenant, whose possession plaintiffs rely upon, admits he was away at the time, and does not claim to have had stock or a garden on the property. At any rate, the taking of possession was peaceable, nor at any time since, so far as the record discloses, has unpleasantness developed.

In support of their claim of title, defendants rely upon deeds from A. J. Campbell, in whose name the alleged delinquency of 1909 occurred, to P. G. Hedrick, and from Hedrick to defendants, dated April 7, 1916, and July 9, 1917, respectively. They also introduced two other deeds conveying the identical property, both dated August 4, 1919—one from T. F. Brammer and J. F. Bolen to P. G. Hedrick, "being two of the same lots conveyed to said T. F. Brammer and J. F. Bolen by deed from said P. G. Hedrick and his wife, dated the 11th day of December, 1909"; the other from Hedrick to defendants. But defendants were not permitted to state their purpose in procuring these deeds or show what they sought to establish by them. They also assail the validity of the tax deed of 1913 to Gaujot, which is the foundation stone of plaintiffs' claim of title, and in justification and support of their attack elicited from the deputy clerk of the county court of Mingo county the fact that lots 1 and 2, block G, Keller addition to the town of Gilbert, were not assessed or returned delinquent in the name of A. J. Campbell for the year 1909, and did not appear in the sales list of lots sold in 1911 for prior delinquencies. Because of this apparent irregularity or defect, they charge that the entire proceedings based upon the alleged delinquency of 1909 were null and void. Plaintiffs express a belief that the lots appeared on the land books for that year as Nos. 1 and 2, block 3, instead of block G, but introduce no record proof in support of their statement. On the other hand, defendants show by the deputy clerk of the county court that on the official map of the Keller addition to the town of Gilbert all blocks are lettered, not numbered, and all deeds relating to the lots in question refer to them as in block G. They also show by the same witness that it is only on the official map of the town of Gilbert, which is separate and distinct from the Keller addition thereto, that the blocks are numbered instead of lettered.

[2] The action of forcible entry and detainer is solely possessory in nature. By it the one instituting the proceeding seeks merely to regain possession of land which he claims another is wrongfully withholding from him. The action does not permit or sanction a binding investigation or finding as to the true title or ownership of the property in dispute. As said in Hukill v. Guffey, 37 W. Va. 425, 445, 16 S. E. 544, 550:

"The action of unlawful entry and detainer now bears in some degree the same relation to the action of ejectment, now final, which the act of ejectment, before 1st July, 1850, then not final, bore to the writ of right, which was then abolished. English-speaking people have it ingrained into them that they ought not to be required to lose or give up their land without having, if they see fit, two trials; hence the action of unlawful entry, when not barred (three years), is frequently used as a preliminary skirmish to feel the enemy, before the final battle is brought on by an action of ejectment."

[1] But, though the title to land may not directly be involved, yet indirectly it may be decisive in determining the right to possession. Of course, where a defendant's entry upon land is forcible, rather than peaceful, his conduct is unlawful regardless of the question of his right or title to the property, and one who is thus deprived of possession may recover it in an action of forcible entry and detainer even against the true owner. The law does not permit even the legal owner to assert his rights in such a violent and unlawful manner. Fisher v. Harman, 67 W. Va. 619, 68 S. E. 885; Curtis v. Meadows, 77 W. Va. 22, 86 S. E. 886. But where, as here, the entry of the defendant was peaceable, without violence or threats of violence, express or implied, under a claim of right, "the right to possession depends upon the true ownership of the land." Chilton v. White, 72 W. Va. 545, 78 S. E. 1048; Feder, Adm'r, v. Hager, 84 W. Va. 452, 63 S. E. 285; Adams v. Tilley, 104 S. E. 601.

[3] The mere fact that the entry was against the will of the plaintiff does not constitute it a forcible entry, if in other respects it was peaceable. Adams v. Tilley, cited. It is in a situation such as this, where the entry is peaceable, that the question of title may incidentally be involved. In Feder, Adm'r, v. Hager, cited, the court said at page 454 of 64 W. Va., at page 236 of 63 S. E.:

"The right of possession belongs to title. * * * True it is that this action relates only to possession, and determines only the right to possession. It does not settle or adjudicate title. But title may be the proof showing that one is entitled to the possession; in other words, the action may turn on proof of title. In many cases in which this action is invoked the ownership of the land may be immaterial, but not in all."

[4] Without expressing any final opinion upon the question of ownership of the two lots involved in this inquiry, it is sufficient to say that defendants' title is equally as good, perhaps better, than plaintiffs'. The burden of proof naturally rests with the latter, and they have failed to show by a preponderance of the evidence that their right of possession is superior to that of defendants. Though much proof that doubtless was available and would have thrown light upon the nature of the delinquency proceeding upon which plaintiffs rest their claim was not presented at the trial, the circumstances are such as to create doubt and suspicion with regard to the validity of the tax deed of 1913 and the proceedings upon which it is based. Having failed to show possessory right superior to that of one who has taken peaceable possession under claim of right and color of title, plaintiffs cannot prevail in this action. If, however, they desire further to prosecute their claim to a final conclusion, an adequate remedy exists which affords opportunity for a full development of the questions relating to the respective claims of the parties.

For the reasons stated, our order will reverse the judgment, and enter judgment here for the defendants.

SCOTT v. MERCER GARAGE & AUTO SALES CO. (No. 4123.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 1, 1921. Rehearing Denied
March 29, 1921.)

Bailment §18(2)—Lien for repairs is subordinate to purchase-money lien.

The common-law lien of a mechanic for repairs on a chattel in his possession is subordinate to the lien of a former owner of the chattel who in his contract of sale reserved the title as security for unpaid purchase money, duly recorded as provided by section 3 of chapter 74 (sec. 3831) of the Code, unless by the terms of the contract or by the subsequent conduct of the seller he has given express or implied authority to the vendee to keep the property in repair.

Error to Circuit Court, Mercer County.

Detinue by W. A. Scott against the Mercer Garage & Auto Sales Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Sexton & Roberts, of Bluefield, for plaintiff in error.

Arthur F. Kingdon, of Bluefield, for defendant in error.

MILLER, J. In this action of detinue, begun in the circuit court of Mercer county, and there determined adversely to plaintiff, upon agreed facts submitted to the court in lieu of a jury, the question is now presented for our decision, whether the common-law lien of the defendant company for repairs upon an automobile, done in December 1916, and for the payment of which it was detaining said machine, is, as the circuit court held, superior and paramount to that of the plaintiff for the purchase money thereof represented by notes, for which in his written contract of sale he retained the title thereto, duly recorded in the clerk's office of the said county, prior to the delivery thereof to the defendant by Mary L. Holley, or her husband, the purchaser thereof, for the purpose of such repairs.

The contract of sale, made a part of the agreement of facts, after describing the parties and reciting the consideration, seven hundred and fifty dollars, one hundred and fifty dollars whereof is acknowledged as paid, and the balance, six hundred dollars, represented by twelve negotiable notes of fifty dollars each, payable one each month with interest, for the period of twelve months, further provides:

"The title to the above mentioned automobile is reserved to the party of the first part until all of said purchase money notes are fully paid."

Another provision of the contract is:

"It is further understood and agreed between the parties hereto that in the event the party of the second part shall fail to discharge any two of said notes as they fall due, and any two or more of said notes shall be due at the same time, then the party of the first part shall have the right, or option, if he so desires, to retake possession of said automobile, in the event the said party of the first part cannot otherwise collect said notes."

The facts agreed show that plaintiff did not know said car was out of the possession of the purchaser and in possession of defendant until some time in 1918, but believed it to be in his possession; that four of the purchase money notes had been paid, but that the remainder being unpaid, suit was brought thereon by plaintiff, judgment taken therefor against maker and endorser in May 1918, for $410.92 and costs, and every legal remedy available was taken to collect the same, without avail; and that thereafter demand for the possession of the said automobile was made by plaintiff upon defendant, which being refused, this suit was brought to obtain possession thereof.

We recognize the fact that we are presented a clear case of a common-law lien of a repairman in possession of the chattel, holding it as security for labor and material expended upon it. But we also emphasize the fact that plaintiff is the vendor thereof with recorded reservation of title, held as security for the purchase money, giving notice to creditors of and purchasers from the vendee, the mortgagor. This lien was good at common law without notice, but by section 3 of chapter 74 (sec. 3831) of the Code, such lien for purchase money is lost without recorded notice thereof as therein provided. There is nothing in the equities of the case now before us which should allow the subsequent lien to supplant the prior lien of the vendor. The defendant no doubt acquired a common-law lien on the chattel for the amount of the repairs, but was it not subordinate to that of plaintiff for purchase money? Plaintiff furnished the automobile, practically new, with all the material and labor bestowed upon it to make it a valuable machine, and there is nothing in the provisions of the contract of sale implying authority in the purchaser to incumber the property, voluntarily or involuntarily, in such a way as to supersede the prior lien for purchase money. The instrument so reserving title of a chattel partakes of the nature of a mortgage, the vendor being mortgagee, the vendee the mortgagor. As a general rule, say all the authorities, a mortgagor cannot create a lien upon the property to take precedence over his recorded mortgage. Jones on Chattel Mortgages, § 472. This authority says:

"An agreement which will defeat the purpose of the transaction should not be inferred or implied against a mortgagee without very cogent evidence."

Following the general rule referred to we find directly in point the case of Denison v. Shuler, 47 Mich. 598, 11 N. W. 402, 41 Am. Rep. 734, opinion by Graves, C. J., holding that a mechanics' lien for repairs is subordinate to a prior duly recorded mortgage thereon for the purchase money. This case involved repairs on a steam engine which was then in the possession of the defendants, the mechanics, and held by them for the repair bill of $185.86. The court, referring to the fact that the plaintiff had furnished the machine, says:

"The repairers did less. Their expenditure was comparatively small and they acted in making it under circumstances which charged them with notice of the plaintiff's prior lien. Why should their claim be preferred?"

What was said by Chief Justice Marshall, in Rankin v. Scott, 12 Wheat. 177, 179, 6 L. Ed. 592, referred to by the Michigan court, is as applicable here as in that case, namely, that a prior lien gives a prior claim, which is entitled to prior satisfaction of the subject it binds, unless the lien be intrinsically defective, or be displaced by some act of the party holding it, which shall postpone him in a court of law or equity to a subsequent claimant.

The comparatively recent case of Shaw v. Webb, 131 Tenn. 173, 174 S. W. 273, L. R. A. 1915D, 1141, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 626, involved the lien of a repairer of an automobile, first a common-law lien lost by surrender of possession, but for which the statute also gave him a lien. In that case the court in a well considered opinion, which reviews many of the decisions and analyzes them, held that the lien given by statute was subordinate to the lien of the vendor of the chattel reserved to secure the payment of the purchase money notes, and that if the vendor intended to subordinate his lien to that of the mechanic for repairs, it should be manifested in the contract (in that case in the purchase money notes), in which the title was reserved to secure the payment thereof, else the notes would be deprived of a considerable element of marketability. In Baughman Automobile Co. v. Emanuel, 137 Ga. 354, 73 S. E. 511, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 97, the common-law lien of the repairer of an automobile was held to be subordinate to the rights of the vendor in his title retained to secure the purchase money. In that case it appears that the lien claimant had notice of the rights of the conditional vendor. Here our recording statute was the legal equivalent, for it gave defendant record or constructive notice binding him.

An examination of the cases apparently in conflict with those cited and others that might be referred to, unless it be those of New Jersey constituting an exception, will show that wherever such common-law lien has been allowed to supersede a lien reserved by the vendor of the chattel, the courts have attempted at least to refer their conclusions to some actual or implied authority of the vendor or mortgagee to have the chattel kept in repair. An illustration is the case of Hammond v. Danielson, 126 Mass. 294, involving a mortgage of a hack described as "let for hire," and "now in use." From which authority was implied in the mortgagor to keep the vehicle in repair. And in accordance with this class of cases, it was sought in the present case to imply authority in the vendee to cause the automobile to be repaired, because of the fact that plaintiff knew that the purchaser intended to use the machine on some occasions to carry passengers for hire. No such authority was given in the recorded contract. May he not stand on that, if he has done nothing in the meantime to deprive him of his rights? The facts agreed show nothing justifying any such implied authority.

For the reasons aforesaid, we are of opinion that plaintiff is entitled to recover possession of the property sued for, and that the judgment below must be reversed. But as the facts agreed do not include the value of the property, and the court made no finding thereon, before a final judgment the value of the property must be ascertained as provided by section 6 of chapter 102 (sec. 4403) of the Code.

We, therefore, reverse the judgment and remand the case to the circuit court, with direction by proper proceedings to ascertain the value of the property and give judgment for the plaintiff for possession thereof, if possession thereof can be had, if not for the value thereof, with costs according to law.

ZINN v. CABOT. (No. 4185.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 1, 1921.)

1. Master and servant \S 351—Employer not assenting to Compensation Act only liable for injury resulting from negligence.

An employer whose business comes within the purview of the Workmen's Compensation Act,¹ and who does not take advantage of the immunity afforded thereby, is not liable to an employé injured in his service, unless such injury results from his negligence.

2. Master and servant \S 356—Compensation Act only deprives nonassenting employer of defense of assumed risk from own negligence.

The provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act denying to employers who do not comply with its terms the common-law defense of assumption of risk does not mean that the employer is liable in damages for every injury received by an employé in his service, but only deprives him of the defense that the employé assumed the risk of injury resulting from the employer's negligence, because such employé knew of such risk and remained in the service with such knowledge.

3. Master and servant \S 295(1)—Instruction on assumption of risk should be limited to risks from employer's negligence.

An instruction in an action for damages for personal injury which tells the jury that the employer in the particular case cannot avail himself of the defense of assumption of risk, without limiting the same to such risks as result from the employer's negligence, is misleading and should not be given.

4. Trial \S 243 — Inconsistent instructions should not be given.

It is error to give inconsistent instructions inasmuch as the jury is left to decide which theory of the law as thus presented is correct, and renders it impossible for the court to determine upon what legal principle the verdict is based.

5. Judgment \S 199(3) — Judgment non obstante veredicto must be based upon pleadings and not upon evidence.

A judgment non obstante veredicto must be based upon the merits of the case as disclosed by the pleadings, and not in any sense upon the evidence adduced upon the trial.

Error to Circuit Court, Roane County.

Action by W. H. Zinn against Godfrey L. Cabot. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Thos. P. Ryan, of Spencer, and Hogg & Hogg, of Point Pleasant, for defendant in error.

Pendleton, Mathews & Bell, of Spencer, for plaintiff in error.

RITZ, P. The defendant by this writ of error seeks reversal of a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for damages for personal injuries received by him while in defendant's employ, upon the ground that the court misdirected the jury, that the verdict is not supported by the evidence, and that the same is excessive.

The defendant had a gas well in Roane county, the casing in which had become broken so as to admit water into the well. To repair this damage a string of smaller casing was inserted in the inside of the casing then in the well down to the point where the same was broken, at which point what is known as a wall packer was to be placed thereon, which would have the effect of supporting the inside casing and also of stopping the leak in the larger casing. The plaintiff was employed by the defendant to assist in doing this work. The casing consisted of sections of iron pipe, and in order to get these in the well an appliance called an elevator was fastened to one end thereof upon which was a collar and the casing raised in a vertical position by the derrick, and then dropped into the well until the upper end thereof was even with the surface of the derrick floor. This section was then held in that position while with another elevator another section was raised and screwed into the collar end of the section thus suspended in the well, after which the elevator used to hold the first section was released, and the sections thus screwed together were dropped down until the top of the second section was level with the derrick floor, and this process was continued alternately using the elevators for securing the string of casing in the well and raising the new section to be attached thereto. At the time of the plaintiff's injury the string of casing had been completed, and had reached the point at which the wall packer was to be placed thereon. In order to attach this wall packer and make it operate, it was necessary to drop what is termed a baller into the casing by means of which a disk was broken releasing the springs in the wall packer, and making it catch on the side of the outside casing. The string of casing at that time projected somewhat above the derrick floor. It was being supported by one of the elevators around a collar at the derrick floor. The other elevator had been used to raise a short piece of casing which extended above the floor, and which was to be removed when the string of casing had been lowered to its permanent position. In order to drop this baller in it became necessary to disengage the elevator attached to the top of the string of casing, for the reason that it obstructed the opening. This elevator was disconnected and propped up with what is called a casing pole. The bailer was then dropped in the well and the disk broken, and the plaintiff, under instructions from the foreman, got up on a stool for the purpose of hooking up the elevator, when the same fell and caught his hand between a hook or link and the top of the casing, and severed two of his fingers.

The proof shows beyond contradiction that this work was being done in the usual and ordinary way. It is shown that the ordinary and usual way in which to support the elevator which had been disengaged was to prop it up with a casing pole, and it is shown that the casing pole used on this occasion was of the kind which is ordinarily used at oil and gas wells. It is not shown, nor is there any indication, that there was negligence in the method of doing the work. There is some suggestion in the plaintiff's evidence that the casing pole was greasy, but it is not indicated how this contributed, if it did contribute, to the accident. About all that the plaintiff's evidence shows in this regard is that the casing pole fell and his fingers were caught between a link or hook and the top of the casing. The pole was supported at the bottom against a pile of pipe or some pieces of timber fastened to the floor of the derrick three feet from the base of the casing in the well. As to just how it engaged the elevator at the top does not appear. Whether it fell because it was improperly secured at the bottom or improperly secured at the top is not indicated. As before stated, there is no suggestion in the plaintiff's evidence as to what caused it to fall. The defendant's foreman, who was present and in charge of the work, testifies that when the plaintiff got up on the stool for the purpose of hooking the elevator back, he lost his balance and fell against the pole, and this is the only explanation made in any of the evidence as to the cause of the accident. The plaintiff denies this, however, and says that he did not touch the pole prior to the accident, and did not lose his balance and fall against it.

[1, 2] It appears that the defendant did not avail himself of the benefits of the Workmen's Compensation Act (Code Supp. 1918, c. 15P), and is therefore deprived of certain defenses of which he could have taken advantage prior to the passage of that act. However, even since the passage of that act, one who does not take advantage of it is not liable in damages for every injury sustained by his employes. The basis of such an action is negligence, and, unless some negligence is traced to the employer, there is no cause of action. This negligence may be some defect in the working place, or may be some improper method of doing the work by some of the injured employe's fellow servants, but, unless there is some failure upon the part of the employer to do something which he should do for the employe's safety, or the commission of some act by him or his servants which results in the injury, there can be no recovery. It is true the statute deprives the employer who fails to take advantage of the Workmen's Compensation Act, among other defenses, of the defense of assumption of risk, but we have repeatedly held that this did not mean that the employe did not assume some risk. He still assumes the risks arising from his own negligence and ordinarily incident to the employment. The risks which he does not assume are those which come from the master's negligence, of which he has notice, and which prior to the enactment of the Workmen's Compensation Law, because of his knowledge thereof and his remaining in the employment after such knowledge, he was held to have assumed, notwithstanding they were produced by the negligence of the employer. De Francesco v. Mining Co., 76 W. Va. 756, 86 S. E. 777; Watts v. Railway Co., 78 W. Va. 144, 88 S. E. 659; Louis v. Construction Co., 80 W. Va. 159, 92 S. E. 249; Wilkin v. Koppers Co., 84 W. Va. 460, 100 S. E. 300. There being no evidence in this case indicating that there was any negligence upon the part of the defendant which contributed to the injury, the peremptory instruction asked for should have been given.

[3, 4] Inasmuch as the case must go back for a retrial, it is necessary for us to pass upon the instructions given on the motion of the plaintiff. The first instruction given informs the jury that the defendant cannot rely upon the defenses of contributory negligence, assumption of risk, or the negligence of fellow servants. This instruction should not have been given. It is true that under the statute the defendant could not rely upon the defense of assumption of risk, but giving the instruction to the jury in the broad language which was used in this case was equivalent to directing a verdict for the plaintiff. As before stated, under our decisions the employe does assume certain risks, and it is only those risks which result from the master's negligence which are not assumed. This instruction in its literal sense, and as it would ordinarily be understood, would hold the defendant responsible for an injury from any cause, even one caused by the plaintiff's own negligence. It is true the court gave on behalf of the defendant an instruction to the effect that before a recovery could be had they must find that the defendant had been negligent. These two instructions, giving to the language its ordinary meaning, were conflicting. The instruction given in this regard on behalf of the defendant was proper, but we are unable to say whether the jury followed the correct instruction given on motion of the defendant or the too comprehensive instruction given on the motion of the plaintiff. It is error to give inconsistent instructions for the very good reason that the jury is left to decide which theory of the law as thus presented is correct, and renders it impossible for the court to determine upon what legal principle the verdict is based. Penix v. Grafton, 86 W. Va. 278, 103 S. E. 106.

Criticism is made of another instruction given on behalf of the plaintiff to the effect that the jury in ascertaining his damages could consider his physical condition before the accident as compared with his physical condition immediately thereafter; it being argued that the evidence does not show that there was any difference in his physical condition before and after the accident. This criticism is not well taken. The fact appears that two of his fingers were severed from his hand, and this certainly made a difference in his physical condition.

[5] The defendant insists that he is entitled to have a judgment rendered here, notwithstanding the verdict of the jury, and asks that that be done. A judgment non obstante veredicto must be based upon the merits of the case as disclosed by the pleadings, and not in any sense upon the evidence introduced upon a material issue properly joined. Where the pleadings make a case for relief, a judgment will not be rendered in opposition to the jury's verdict, upon the ground that the evidence does not prove the case made by the pleadings. If a party desires the conclusive judgment of the court upon the evidence, he should demur thereto. Holt v. Elevator Co., 78 W. Va. 785, 90 S. E. 333, L. R. A. 1917A, 1194; Shafer v. Trust Co., 82 W. Va. 618, 97 S. E. 290.

For the reasons aforesaid, the judgment of the circuit court is reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and a new trial awarded.

MOSS v. MOSS et al. (No. 5968.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 8, 1921.)

1. Specific performance §121(2)—Verbal gift of land by father to son must be supported by clear evidence, possession, and improvements.

In order to enforce specific performance of a verbal gift of land by father to son, evidence of the gift must be direct, clear, and unambiguous, sufficient to identify the subject-matter as to location and quantity, and followed by notorious and exclusive possession and substantial improvement of the same. Loose declarations of the father, without more, are not sufficient.

2. Specific performance §121(2)—Evidence insufficient to justify specific enforcement of parol gift of land by father to son.

Where the proof on which depends right to relief by decree for specific performance of a parol gift of land by a father to his son is indefinite and indecisive, and tends to disclose an intention not to vest title in the son by deed but by a devise in his will, operative after death, and in the meantime to permit the concurrent use and enjoyment of the land by both, and it is so used and enjoyed by them in common afterwards for residential, agricultural, and other like purposes, and the father grants oil and gas leases and pipe line easements, and collects and appropriates the compensation therefor, and pays all taxes assessed against the land, equity will not require the father to convey the land to the son, either by a deed granting a present estate, or by one granting the property subject to a life estate reserved to the father.

3. Specific performance §39—Parol contract for conveyance of land by father to son not enforced in absence of definite agreement acted upon.

Nor will the court grant the relief sought on the basis of a parol contract to the same effect, likewise relied on by the son, and based upon a surrender of a valuable right as consideration therefor, where the same indefiniteness of agreement, want of exclusive possession, and failure to erect valuable improvements, which operated to defeat enforcement of the parol gift, likewise make the acts of the parties insufficient to justify removal of the bar of the statute of frauds to permit enforcement of the verbal contract.

4. Trusts §77—To establish resulting trust, payment of price must have occurred before conveyance.

In order to establish a resulting trust in property, legal title to which is in another, upon the ground of payment of the whole or a part of the purchase money therefor, it generally is prerequisite to show that the consideration was paid, or some obligation therefor assumed, at or before the conveyance of the legal title to the grantee. The subsequent payment or assumption thereof will not, by relation, attach such trust to the original purchase.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Calhoun County.

Suit by James M. Moss against W. M. Moss and another. From the decree, defendants appeal. Reversed and bill dismissed.

Lorentz C. Hamilton, of Grantsville, for appellants.

S. P. Bell and A. G. Mathews, both of Grantsville, for appellee.

LYNOH, J. The bill is to enforce specific performance of an alleged verbal gift by W. M. Moss to his son James M. Moss in June, 1903, of a tract containing about 85 acres of land in Calhoun county. The decree complained of by defendants W. M. Moss and his wife Mary S., plaintiff's stepmother, did not grant the prayer of the bill, but treated the father as holding the title to the land in trust for himself and his son in the proportions of 500/1000 and 1125/1000, respectively, and provided that if the son should, within 30 days from its date, pay the father $530, he and his wife should within 10 days thereafter convey the title to the son by an apt and proper deed; and that if the son should, within the time limit so fixed, fail to pay the $530, the father should have the option, within the next ensuing 30-day period, to pay the son $1,125, whereupon the latter should convey all his right, title, and interest in the land to the father; and in the event that neither father nor son should desire to purchase the interest of the other, the land was to be sold and the proceeds divided between the parties in the proportions named above.

The bill and no other pleading prayed for the relief granted, and no evidence introduced by either party warranted it in that form. In other words, if plaintiff was entitled to the land, the court by its decree should have vindicated that right, and, if not so entitled, should have dismissed the bill. The cause presents but one of the two alternatives and no other. There is therefore but one question to be decided; that is, whether plaintiff by his evidence has made a case warranting the relief he seeks.

Apparently the court had serious doubt whether the evidence was sufficient to support a decree for specific performance, conceding the bill to be unobjectionable on any ground of proper challenge, and that equity has jurisdiction to enforce a parol gift of land; on neither of which propositions is there any room for doubt where the intended beneficiary has entered into possession by virtue of the preconceived gratuity, made substantial improvements, and complied with other requirements indicative of exclusive dominion over the land, with the permission, knowledge, and consent of the benefactor.

Plaintiff did enter upon the land in June, 1903, soon after his marriage, or, to be more exact, continued to reside thereon with his father as he had been doing since the latter acquired the property in 1901, and has thenceforward, he says, retained exclusive possession without let or hindrance from any source, and now retains it as against his father subject to the requirement for a deed of grant therefor, the right to which now depends upon the just determination of this cause. That he has continued to reside thereon during the period stated, excepting about nine months, when for prudential reasons, as he attempts to explain, he resided elsewhere, but in the meantime tilled and used it, seems to be conceded, with this reservation, that the father relies upon the nine months' absence as a virtual abandonment of the premises. Whether the latter can or cannot derive any substantial advantage from the temporary absence from the land for residential purposes, or predicate thereon right to withhold a deed of grant on that account, it is not necessary to say: (1) Because the son re-established his residence on the land at the end of the nine months' period with the knowledge of the father and without objection by him; and (2) it is not denied that the son retained at least a qualified or constructive control during the interim.

It is the character of plaintiff's possession and not the fact of possession about which there is such a wide and apparently irreconcilable disagreement, and on the determination of which depends the proper adjudication of the respective rights of the parties. In other words, there is no question as to plaintiff's right to occupy the land during the life of his father and stepmother, but this right of occupancy, the father contends, is subject to his right to control and exercise such dominion over the land as he may desire or deem necessary for the use of himself and wife while living, and upon the death of both to become and remain the property of the son.

For residential and tillage purposes plaintiff has occupied the 85 acres continuously from June, 1903, to the date of the institution of this suit in 1917, a period of 14 years. But at no time was his occupancy exclusive or his dominion complete. Both families lived on the tract, part of the time in the same house, until the year 1909 or 1910, when the father moved onto an adjoining 31-acre parcel, where he has since continued to reside. His change of residence to the smaller tract, however, did not effect a discontinuance of his use of the 85 acres, according to his testimony sustained by other proof. Until the controversy reached an acute stage due to an altercation and personal encounter between father and son, each of them farmed and used parts of the larger tract in different ways and for different purposes, each taking to himself the fruits of his labor. Much testimony goes to show that each of them performed labor, expended money to improve the land, as by building fences, sowing grass seed, planting fruit trees, repairing buildings, including the dwelling house and outhouses, digging a well, clearing and grubbing, and used it for the pasture of stock individually owned by them. Plaintiff, it seems, with the assistance of his father, constructed a small log house to be used as a residence for himself and family, a corncrib and smokehouse, but the value of these admittedly is slight. True, plaintiff testified that he expended $200 of his wife's money in purchasing fencing wire and fruit trees and in clearing part of the tract, and in this she corroborates him. Even granting that they have expended all that they claim to have spent in improvements and upkeep, though the testimony in support thereof, including their own, is by no means definite and positive, the aggregate is slight when considered in connection with the number of years they have been living on the property. There is some conflict in the testimony with regard to whether the residence occupied by defendants on the 85 acres until 1909 or 1910 was built before or after the date of the alleged gift in 1903, the father contending that it was erected after, and plaintiff before, that date. The same conflict obtains with regard to the two barns built and used by them on the property. But whatever the date, there is no doubt that defendant, not plaintiff, erected them.

As already noted, both families continued to reside on the 85 acres until defendants moved to the 31-acre parcel where their residence now is, and since their departure plaintiff has occupied the home thus left vacant. But the father continued to exercise dominion and control over the larger tract. He leased it for oil and gas purposes, granted a pipe line right of way through it, and to his own use appropriated the rentals for the lease and consideration for the right of way, and paid the taxes assessed against the land. That he paid the taxes the son admits, but accompanies the admission with the explanation that, as the father collected the rentals and compensation for the lease and right of way, he should in return therefor protect the land from the consequences of the delinquency that must have ensued upon their nonpayment, especially since he held the legal title to the 85-acre tract and was chargeable and charged therewith on the landbooks of the county. The testimony as to the facts is grossly conflicting, except that relating to the lease and pipe line easement and the assessment and payment of taxes, as to which there is no dispute.

Judged by the testimony, though in some respects inconsistent, the work and labor performed by the father and son combined did not substantially enhance the value of the land. Some witnesses even express the opinion that it was less valuable after than it was before the labor was performed and money expended upon it. Others also attribute to the son the casual remark that he did not intend to do anything more by way of improving the land than was necessary to support himself and family, because of the uncertainty of his father's intention to vest the title in him.

The most substantial or at least the most reasonable view of the respective rights of the parties is the agreement predicated upon these facts: Some time prior to 1900 the father purchased and paid the full consideration for a tract of 51 acres of land in Roane county, and caused the deed of grant to be made to his wife and two children, plaintiff and his sister, none of whom except defendant Mary S. Moss was at that time 21 years of age. This tract the father and his wife sold and conveyed to a purchaser for $510 some time prior to the date of the alleged gift to plaintiff in 1903, upon the assurance to the purchaser that when the minor grantees attained their majority, they also would unite in the execution of a deed to him, as they afterwards did in 1904, with the understanding, as plaintiff claims, that the 85 acres which the father had purchased with part of the consideration derived from the sale of the Roane county land was to take the place of his interest in the latter tract, but, as the father claims, that he would by his will devise the 85 acres to plaintiff and the adjoining 70½ acres to his daughter, the wife of Howard Metz, Mrs. Metz and the plaintiff being his only children and the two tracts his only real estate, except the 31-acre parcel already referred to. Because part of the consideration derived from the sale of the Roane county land was used in the purchase of the 85 acres, plaintiff claims that such appropriation of his one-third share of the proceeds, or $170, gives him an additional equitable interest in the latter tract. But even if his consent to unite in the deed granting the Roane county land should be sufficient consideration to support defendant's oral promise to give him the 85 acres in return therefor, thereby making it an oral contract to exchange properties instead of a parol gift, yet it has repeatedly been held that payment of consideration alone is not enough to remove the bar of the statute of frauds. Gallagher v. Gallagher, 31 W. Va. 9, 5 S. E. 297; Miller v. Lorentz, 39 W. Va. 160, 19 S. E. 391; Summers v. Hively, 78 W. Va. 53, 88 S. E. 608; Gibson v. Stalnaker, 106 S. E. 243, recently decided, and not yet officially reported. More depends upon the character of the possession and improvements made thereunder than upon the payment of the consideration.

However that may be, there is another potent fact to be considered in connection with the conveyance of the 51 acres. There is testimony sufficient to warrant the inference that the promise made by the father on that occasion, and on other occasions when discussing his intention as to the 85-acre tract, was that he would by will devise the latter tract to plaintiff. If that was the understanding, the promise tends strongly to support the father's view that not until his death was the title to that tract to become vested in plaintiff. That such was the real intention seems to find strong corroboration in the testimony of the plaintiff himself, for he telephoned to the attorney employed by the father to write his will for the sole purpose, as he admits, of ascertaining whether the will so prepared did in fact contain the provision promised by the father, and was assured that the will was favorable to him, the son. The anxiety prompting the inquiry is not explainable upon any hypothesis other than that there was such an agreement or understanding, and that upon that basis plaintiff entered upon the cultivation of the 85-acre tract, and joined in the execution of the deed for the 51 acres. Short v. Patton, 79 W. Va. 179, 90 S. E. 598.

But defendants contend that, even if these facts be not sufficient to show lack of right to require specific execution of the contract relied on by plaintiff, the latter afterwards by deed, acting as intermediary between his father and stepmother, vested the fee-simple title to the 70½ and 85 acre tracts in the latter in 1905, and she later in her husband, W. M. Moss, in February, 1917, through W. M. Price as intermediary, and also that by this act plaintiff recognized the substantial ownership of the 85-acre tract to be in his father. To the participants in this transaction the bill imputes no fraudulent intent, nor is there proof of an intention to defraud, though plaintiff does show by Price that no consideration was paid or promised to him for the part he took in the latter transaction, and by himself that the purpose of the deed to Mrs. Moss was to protect the property of his father from the probable award against him of a judgment for a fine and costs in the prosecution of an indictment for a felony then pending against him. But even if the bill did seek to impeach these transactions as fraudulent, the allegation to that effect would not avail plaintiff, who, so far as disclosed, voluntarily participated in its consummation. For by the unanimous concurrence of judicial decisions and text-writers, a conveyance, however fraudulent the intention, is valid as to the parties who with knowledge of the purpose voluntarily enter into the transaction. Core v. Cunningham, 27 W. Va. 206; Holmes v. Harshberger, 31 W. Va. 518, 7 S. E. 452; Poling v. Williams, 55 W. Va. 69, 46 S. E. 704; 12 R. C. L. p. 473. What is said in this connection, though not controlling, merely shows the futility of the indirect challenge to the motives prompting the execution of these deeds. They vest the title where it was on the date of the alleged gift, and in no wise militate against enforced performance of the parol agreement. But it is the divestative fact witnessed by the consummated transaction upon which defendants rely, because, they say, it weighs heavily, if not preclusively, in that it shows the futility of depending upon a gift made two years before. According to their contention, the deed executed in 1905 goes far towards defeating the right to compel the execution of the deed for land so claimed by plaintiff; and he does not pretend that W. M. Moss thereafter reaffirmed his intention to convey the land to him otherwise than by a devise. But the transfer of the title in this manner, being contemporaneous, constitutes but one transaction, and as its ultimate aim was to reinvest the title where it originally was, it can have no such effect as that for which defendants claim.

forced construction, may have led some of them to believe in the existence of an intention and purpose on his part to bestow upon his only son title to the tract now claimed by him. But little of this testimony really warrants even the inference of an intention to part with the title before the death of the father and wife, both of whom now are well advanced in years and no longer able to engage in manual labor as doubtless they once did, for it was in this manner that they were enabled to pay for the land they own. The assistance of the son, then a minor, if any he rendered, was such only as was due from him in discharge of his filial duties.

"To establish an equitable title to land in a child, under a parol gift thereof by the parent, it is necessary to prove, by direct, unequivocal and clear evidence, the gift, identification of the subject-matter as to location and quantity, notorious and exclusive possession thereof, and substantial improvement of the same." Short v. Patton, 79 W. Va. 179, pt. 1, syl., 90 S. E. 598; White v. White, 64 W. Va. 30, 60 S. E. 885; Meadows v. Meadows, 60 W. Va. 34, 53 S. E. 718; Holsberry v. Harris, 56 W. Va. 320, 49 S. E. 404; Miller v. Lorentz, 39 W. Va. 160, 19 S. E. 391; Harrison v. Harrison, 36 W. Va. 556, 15 S. E. 87.

Three important elements to be considered in such cases are here clouded in doubt, uncertainty, and ambiguity, and a fourth points directly to the support of defendants' contention. There is direct conflict in the testimony of the respective parties with regard to the father's intent to bestow the gratuity, the son insisting it was a present gift with full rights and enjoyment, the father that legal title was to pass only upon his death, with the right bestowed upon the son to enjoy possession of the tract in the meantime concurrent with the father. The evidence is not as direct, clear, and positive in support of plaintiff's position as the law requires; indeed, the preponderance is adverse to his claim. There is similar conflict with respect to the exclusiveness of plaintiff's possession, and on this issue much testimony to show that the father continued down to the time of the institution of the suit to exercise control over such portions of the tract as he desired. As said in Holsberry v. Harris, supra:

"Such possession of a son under an alleged gift must be definite and exclusive, and not concurrent with the father."

Moreover, the improvements made by him are not of such substantial and permanent character as is required in such cases. And, finally, it is conceded that the father has paid all the taxes on the property since the year 1901, when he first acquired it. The case of Berry v. Berry, 83 W. Va. 763, 99 S. E. 79, relied on by plaintiff, is clearly distinguishable from this in the exclusiveness of the donee's possession and her substantial contribution to the valuable improvements made on the property.

[2] From a consideration of all these facts and circumstances, we are of opinion that plaintiff has failed to establish by direct, positive, and unambiguous proof that the gift took the form for which he contends. Much testimony supports the father's position; in fact, the preponderance of the evidence tends to uphold his contention. The care and high quality of proof which must be exercised and required in cases of this character is well illustrated by the experience of the commonwealth of Virginia. The specific enforcement of parol gifts of land became such a prolific source of fraud in that state that a statute was enacted prohibiting the enforcement of such gifts, even when followed by possession thereunder and improvement of the land by the donee or those claiming under him. Wohlford v. Wohlford, 121 Va. 699, 93 S. E. 629; Brooks v. Clintsman, 124 Va. 736, 98 S. E. 742, 100 S. E. 394.

But plaintiff insists that, even if he is not entitled at this time, under the evidence, to specific performance of the alleged gift, yet, accepting defendants' interpretation of the conversation with respect to the 85-acre tract as postponing plaintiff's right thereto until the death of his father and stepmother, even that right should be protected and safeguarded by a decree requiring them to execute a deed conveying to him the property in question, subject to a life estate reserved for them; this upon the theory that plaintiff's consent to unite in the deed of 1904, conveying his interest in the Roane county 51 acres, was sufficient consideration to support his father's oral promise to give him the 85 acres in lieu thereof. But treating this agreement as a contract for the exchange of properties instead of as a parol gift, we are again confronted by the positive inhibition of the statute of frauds, and the same indefiniteness of agreement, want of valuable improvements, and concurrent possession and control with his father, which operated to defeat enforcement of the parol gift, are equally insufficient to justify removal of the statutory bar from the former. Gibson v. Stalnaker, 106 S. E. 243, recently decided.

[3] Plaintiff rests his final claim for relief upon the ground that, because of his execution of the deed of 1904 conveying his one-third interest in the Roane county land, previously sold by his father, the consideration from which was in part used by the latter in paying for the 85 acres acquired in 1901, a resulting or constructive trust has arisen in his favor which may be established by parol proof. His contention as to the admissibility of parol testimony to establish such a trust is undoubtedly sound. Currence v. Ward, 43 W. Va. 367, 27 S. E. 329.

[4] And it is equally true as a general proposition that where, upon purchase of property, the conveyance of the legal title is taken in the name of one person, while the whole or part of the consideration is given or paid by another, not as a loan to the grantee, a resulting trust immediately arises from the transaction, and the person named in the conveyance will be deemed and treated as trustee for the party from whom the consideration proceeds. Currence v. Ward, cited. But there is an equally definite exception or qualification to the operation of the rule, namely, that the consideration must be paid, or some obligation assumed therefor, at or before the sale and conveyance of the legal title to the grantee, and the subsequent payment or assumption thereof will not, by relation, attach such trust to the original purchase. Smith v. Turley, 32 W. Va. 14, 9 S. E. 46; Currence v. Ward, 43 W. Va. 367, 27 S. E. 329; Harris v. Elliott, 45 W. Va. 245, 32 S. E. 176; Moore v. Mustoe, 47 W. Va. 549, 35 S. E. 871, 81 Am. St. Rep. 812; Watts Brothers & Co. v. Frith, 79 W. Va. 89, 91 S. E. 402; 1 Perry on Trusts (6th Ed.) § 126; 39 Cyc. 128; 26 R. C. L. p. 1223.

Whatever the date of defendants' sale of the 51 acres in Roane county, it of course did not affect plaintiff's title to or interest in it until 1904, when he and his sister executed a deed conveying their right, title, and interest to the purchaser. His father already had acquired the legal title to the 85 acres 3 years prior to the son's execution of his deed. The fact that the purchaser advanced part or all of the consideration for the 51 acres in reliance upon the father's assurance that his children would execute a deed on coming of age, and that the father applied part of this money to payment of the purchase price of the 85 acres, cannot aid plaintiff, for he yielded nothing of his interest in the Roane county land till 1904. Even granting that his interest therein was a valuable one, owned by him in his own right, though he paid nothing for it his father having voluntarily had the deed made to his wife and two children jointly while the latter were minors, yet until 1904 he had surrendered no part of it, and before he executed the deed his father had completed paying for the 85-acre tract. Hence under all the authorities no resulting trust could or did arise in his behalf.

For these reasons we are of opinion to reverse the decree, dismiss the bill, and award defendants their costs incurred upon this appeal and in the circuit court.

STATE ex rel. CONSTANZO v. KINDELB-BERGER et al. (No. 4281.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 8, 1921.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Highways —186—Warrant for operating vehicle of insufficient width of tires held not to charge violation of statute.

A warrant for the arrest of a person, charging him with operating upon the public roads a vehicle, the weight of which, including the load thereon, is more than 600 pounds per inch width of tire, the total width of the four tires being included in computing the weight thereof, does not charge a violation of law under the provisions of section 126, c. 66, Acts of 1917 (Code Supp. 1918, c. 43, § 126 [sec. 1940—126]), and a motion to quash should prevail.

2. Prohibition —3(4)—Writ will lie where accusation insufficient to charge offense, although appellate court has not passed on question of jurisdiction.

In such case the justice of the peace and the appellate court, if an appeal be awarded from the justice's court, are without jurisdiction, and prohibition will lie at the instance of the accused, although the appellate court has not passed upon the question of jurisdiction, and although the accused has some other adequate remedy.

Application for writ of prohibition by the State, on the relation of Frank Constanzo against John W. Kindelberger, Justice, and others. Writ awarded.

J. M. Ritz, Thos. B. Foulk, and George A. Blackford, all of Wheeling, for relator.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., Charles Ritchie, Asst. Atty. Gen., Carl G. Bachmann and Austin V. Wood, both of Wheeling, for respondents.

LIVELY, J. Kindelberger, a justice of the peace of Ohio county, on February 12, 1921, issued a warrant for Constanzo, charging him with operating and driving upon the county roads of that county and upon the streets of the city of Wheeling a motor vehicle, the weight of which including the load was more than 600 pounds per inch width of tire, the total width of the four tires being included in computing the weight thereof. At the trial his counsel moved to quash the complaint and warrant, which motion being overruled, defendant refused to plead. The justice entered the plea of not guilty, for him, heard the evidence, found defendant guilty, fined him $100 and sentenced him to 10 days in jail at hard labor. Defendant gave bond, and appealed to the criminal court of Ohio county, where the case is now pending, and immediately applied to this court for, and obtained, this rule in prohibition against Hon. A. H. Robinson, judge of the criminal court, to show cause why he should not be prohibited from hearing or trying the case.

Constanzo asserts that the warrant does not charge him with the commission of an offense against the laws of this state; that he has committed no offense; and that the justice and criminal court are without jurisdiction for that reason.

The statute under which this warrant was issued, and on which the prosecution is predicated, is section 126 of chapter 66, Acts 1917 (Code Supp. 1918, c. 43, § 126 [sec. 1940—126]), the pertinent portion of which reads:

"No vehicle in excess of ninety inches in width shall be operated upon the highways of this state * * * nor shall any vehicle, including load, exceeding thirty thousand pounds in weight, or on which the weight of the load is more than six hundred pounds per inch width of tire, the total width of the four tires being included in computing the weight thereof, be operated upon the highways of this state unless by special permit from one of the authorities hereinbefore designated, and then only upon highways specially constructed for heavy traffic."

The state asserts that it was the intention of the Legislature in this act to protect the roads and streets from destruction, and that no more than 600 pounds per inch width of tire, including weight of car and load, should be permitted; and that the section quoted should be construed to read:

"Nor shall any vehicle, including load, exceeding 30,000 lbs. in weight * * * or more than 600 lbs. per inch width of tire, the total width of the four tires being included in computing the weight thereof. * * *"

The main reason confidently relied upon by the state for discharging the rule is that prohibition is not the proper remedy. The uses and purposes of prohibition and the class of cases in which the writ will issue have been under discussion so often and so recently in this court and the holdings are so well settled that it would serve no useful purpose to review the cases or reiterate the principles enunciated. In all cases, when the inferior court has not jurisdiction of the subject-matter in controversy, the writ will lie. This is the very language of the statute, and is but declaratory of the common law. Now what is the rule for determining jurisdiction? Does this warrant charge an offense? If it does, then the criminal court will have jurisdiction to try all matters of law and fact arising therein, unless it should exceed its legitimate powers while doing so. If there is no offense charged, then there is no jurisdiction. But it is argued that the criminal court should first determine whether an offense is charged, and whether it will assume jurisdiction, and, if perchance the court should take jurisdiction, refuse to discharge Constanzo, try the case, and find him guilty, then a writ of error would lie, and that procedure would be the proper course, instead of invoking the extraordinary remedy of prohibition. The answer to this is that prohibition is a writ of right, and Constanzo may elect to pursue it rather than invoke some other remedy. By the writ he is given a quick and efficacious remedy, and if the court does not have jurisdiction, he is saved the costs and delays incidental to a jury trial. There is an exhaustive and illuminating discussion of the remedy in State v. Godfrey, 54 W. Va. 54, 46 S. E. 185, where there is a review of all our cases and of the English decisions, with a dissenting opinion by Judge Brannon. Whenever it appears that a court is proceeding in a cause without jurisdiction, prohibition will issue, regardless of the existence of other remedies. Jennings v. McDougle, 83 W. Va. 187, 98 S. E. 162; Hatfield v. Graham, 73 W. Va. 759, 81 S. E. 533, L. R. A. 1915A, 175, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 1; Well v. Black, 76 W. Va. 685, 86 S. E. 666; State v. Studebaker, 80 W. Va. 673, 93 S. E. 755. Where the inferior court has not jurisdiction, it may be prohibited from proceeding, though the record does not disclose that the party praying for the petition in any manner asked the inferior court to dismiss the proceedings. Swinburn v. Smith, 15 W. Va. 483; Marsh v. O'Brien, 82 W. Va. 508, 96 S. E. 795. If a justice of the peace has no jurisdiction, an appeal from his decision confers no jurisdiction on the appellate court. 3 C. J. § 123.

[1] Does the complaint and warrant charge Constanzo with the commission of an offense? This is the vital question here. The statute reads:

"Nor shall any vehicle, including load, exceeding thirty thousand pounds in weight . . . be operated upon the highways of this state unless by special permit," etc.

Constanzo is not charged with this offense, namely that his vehicle, including load, exceeded 30,000 pounds. The only other offense under this section is:

Nor shall any vehicle, "on which the weight of the load is more than six hundred pounds per inch width of tire, the total width of the four tires being included in computing the weight thereof, be operated upon the highways of this state, unless by special permit," etc.

Constanzo is not charged with this offense. It is under this second or separable offense from the first named that he is sought to be prosecuted, and in order to do so he is charged with operating a motor vehicle the weight of which, including the load, is more than 600 pounds per inch width of tire, etc. The weight of the load is not to be added to the weight of the vehicle in order to make the owner liable to prosecution, unless the two weights combined exceed 30,000 pounds. Take the aggregate width of the four tires and multiply it by 600, and it will give the amount of the load which any vehicle may lawfully carry, provided the weight of the vehicle, plus the load, does not exceed 30,000 pounds. For instance, to illustrate: A truck which has an aggregate of 16 inches of its four tires may be loaded with 9,600 pounds if its weight does not exceed (30,000 pounds minus 9,600 pounds) 20,400 pounds. The state insists that this section should be construed so as to include the weight of the load with the weight of the vehicle, as above set out, the very opposite of what the statute says.

"If a statute is plain, certain, and unambiguous, so that no doubt arises from its own terms as to its scope and meaning, a bare reading suffices; then interpretation is needless." Lewis' Sutherland Stat. Con. § 363.

This is a penal statute, and if its provisions needed construction that most favorable to the accused would be adopted. Id. § 524.

It may be that this statute is unwise and was not well considered in its enactment, and will cause unreasonable injury to the roads of the state; but it is not a function of the courts to pass upon the wisdom of the laws.

[2] We are of the opinion that the complaint and warrant under which the petitioner is held do not charge an offense, and therefore the justice of the peace did not have, and the criminal court of Ohio county does not have, jurisdiction.

Writ granted.

SIZEMORE v. ROACH et al. (No. 4121.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 8, 1921.)

1. Taxation ⚡766—General recording statutes applicable to tax deeds and acknowledgment necessary.

The general recording statutes of this state are applicable to tax deeds, and unless properly acknowledged by the recorder or other officer authorized by law to execute such deeds so as to be properly admitted to record, they will be inoperative to pass the title to the land sold and thereby sought to be conveyed.

2. Acknowledgment ⚡20(1)—Recorder, when grantor in tax deed, cannot certify his own acknowledgment.

The grantor in such tax deeds, though the recorder, can not lawfully take and certify his own acknowledgment, and his attempt to do so should be regarded as abortive and unavailing.

3. Evidence ⚡370(6) — Deed properly acknowledged and recorded prima facie evidence of admission to record.

A deed properly acknowledged and spread upon the record of deeds is prima facie evidence of its having been admitted to record, although the record shows no other act of the recording officer in admitting the same to record.

4. Appeal and error \S 715(1)—Deed not appearing in certificate of evidence as having been admitted to evidence cannot be supplied by certified copy.

A deed found among the papers of an ejectment suit but not appearing in the certificate of evidence to have been admitted in evidence can not be supplied by a certified copy of such deed found among the papers in the trial court.

Error to Circuit Court, Wyoming County.

Action by J. F. Sizemore against John Roach and others. Judgment of nil caplat, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Wirt Dunlap, and R. E. Hughes, of Charleston, for plaintiff in error.

J. Albert Toler, of Pineville, for defendants in error.

MILLER, J. In an action of ejectment defendant demurred to the plaintiff's evidence, and the judgment of nil caplat now complained of was pronounced.

The land sued for was in two parcels, parts of a 300-acre tract, and aggregated about 50 acres, situated in Wyoming County. Plaintiff undertook to deraign his title to these tracts through sundry meane conveyances back to the State under a tax deed from James Cook, Recorder, dated November 16, 1870, to Hamilton Ray for the 300 acres; but when plaintiff offered in evidence not the original but the record of the deed spread upon the deed book of the said county, defendant objected, but the objection was overruled and the record of the deed admitted. Though objected to and the objection overruled, the objection is relied on by defendant in support of the judgment complained of.

Two grounds of objection were interposed: First, that the deed recited on its face that Leroy B. Chambers was the purchaser and that on June 27, 1870, he had transferred and assigned his purchase to the said Hamilton Ray for a valuable consideration, but that as the evidence of said assignment, if any, was not shown in evidence and chambers had not joined in the deed to Ray, the deed was incompetent to show title in Ray; second, that the record of the deed did not show it had ever been acknowledged by said Cook, Recorder, so as to be admissible for record, wherefore ineffective to transfer title. The only evidence found on the record of the deed to show its admissibility and effect to transfer title is as follows:

"Wyoming County Recorder's Office, the 26th day of June, 1871:

"A deed, from the Recorder of Wyoming County to Hamilton Ray, dated the 16th day of November, 1870, conveying 300 acres of land in said county, was this day presented in this office, acknowledged for record, stamped and admitted.

"A copy. Teste: James Cook, Recorder."

As to the first objection, if the deed, because of the second objection thereto, was not evidence for want of proper acknowledgment and proper record thereof we need not respond to the first objection, for it can not be allowed as evidence of anything mentioned therein. Sometimes deeds over thirty years old reciting facts such as heirship etc. When relied on with possession become evidence of those facts. Wilson v. Braden, 56 W. Va. 372, 375, 49 S. E. 409, 107 Am. St. Rep. 927. But if the record of the deed involved here is not evidence for any purpose, we can not look to it for evidence of the facts recited.

The controlling question then is, was the record of the deed properly admitted? It shows no acknowledgment by the recorder unless his own certificate quoted constituted such acknowledgment. The statute, chapter 31, Code 1868, then in force, did not in specific terms require the deed of the recorder to be acknowledged as a condition of its being admitted to record, but to be effective to transfer the title, section 25 thereof required that the purchaser should have obtained such deed and caused the same to be admitted to record. So that unless this deed was properly admitted to record, the title did not pass, and it was improperly admitted as evidence for any purpose, plaintiff not relying thereon as color of title and possession thereunder. In Black on Tax Titles, § 393. It is said:

"It is probable that, in the silence of the statute on the precise point, a tax deed, executed by the proper officer, in order to be prima facie evidence of the title in the grantee, must be proved or acknowledged as provided in the general law concerning conveyances."

[1] In State v. Harman, 57 W. Va. 447, 452, 50 S. E. 828, construing the provision of the Code of 1868 involved here, we decided that the general recording statute requiring acknowledgment as a condition of admitting deeds and other writings to record, applied to tax deeds, and that unless acknowledged or proven as required thereby, they can not be recorded, and that if recorded without such acknowledgment or proof, they pass no title. A statute of Missouri, substantially like ours, was construed in the same way in Steirlin v. Daley, 37 Mo. 483. And in Virginia it has likewise been held that a tax deed must be acknowledged by the clerk, else it is unavailing. Leftwich v. City of Richmond, 100 Va. 184, 40 S. E. 651.

[2] But does the certificate of the recorder amount to an acknowledgment by him? If so construed, it would be the act of the recorder acknowledging his own deed before himself, an abortive act and unavailing. Davis v. Beazley, 75 Va. 491; Leftwich v. City of Richmond, supra; Tavener v. Barrett, 21 W. Va. 656. So we hold that the record of this deed was not admissible, and though admitted was properly ignored on the demurrer to the evidence.

[3] The next paper relied on by plaintiff and admitted over defendant's objection is the record of what purports to be a deed from Hamilton Ray, signed H. Ray, to Jane Bower, dated September 28, 1871. Objection to the admission of this deed as spread upon the deed book produced by the clerk of the county court was that though purporting to have been acknowledged before James Cook, Recorder, it shows no order by him admitting the same to record. Is such order endorsed on the deed and recorded essential to the validity of the deed so as to make the record evidence of the deed and act of the recorder? Section 7, chapter 73, Code 1868, required the recorder in recording deeds and other writings to record all certificates of privy examinations or acknowledgments, and all plats, schedules and other papers thereto annexed or thereon endorsed; but we find nothing in the then or present statute requiring the recording officer to record along with such instruments his order admitting them to record, though it is no doubt the practice to do so. In Fouse v. Gilfillan, 45 W. Va. 213, 227, 32 S. E. 178, it was decided that the certificate of the clerk of the county court admitting to record a certain contract, and identifying it as dated June 25, 1892, the date of the original, but which had been modified September 26, 1892, was a sufficient identification of the whole contract for the purpose of the recordation thereof, as the addendum or modification thereof was what it purported to be, "a modification of the agreement made on June 25, 1892," constituting together the whole of the agreement. In the absence of any statute requiring the record to show the act of the clerk in admitting to record a deed or other instrument, we think that the fact that such instrument is actually on the record is at least prima facie evidence of the admission thereof to record, and that the deed of September 28, 1871, was properly admitted in evidence.

[4] Another serious obstacle in the way of plaintiff's right of recovery and supporting the judgment on the demurrer to his evidence is that he failed to connect himself with the prior deeds and title relied on. The record evidences an intention to do so in the very beginning of the trial, in the testimony of W. P. Cook, clerk of the county court. He was asked, and answered as follows:

"Q. Do you find a deed from Marinda Sizemore to James F. Sizemore? A. Yes, sir. Q. Just read the description of that tract of land?"

Further than this the record is silent as to any such deed. It does not appear that the witness even read the description as requested; and certainly it does not appear that any such deed was offered or admitted in evidence. On the hearing here plaintiff's counsel undertook to supply the omission by presenting to us what purports to be a copy of such deed, certified by the clerk of the circuit court as a paper found by him among the papers of the cause, but he does not say it was a part of the demurrer and certificate of the evidence.

The foregoing defects in plaintiff's title would be sufficient to sustain the judgment on the demurrer to his evidence, and it ought to be affirmed unless, as plaintiff insists, the court erred in denying his motion, after the court had announced its purpose to sustain the demurrer, for leave to set aside his joinder therein and grant him a new trial. The record shows no motion for leave to take a nonsuit. Besides, it is too late to move a nonsuit after a case has been submitted to the jury. Following the rule of practice recognized in Frymier v. Lorama Railroad Co., 76 W. Va. 96, 99, 85 S. E. 26, we might perhaps, because of the omission of the plaintiff to put in evidence the deed to him from Marinda Sizemore and husband, if that was the only defect in his title, set aside the demurrer to the evidence and award him a new trial. But because of the fatal defect in the record of the deed from James Cook, Recorder, of November 16, 1870, already alluded to, and one which cannot now be cured, it would serve plaintiff no good purpose to grant him a new trial, wherefore he has not brought himself within the rule requiring that good cause be shown for such new trial.

Our conclusion is to affirm the judgment.

WOODBIDGE v. WOODBRIDGE et al.
(No. 4008.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 8, 1921.)

1. Wills §439—To ascertain intent, whole paper will be considered with circumstances.

The purpose of construction of wills is to ascertain the intention of the testator as expressed in the instrument, and to this end the courts will consider the whole paper together, the apparent purpose sought to be accomplished by the testator, and the means used to that end, as well as any other circumstances disclosed by the will which aid in determining such intention.

2. Wills §450—Language will be considered in sense which will avoid conflict with previous provision.

Where in a will the testator makes use of language which, according to one construction thereof, would be in conflict with a previous provision in the will, but according to another construction, of which the language is equally susceptible, would be in accord with the former provision, the court will adopt the latter construction, to the end that all of the provisions of the will may be made harmonious, and the language used by the testator given effect.

3. Wills §616(1)—Devise with right to use income and to sell held to vest a life estate.

A will, devising to testatrix's husband all of her estate, to have and to hold so long as he shall live, and giving and granting unto him the right to use and enjoy the income thereof, and, should he deem it proper, to sell the same for his benefit, or to increase the income thereof, properly construed, vests in the husband a life estate in such property, with the power to sell the same and enjoy the income from the proceeds of such sale; the corpus of the property in its original or in any changed form belonging to the remainderman.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wood County.

Suit by William D. Woodbridge, executor, against William D. Woodbridge, individually, Emma Lyons, and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant Emma Lyons appeals. Affirmed in part and reversed in part.

C. M. Hanna and Reese Blizzard, both of Parkersburg, for appellant.

J. W. Vandervort, of Parkersburg, and Brown, Jackson & Knight, of Charleston, for appellee.

RITZ, P. The sole question presented for determination upon this appeal is the proper construction of the third paragraph of the will of Martha Evans Hopkins Woodbridge. This paragraph is as follows:

"Third. I give, devise and bequeath unto my beloved husband William Darling Woodbridge, all of my estate both real and personal, and mixed, of whatever kind and character and wherever the same may be located, he to have and to hold the same so long as he shall live, giving and granting unto him the right to use and enjoy the income thereof, and should he deem it proper to sell the same for his benefit or to increase the income thereof should he, the said William Darling Woodbridge survive me."

Following the above paragraph is a provision that should testatrix's husband not survive her, or should they both die as a result of the same accident, her estate should pass to certain persons named. The testatrix's husband survived her, so that the paragraph above quoted became operative, and the question here involved is, what estate does he take thereunder? his contention being that he takes absolute title to the personal property, and a fee simple in the real estate, while the contention of the heirs at law of the testatrix is that he takes only a life estate in the real and personal property.

[1, 2] It will be observed that the first part of the paragraph above excerpted clearly and unmistakably gives to the husband of the testatrix a life estate, which he claims is enlarged into a fee by the latter provision conferring upon him the right to sell the same for his benefit, or to increase the income thereof. He contends that the power to sell given by this latter clause is inconsistent with any limitation upon the estate given him, and he must therefore be held to take absolute title to the property, while the heirs of Mrs. Woodbridge contend that this provision is inoperative in the light of the language used in defining the character of the interest devised by the testatrix to her husband. All of our authorities agree that the purpose of all construction of wills is to ascertain the intention of the testator as expressed in the will, and this intention will be gathered from a consideration of all of the provisions of the will, the apparent purpose of the testator, and all of the circumstances surrounding the testator and connected with the object of his bounty, as well as the subject thereof. There are many cases in our books in which wills have been construed, but a perusal of them lends us little, if any, assistance in arriving at the testatrix's intention in this case. In each of the cases there is some characteristic which not only distinguishes them from each other, but distinguishes them from the case we have here, and about the only rule of universal application which we are able to deduce is that the intention of the testator must control, and this intention must be gathered from a consideration of all of the provisions of the will, keeping in mind the apparent purpose sought to be attained by the testator, and giving effect to all the language used in case this can be done; and where some of the language used is so in conflict with other provisions contained in the will as that both cannot stand, that provision will be rejected which seems least in accord with the general object sought to be accomplished by the testator. Stout v. Clifford, 70 W. Va. 178, 73 S. E. 316; Hope Natural Gas Co. v. Shriver, 75 W. Va. 401, 83 S. E. 1011; Cresap v. Cresap, 34 W. Va. 310, 12 S. E. 527; Bartlett v. Patton, 33 W. Va. 71, 10 S. E. 21, 5 L. R. A. 523; Hinton v. Milburn's Ex'rs, 23 W. Va. 166.

[3] Is it possible to construe the language used by the testatrix in this paragraph so as to make all of the provisions harmonious? If it is, it is our duty to do so, for we must assume that the testatrix intended, when she used the language she did, that all of it should have some effect. If we find, however, that there are provisions which are so inconsistent with others that both cannot stand, we must then determine which of the provisions accomplishes the primary purpose sought to be attained by the testatrix, and discard the other.

The contention of testatrix's husband that he takes an absolute estate in all of the property of his deceased wife is inconsistent with every provision in this paragraph except that giving him the power of sale. In the first part of the paragraph the testatrix provides that he shall hold the same so long as he shall live, and have the right to use and enjoy the income thereof, thus not only by one expression limiting his estate to one for life, but by another, which might be termed an equivalent expression, defining the extent of that life estate; that is, the right to use and enjoy the income arising from the property. It is said that the primary intention of the testatrix was to provide for her husband, and this we may grant, but how did the testatrix intend to make this provision, by giving him her property absolutely, or by giving him the income arising therefrom? The will in this case is written entirely by the testatrix, and upon its face it indicates that she was a woman of much more than ordinary intelligence and education, and if she had the intention of giving to her husband the absolute title to her property we cannot conceive for one minute why she ever resorted to the use of the language she did. One of most ordinary intelligence, having such an intention, would simply have said that the purpose was to give the property to the object of her bounty without any limitation.

There are many cases, however, which hold that where an absolute power of sale and disposition is coupled with a provision granting an estate for life, the apparent life estate will be enlarged into a fee upon the ground that the power of disposal of the property is inconsistent with a life estate. And this may be true in those cases where it is plain that the testator intended the power of disposal to be absolute. That intention does not appear here. An absolute power of disposal would carry with it, not only the right to sell and convey, but to use and dispose of the proceeds of the sale. Does the language used by the testatrix grant this power in this case? It will be noted that the power to sell is limited, and can only be exercised by him for his benefit, or to increase the income from the estate. It may be said that these provisions mean the same thing; that disposing of it for his benefit is simply equivalent to disposing of it for the purpose of increasing the income, and that they stand in apposition. This view is given force by the use by the testatrix in this same paragraph of two equivalent expressions to define the life estate with which she desired to invest her husband. She says that she devises the property to him so long as he shall live. This would have indicated a life estate, but she goes further and gives and grants the right to enjoy the income thereof, indicating a peculiarity of the testatrix to define or emphasize her expressions by the uses of equivalent expressions immediately following them. Do not all of the expressions contained in this will lead to the irresistible conclusion that in using the language "should he deem it proper to sell the same for his benefit or to increase the income thereof" the testatrix gave the power to her husband to sell the real estate for his benefit, that is, to increase the income, and not to consume or use up the corpus? We find from an examination of other provisions of the will that the testatrix's property consists largely of urban real estate in a growing city. She might well have contemplated that in the ordinary course of progress the value of this real estate would so advance that the returns received from it would be in no wise commensurate with its value, and a life tenant not being in a position to improve it so as to receive the more adequate return, would be denied the advantage of such increased value, while if he had the power to convert the real estate into other property he could make his income commensurate with the value of the property. This seems to us the view the testatrix must have had. We do not think she intended that her husband should have the absolute title to any of this real property. The clause giving him the power to sell does not confer upon him the absolute right of disposal, but the right to change the form of the property if a larger income could be secured thereby. This construction would, of course, vest in the husband of the testatrix an estate for his life in the realty, with the remainder in her heirs, with the power in him to convert the corpus of the real estate into other forms of property, but not to consume it, and it gives effect to every provision without doing violence to any of the language used.

Appellee insists that the courts cannot make a will for a deceased party, but must limit their functions to the construction of a will already made, but he loses sight of the fact that he is insisting upon a construction which admittedly defeats the clear intention of the testatrix as expressed in the will, not once, but twice, by invoking an arbitrary rule which should never be applied so long as the language used can be reconciled. It seems to be established that where a life estate is given in a will and a subsequent unequivocal power of disposition also given, the latter, being inconsistent with the life estate, will prevail and have the effect of converting the life estate into a fee. Such power of disposal must be, however, clear and unequivocal, as positive as the language creating the life estate, and by disposal is meant not merely power to sell, but the right to consume or use the proceeds in whatever manner the devisee desires. The clear, positive devise of a life estate makes it perfectly apparent that the application of the rule of construction invoked by the appellee would defeat at least one expressed intent of the testatrix, and the only theory upon which this will be done is that there is another repugnant interest just as clearly expressed. If the apparent conflict can be reconciled and effect given to all of the language used, this must be done before resorting to the arbitrary rule which would discard part of the language, and give effect to the remainder.

So far as the personal property is concerned the appellee takes the same absolutely, for under our statute, the testatrix having died without children, he is the sole distributee of the personal estate, and, she not having disposed of the remainder by will, he takes it by operation of law. A life estate going to him under the will and the remainder by operation of law, the two are merged, and give him the absolute property in the personal estate.

It is true, this may be in a sense making testatrix's husband a trustee so far as the remainder in the real estate is concerned, but there is no reason why this cannot be. We are not unmindful of the fact that, when the legal and equitable estates vest in the same party, the less is merged in the greater and ceases to exist, but that condition does not arise here. The estate belonging to the testatrix's husband is entirely distinct from the estate taken by her heirs. He has his life estate in the real estate entirely separate from the remainder, and there is no reason that we perceive why he could not be a trustee so far as the remainder is concerned. He is not the beneficiary of the trust, and it is only in those cases where the beneficiary of the trust is also the trustee that there is a merger of the two estates, as is the case with the personalty in this instance.

We, therefore, reverse the decree of the circuit court so far as it holds testatrix's husband to be the owner of the real estate in fee, and enter a decree here holding that the clause of the will in question vests a life estate in testatrix's husband in the realty, with power to convert the same, or any part of it, into other species of property yielding a larger income, and that if this power is exercised the interest of the parties in such property will be the same as in that of which testatrix died seized, and affirm the decree to the extent that it holds appellee to be the absolute owner of the personalty.

WORRELL v. LUSK. (No. 4136.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 8, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Receivers §175—Equity has jurisdiction to determine title to fund placed in hands of general receiver in action at law.

There is jurisdiction in a court of equity to determine the title to a fund placed in the hands of its general receiver, by an order entered in an action at law, to await and abide determination of the ownership thereof by a suit in equity to be brought for that purpose.

2. Receivers §178—General receiver holding funds pending determination of ownership in equity an informal party, though not joined.

In such case the general receiver, though not named as a party in the bill, nor served with process, is an informal party to the equity suit.

3. Eminent domain §158—Rights to fund in hands of general receiver determinable by rules applicable to specific performance of land contract.

If relief is sought in such a bill, on the ground that the fund is part of the compensation for land taken in a condemnation proceeding, which had been previously purchased by the plaintiff from the formal defendant, under an executory contract, the rights of the parties are determinable by the rules and principles governing specific performance of contracts of sale of real property.

4. Eminent domain §153—Purchaser not entitled to specific performance not entitled to compensation paid into court.

If such a purchaser under a contract allowing reasonable time to abstract the title, make surveys, etc., and providing for consummation upon completion of such work; delayed his election to take the property with or without an abatement from the purchase money, for a period of four or five years to the detriment of the vendor, upon discovery of a serious defect in the title to the property, he would not have been entitled to specific performance of the contract, wherefore he is not entitled to a decree for any part of the money paid into court in the condemnation proceeding as compensation for the land taken.

5. Vendor and purchaser §144(1)—Condemnation of lands held not performance of land contract.

If in such case the condemnor contracted with the vendee for purchase of the land, before commencement of the eminent domain proceeding, and instituted it against both vendee and vendor, upon discovery of the defect in the title, prosecution of such proceeding by the assignee is not performance of an undertaking on the part of the vendee, as part of his contract, to prosecute a summary proceeding under the statute in the name of the vendor, as guardian of infants then having interests in the land, for authority to convey such interests; nor is the taking of the land by condemnation performance of the contract by the vendee or such assignee.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wyoming County.

Suit by Grover C. Worrell against Levi Lusk. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and rendered.

J. Albert Toler, of Pineville, for appellant.
E. W. Worrell, of Pineville, for appellee.

POFFENBARGER, J. [1] The bill in this cause seeks award to the plaintiff of a certain sum of money which at the date of the filing thereof was in the possession of the general receiver of a court by virtue of an order of the court entered in another proceeding, one of condemnation, requiring payment thereof to him and authorizing him to receive it. On a demurrer thereto lack of jurisdiction in equity is urged. Ground of such jurisdiction is clearly manifest. If the plaintiff is entitled to the specific money he seeks, there is no remedy in a court of law by which he can obtain it. His purpose is not recovery of a judgment or personal decree against the defendant. He asserts right, as against the defendant, to certain money not in his possession or control. If he has made proper parties to his bill, his right to prosecute this suit is clear, for the law court does not afford him an adequate remedy nor any at all for recovery of the particular fund in controversy. Yost v. Wills, 86 W. Va. 71, 102 S. E. 728.

[2] No necessary party has been omitted, unless the general receiver having the fund in his hands is such. He was not formally made a party, but the bill, treating the fund as being in court, prays for an order directing him to pay it to the plaintiff. From the answer to an amended and supplemental bill which does not show the exact status of the fund, and the evidence, it appears that it was placed in the hands of the general receiver, by an order entered in the condemnation proceeding, to await and abide the result of this suit which had not then been instituted, but was then contemplated and commenced immediately afterward. Hence the fund, though not originating in nor growing out of this suit, has been validly placed to the credit thereof in the hands of the general receiver. Having received the money under an order of the court, to hold until this controversy is settled by a final decree, and being an officer of the court, he is in court for the purposes of this cause and may be deemed to be an informal party thereto.

[3] The fund is part of the compensation paid by the Virginian Railway Company for four lots taken for its purposes, by a condemnation proceeding against the defendant, Lusk, and others, including the plaintiff, who claimed the status of purchaser thereof from Lusk under an executory contract ante-

dating the condemnation suit. At the date of the contract an option in its inception, Lusk and his wife had estates in the lots for their lives, and the former certain shares in remainder by inheritance from deceased children; all of the children having originally owned the remainder in fee. A sale of the property to the Virginian Railway Company was then contemplated, but could not be consummated without judicial proceedings, on account of the infancy of some of the children. In anticipation of such a sale, after procurement of a judicial order authorizing conveyance of the interests of the infants, the plaintiff and defendant entered into the optional contract which gave the plaintiff right to purchase the property within 90 days from the date thereof, August 21, 1913, and further provided that an acceptance by notice in writing within such period should convert the option into a contract. It recited purpose to sell the property to the railway company, bound the plaintiff herein to prosecute the suit for authority to convey the interests of the infants, and provided that he should have for his services such amount as should be obtained from the railway company in excess of $2,800. Worrell gave notice of his acceptance October 1, 1913, after having conditionally contracted a sale of the lots and some other pieces of property to the railway company at the price of $5,200. The summary proceeding for sale of the interests of the infants, conducted in the name of Lusk, the defendant here, as guardian, was instituted and prosecuted to the point of readiness for submission to the court. Then, on discovery of a serious defect in the title to the lots, which were part of the property involved in Frantz v. Lester, 82 W. Va. 328, 95 S. E. 945, 2 A. L. R. 1558, proceedings were suspended. At an earlier date, it seems, the railway company's acceptance was so modified, or it may have been originally so qualified, that it took one of the pieces of property, other than the Lusk lots, at $1,000 and fixed the price of the Lusk lots at $3,500. After discovery of the defect, a condemnation proceeding was commenced to obtain the title to the Lusk lots. This proceeding was continued and carried along until the title of Lusk was validated by the decision in Frantz v. Lester, when, by agreement, the compensation was fixed at $4,500, which sum was paid into court. Then the plaintiff herein demanded $1,700 thereof, the excess over $2,800. His demand being resisted by Lusk, the court ordered said sum paid to its general receiver as aforesaid. In the meantime Lusk's wife had died, and, by a partition and conveyances, he had acquired complete title to the four lots.

Finding for the plaintiff on all issues as to the existence of the contract and its terms and conditions, the court entered a decree in this cause awarding the plaintiff $700 of the amount in controversy, on the theory of his having contracted a sale of the property to the railway company at the price of $3,500 and his right to the difference between that sum and $2,800. Both parties complain of the decree, Lusk by this appeal, and Worrell by a cross-assignment of error based on disallowance of his claim to $1,000 of the fund.

Although the plaintiff contracted a sale of the lots to the railway company at the price of $3,500, neither he nor the railway company would pay the money and accept such title as the defendant was then able to convey. This he admits in his testimony, but he insists that the contract binding the defendant to convey good title subsisted pending the proceedings for perfection of title, which was accomplished by the condemnation suit or the decision in Frantz v. Lester. Until the latter suit was decided nothing was finally or irrevocably settled. When the title was found to be good, the property went to the railway company, not by virtue of the contract only, nor at the price previously agreed upon, but by virtue of an adjudication based upon a new agreement as to the price.

At the date of the contract no such defect as was later discovered was either known or suspected. What was foreseen amounted to no more than necessity of a simple and short proceeding for passage of the title of the infant owners. For his services in that proceeding the plaintiff was to have the difference between $2,800 and the sale price. Although the option after acceptance became a contract, it was not a contract unlimited as to time. It allowed only "a reasonable time to abstract title, make surveys," etc. If it can be said to have been closed at all, as made, it was not closed for a period of more than 5½ years. When the abstract was made, neither the plaintiff nor the railway company was willing to consummate the deal by payment of the money. In the meantime the defendant's situation had undergone a detrimental change. He had bought property in another community, expecting to pay for it out of the purchase money of the lots, and, being unable to do so, had been forced to relinquish his bargain. On his return he denied further liability upon the contract and gave notice of his intention not to be further bound by it. At that time there was no tender of any money, and presumptively the plaintiff would not then have paid the purchase price and accepted a deed, for, as stated, he admits unwillingness to accept anything short of a marketable title.

[4] At the date of the commencement of the condemnation proceeding the contract was unenforceable as made, because the defendant's title was deemed to be bad. The defect in it had been adjudged to be fatal. There was only a fighting chance to sustain it. If it had not been validated in Frantz v. Lester, it would have been void. And the inability of the defendant to convey good title was not due to any fault of his. He was an innocent holder of a bad title, one the vendee would not accept. Under these circumstances, he could not delay election to take such title as the vendor could convey, with an abatement of purchase money, or to take it without an abatement, for a period of four or five years. He was allowed only a reasonable time for such election, and, it not having been made within such time, specific performance of the contract cannot be enforced. Neill v. McClung, 71 W. Va. 458, 76 S. E. 878.

[5] Nor can this result be avoided on the ground of perfection of title by prosecution of the condemnation suit. That was no part of the contract, and was not within the contemplation of the parties at the time of the execution thereof. The service undertaken as consideration for the advantage in the sale was not fully performed, nor was the purpose thereof achieved at all. There was no such judicial sale of the interests of the infants as was contemplated. The excess in price came, not from the services of the plaintiff, but as the result of an adverse proceeding by the railway company and delay of consummation until the title was validated by a proceeding not in contemplation at all. Nor did the purchase money come into the hands of the court by virtue of any purchase by the plaintiff or any sale made by him. The railway company paid it as compensation for land taken in the exercise of the power of eminent domain.

Our conclusion is that the decree complained of will have to be reversed, and the prayer of the defendant's answer for award to him of the sum of money in controversy granted, without prejudice, however, to any right the plaintiff may have to sue for damages for breach of the contract of sale or for compensation for services rendered in the transaction out of which this controversy arose. Costs in this court as well as in the court below will be decreed to the defendant.

March 8, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Judgment \S 286—Judgment against defendant in singular valid against all ascertainable defendants if clearly so intended.

A judgment expressed to be against the "defendant," where it is clear from the context and the other parts of the record that "defendants" is intended, will be considered and treated as a valid judgment against all of the defendants if they can be ascertained without ambiguity from the caption of the judgment, aided by other parts of the record. The omission of the letter "s" from the word defendant in such instance will be treated as a clerical error.

2. Judgment \S 519—Judgment cannot be declared void in suit to enforce on grounds which might have been asserted in judgment action.

In a chancery suit to enforce the lien of a judgment against real estate of the judgment debtor, the judgment cannot be attacked and declared void upon grounds which might have been successfully asserted in the law court upon the trial, unless the judgment debtor alleges and proves some reason founded in fraud, accident, surprise, or some other adventitious circumstance beyond his control why the defense at law was not made.

3. Judgment \S 916 — Abstract of judgment alone insufficient to prove judgment if controverted.

An abstract of a judgment exhibited with a bill in equity to enforce the judgment is not sufficient to prove the judgment if controverted, but, if the judgment in full is brought into the case by some other pleading, the necessity of proof thereof is obviated.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wyoming County.

Suit by Mary Stewart against E. M. Senter and others. Decree for defendants on demurrer, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

F. E. Shannon, of Pineville, for appellant.
E. W. Worrell, of Pineville, for appellees.

LIVELY, J. This appeal brings up for review a decree of the circuit court of Wyoming county entered the 22d day of August, 1919, which sustained a demurrer to and dismissed the plaintiff's bill.

A. M. Stewart died testate in 1910, and shortly afterwards his son, B. Harry E. Stewart, qualified as his executor with E. M. Senter, J. M. Glenn, and G. P. Stewart as sureties on his bond. Afterwards, in 1913, B. Harry E. Stewart died without having settled his accounts as executor of his father's estate, and J. M. Glenn was appointed administrator de bonis non of A. M. Stewart's estate and administrator of B. Harry E. Stewart's estate. Mary Stewart, the plaintiff, was a daughter and one of the heirs and distributees of A. M. Stewart. She filed her declaration in the circuit court of Wyoming county at April rules, 1918, against J. M. Glenn as administrator of B. Harry E. Stewart, E. M. Senter, J. M. Glenn in his own right, and George P. Stewart, alleging the death of A. M. Stewart, the appointment of B. Harry E. Stewart as his executor with the other defendants as sureties, the subsequent death of B. Harry E. Stewart, and the appointment and qualification of J. M. Glenn as administrator de bonis non of A. M. Stewart. The declaration does not specifically aver that J. M. Glenn was appointed as administrator of B. Harry E. Stewart, but it does so inferentially. A devastavit was charged with consequential damages to the plaintiff of $1,000. On August 21, 1918, a default judgment was entered against the defendants for $550.97 and costs, and afterwards, on December 31, 1918, an abstract of the judgment was recorded in the judgment lien docket. An execution was issued and returned nulla bona on October 7, 1918. This suit in equity was instituted and the bill filed at January rules, 1918, against the defendants, J. M. Glenn, E. M. Senter, George P. Stewart, and Georgia Glenn, for the purpose of enforcing this judgment against certain real estate owned by E. M. Senter and J. M. Glenn. Each of the defendants, with the exception of J. M. Glenn, demurred to and answered the bill. They admit the rendition of the judgment (which they charge is invalid), and the issuance and return of the execution. They ask for affirmative relief and charge that the judgment sought to be enforced by the bill is null and void for reasons hereinafter mentioned, and prayed for an injunction against the plaintiff to prevent her from proceeding further in the collection of her purported judgment. To these answers the plaintiff demurred and filed a special replication. Afterwards an amended bill was filed, making J. M. Glenn, as administrator of the estate of B. Harry E. Stewart, a party. On August 22, 1919, the court heard the cause upon the bill and exhibits, separate answers in the nature of a cross-bill, the demurrers to the bill, and the demurrer and replication to the answers, and came to the conclusion that the demurrer to the bill should be sustained, and dismissed the plaintiff's bill, giving as a reason therefor that the judgment sought to be enforced did not in the body of the order contain the names of the defendants.

The appellant insists that the circuit court erred in so holding, and that her judgment is not void for uncertainty. The judgment is as follows:

"The State of West Virginia, Which sues for the Use and Benefit of Mary Stewart, v. J. M. Glenn, as Administrator of B. Harry E. Stewart, deceased, E. M. Senter, J. M. Glenn, in his own right, and George P. Stewart. In Debt. Order. This day came the plaintiff by its attorney, and the defendants, who were duly summoned, being thrice solemnly called, came not. It is therefore considered by the court that the judgment entered in the clerk's office of this court against the said defendants stand confirmed. No jury being required by the plaintiff, the court proceeded, in lieu thereof, to ascertain the amount that the plaintiff is entitled to recover against the defendants in this action, and, having heard and considered the evidence, doth consider that the plaintiff recover, for the use and benefit of the said Mary Stewart, against the defendant, the sum of $550.97 damages, aggregate amount of principal and interest to this date, with interest on said sum until paid, and its costs by it in its suit in this behalf expended, including $10 attorney's fee."

There is nothing uncertain about this judgment except the uncertainty suggested by the lower court to the effect that it did not contain the names of the defendants. This was not necessary. It is perhaps better form to name the persons against whom the judgment is rendered in the order or decree. However, other parts of the record may be inspected for the purpose of relieving a judgment of any real or apparent obscurity. Clay v. Hildebrand, 34 Kan. 694, 9 Pac. 466; Fowler v. Doyle, 16 Iowa, 534; Fleener v. Driskill, 97 Ind. 27; Walker's Ex'r v. Page, 21 Gratt. (Va.) 636; Black on Judgments (2d Ed.) § 123. Numerous authorities hold that a judgment against the "defendant" will be sufficient if the names of the defendants can be ascertained without ambiguity from other parts of the record. Black on Judgments (2d Ed.) § 116, and authorities there cited.

[1] It is well settled that a judgment against the "defendant" is not defective for uncertainty where the record discloses that it is in fact a judgment against two defendants. Roach v. Blakey, 89 Va. 767, 17 S. E. 228. These decisions are based on reason and sound policy. All of the parties defendant are named in the caption of the judgment order, and the "defendants" were solemnly called, and came not, and the office judgment was confirmed. The court in lieu of a jury, ascertained the amount the plaintiff was entitled to recover from the "defendants," and then the recovery is made against the "defendant." It is apparent from the face of the order that the omission of the letter "s" from the word "defendant" is a clerical error. It is not necessary to look to the other parts of the record to ascertain against whom this judgment was rendered. But if we look to the summons, the declaration, and the execution no doubt can remain.

to show without doubt that the plaintiffs and defendants referred to therein as such are the same individuals that are named and designated as such in the declaration, and throughout the proceedings composing the record in the cause, such judgment is not void for vagueness or indefiniteness if it fails, in its body, to give the names of the plaintiffs and defendants for and against whom it is rendered." 15 R. C. L. p. 597.

Defendants assert that the judgment is null and void: (1) Because the declaration does not show that any specific sum of money went into the hands of B. Harry E. Stewart as executor of A. M. Stewart; (2) because plaintiff did not recover a judgment against J. M. Glenn as administrator of B. Harry E. Stewart before instituting the suit against defendants; (3) because on the trial no evidence was offered showing a devastavit of the estate of A. M. Stewart by his executor, B. Harry E. Stewart. These are all defenses to the action which resulted in the judgment. They come too late after judgment. We cannot open that law proceeding now to hear matters, which, had they been interposed, would possibly have prevented the judgment from being rendered. The law court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties. All were served with process, and all stood by and permitted a judgment by default. If there was a defect in the declaration, it is too late to point it out now. If the suit was instituted prematurely, before something else should have been done, some other suit instituted, or some other judgment rendered, that was a matter of defense, and it comes too late in this proceeding. The same is true of the assertion that the judgment was not founded on proper evidence, or that evidence was lacking. No fraud, accident, surprise or extraordinary condition or circumstance is alleged or relied upon to set aside the judgment.

[2] The law is so firmly settled that a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, so long as it stands in full force and unreversed, cannot be impeached in any collateral proceeding on account of errors or irregularities not going to the jurisdiction, that it would be cumbering the reports to cite authorities or reiterate the reasons on which the law is based. It is equally well settled that a judgment is not void, or open to a collateral attack, because it is based upon an erroneous application of legal principles, or insufficient evidence, or the remedy selected was one not properly admitting the relief granted in the judgment or decree. Insley v. United States, 150 U. S. 512, 14 Sup. Ct. 158, 37 L. Ed. 1163; Hendrick v. Whittemore, 105 Mass. 23.

The defendants by answer in the nature of a cross-bill set up these defenses and pray for an injunction against the assertion of the judgment. The demurrer to this portion of the answers asking for affirmative relief was well taken and should have been sustained.

"In a suit in equity, brought for the purpose of enforcing a judgment lien, which judgment was obtained against the defendant by default, the defendant will not be allowed to make any defense against said judgment which might have been successfully made in a court of law, unless he shows some reason founded on fraud, accident, surprise, or some adventitious circumstance beyond his control why the defense at law was not made." McNeel's Ex'rs v. Auldridge, 84 W. Va. 748, 12 S. E. 851.

Where defenses which were available at law are set up in equity as grounds for relief against a judgment they cannot be considered. Harnsberger's Adm'r v. Kinney, 13 Grat. (Va.) 511; Allen v. Hamilton, 9 Grat. (Va.) 255. Where defense at law was prevented because of acts or representations of the plaintiff, or the result of fraud, accident, surprise, or other adventitious circumstance beyond the control of the party complaining, equity will give relief. Shields v. McClung, 6 W. Va. 79; Smith v. McLain, 11 W. Va. 654; Iron Co. v. Quesenberry, 50 W. Va. 451, 40 S. E. 487. There is nothing of this character even intimated in the answers.

Appellees insist that the judgment is null and void because they are joined as defendants with J. M. Glenn as administrator of B. Harry E. Stewart, deceased, and that the judgment against J. M. Glenn as administrator, etc., is a personal judgment against Glenn, under the authority of Thompson & Lively v. Mann, 53 W. Va. 432, 44 S. E. 246, and Hall v. McGregor, 65 W. Va. 74, 64 S. E. 736; and hence, as there was no privity of contract between Glenn as an individual and themselves, they are not liable, and the judgment against them is void for that reason. The judgment is not against Glenn as administrator to be levied on the goods and chattels of his decedent, and no doubt is a personal judgment against him. It is possibly erroneous, but it will bind him individually as well as the other defendants. The judgment is against him in his own right, and he cannot now complain, and is not complaining. If there was an improper joinder of parties, that defense should have been made before judgment.

[3] The bill exhibits a transcript of the judgment taken from the judgment lien docket to prove the judgment. This did not prove the judgment. Dickinson v. Railroad, 7 W. Va. 390. But the defendant Senter brought into the record the full judgment, as an exhibit, and the court heard the cause on all the papers and proceedings. We think this supplied the necessary proof of judgment.

The decree of August 22, 1919 sustaining the demurrer to the bill is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

STATE v. ARRINGTON. (No. 4150.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 8, 1921.)

1. Criminal law §390—Accused may testify as to his feelings as to decedent and his motives.

In a trial for homicide, where one of the issues is self-defense, it is competent for the accused to testify concerning his belief and feelings as to the conduct of the deceased at the time of the killing, and to state the motive or purpose which prompted him to fire the fatal shot.

2. Homicide §190(7)—On issue of self-defense uncommunicated threats against accused held admissible.

Where on a charge of homicide the excuse is self-defense, and the testimony is conflicting as to the aggressor, there being some to show that it was the deceased, his threats against the accused, though not communicated to the latter, are relevant and admissible to show the deceased's attitude of mind shortly prior to the combat.

3. Homicide §193—Evidence that deceased was unarmed admissible on issue of self-defense.

Where self-defense is an issue in a trial for homicide, evidence that the deceased was unarmed at the time of the killing is admissible.

4. Homicide §188(7)—Deceased's good character assumed until attacked by defense.

Until attacked by the defense, the deceased's character for peaceable and quiet conduct is presumed to have been good, and the state may not make it a subject of primary proof.

5. Homicide §188(7)—Uncommunicated threats held to justify admission of evidence of prior good character.

But evidence of uncommunicated threats by the deceased to do bodily harm to the accused constitutes a direct attack upon his reputation for quiet and peaceable conduct, and, in conjunction with other testimony tending to show some aggression on his part, justifies the admission of evidence of prior good character, in order to create a countervailing inference that he was not the aggressor.

Error to Circuit Court, Wyoming County.

Ed. Arrington was convicted of second degree murder, and he brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Grover C. Worrell, of Mullens, J. M. McGrath, of Princeton, and R. E. Hughes, of Charleston, for plaintiff in error.

F. T. England, Atty. Gen., and R. A. Blessing, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

LYNCH, J. From a judgment of 12 years' imprisonment in the penitentiary upon a verdict of a jury for second degree murder, Ed. Arrington, defendant, prays to be released and the case resubmitted to another jury for retrial. He shot Mike Yek February 9, 1920, at Iroquois, Wyoming county, and from the wound so inflicted Yek died a moment later. Those who witnessed the tragedy, besides deceased, were Albert Foy, Oakley Helmandollar, and defendant, Arrington, each of whom testified in the order named, Foy on behalf of the state, the other two on behalf of the defendant.

Foy's version of the affair is substantially this: He was walking along the street about 8 o'clock in the evening, and had just passed defendant and Helmandollar going in the opposite direction, when Yek approached them, Foy then being not more than 18 feet distant from them. He heard one of the two men say, "Who is that?" to which the other responded, "Some d—n sneak," but was unable to determine which of the two was the questioner and which made the response. Immediately "they commenced to mix up a little, * * * and this fellow Yek run back a little piece; I don't know whether Arrington hit him or not; and he (Yek) had his hand on his hip; I don't know whether he had his hand in his pocket, or whether he was pulling up his pants. * * * He started toward Arrington, and I saw the pistol," and then the shot was fired.

Helmandollar and defendant substantially agree in their statement of what occurred. The former was standing not more than 12 feet from Arrington when Yek approached. According to their story, Yek said to defendant, "Where are you going?" to which the latter replied, "I am going up the road," and Yek responded, "You are a d—d liar," whereupon a conflict occurred. Yek stepped back a few paces, then started towards defendant with his hand in his hip pocket. The latter says he heard some one, he does not know who, say "Look out, Ed!" and "I jerked out my gun and shot."

The first assignment of error goes to the sufficiency of the indictment, but we see no serious defect in it, and defendant has not pointed out any. The next assignment likewise was not discussed by defendant or relied on by him before this court, and we are unable to perceive any possible ground of prejudice to him in permitting Mrs. Yek to state what little she knew of the fatal shooting of her husband, namely, the hour when he left home to go to the store, when next she saw him and his condition at that time, the location of the wound, his age, nationality, occupation, and children. However, proof of the number, names, ages, and condition of the children or their mother can have no relevancy to the issues involved in a trial for homicide.

[1] Assignments 3, 4, 5, and 6 present the question whether the court erred in refusing to permit defendant to testify before the jury as to his purpose in firing the fatal shot. He was asked, "Now what was your purpose in firing the gun?" The court refused to permit him to answer, except for the purpose of completing the record, and his reply then was, "To save my own life." He was asked further, "Did you have any other purpose in firing the shot?" and after a similar refusal to permit his answer to go to the jury, he replied, on the record, "No." Since malice, express or implied, is an essential element of murder in the first or second degree (State v. Douglass, 28 W. Va. 297; State v. Panetta, 85 W. Va. 212, 101 S. E. 360; State v. Galford, 105 S. E. 237), defendant had the right to disprove it in any legitimate manner. His mental attitude towards deceased at the instant he shot was material to his defense. In a trial for homicide, where one of the issues is self-defense, it is competent for the accused to testify concerning his belief and feelings as to the conduct of the deceased at the time of the killing, and to state the motive or purpose which prompted the fatal shot. These statements should have gone to the jury, to be considered by them in connection with other facts and circumstances in the case, and to receive such weight and credence as in their opinion they merited. State v. Evans, 33 W. Va. 417, 10 S. E. 792; State v. Alderson, 74 W. Va. 732, 82 S. E. 1021; State v. Panetta, cited.

[2] Assignments 7, 8, 9, and 10 involve questions relating to the admissibility of threats by the deceased to do bodily harm to the accused, made in the presence of other persons, but not communicated to him. Evidence of communicated threats tends to throw light upon the mental attitude of the accused towards deceased, while uncommunicated threats serve a reverse purpose, namely, as evidence of the mental attitude of the deceased towards the accused. Where the chief defense of the latter is self-defense, it is of prime importance to determine which of the parties to the combat was the aggressor. If the accused, then undoubtedly such threats would not be admissible, for his aggression would of itself constitute an express refutation of any implication of self-defense that might arise from threats or the accused. But, where the evidence is conflicting as to the aggressor, proof tending to show the state of mind of the deceased at a time not unreasonably remote from the date of the combat is relevant and material in determining whether or not it was he who forced the fighting. Uncommunicated threats, of course, disclose nothing with regard to the accused's state of mind at the time of the homicide, but they possess an evidentiary value, in this, that they show a prior mental condition of deceased which, if continued to the date of the combat, might have prompted him to carry out his design. State v. Evans, 33 W. Va. 417, 10 S. E. 792;

State v. Lutz, 85 W. Va. 330, 101 S. E. 434; Wharton on Homicide (3d Ed.) § 246; 21 Cyc. 893. See, also, State v. Waldron, 71 W. Va. 1, 75 S. E. 558. Prof. Wigmore in his work on Evidence, vol. 1, § 110, says:

"Where on a charge of homicide the excuse is self-defense, and the controversy is whether the deceased was the aggressor, the deceased's threats against the accused are relevant. The deceased's design to do violence upon the defendant is of some value to show that on the occasion in question he did carry out, or attempt to carry out, his design. Moreover, it is the fact of his design, irrespective of its communication to the defendant, that is essential."

Because of the opportunity afforded for abuse of this character of evidence, courts generally have placed certain limitations and restrictions about its introduction, many holding it to be admissible only where there is some other evidence of an aggression by deceased. 1 Wigmore on Evidence, § 111; 1 Michie on Homicide, § 190. We need not now determine whether such a limitation would be proper in every case and under all circumstances, for there is in this case evidence, not much perhaps, but some, that deceased took an active part in the fighting. The state's witness Foy admits that he was advancing upon accused at the instant the latter shot. For these reasons the testimony should have been admitted.

[4, 5] The remaining assignments of error, in so far as they are material upon this review, relate to the admissibility of evidence of the previous good character of the deceased, introduced by the state. Until attacked by the defense, the deceased's character for peaceable and quiet conduct is presumed to have been good, and the state may not make it a subject of primary proof. 1 Wharton's Criminal Evidence (10th Ed.) § 57; 15 R. C. L. Homicide, § 219. There was no evidence admitted at the trial, on behalf of the accused, assailing the character of the deceased; hence the court erred in permitting the prosecution in rebuttal to introduce evidence of his good character. Until it is assailed, the presumption is that it was good, and no proof thereof is necessary. But we have just held that the court improperly excluded evidence offered by the defense of uncommunicated threats of the deceased to do the prisoner harm, and upon the new trial which we are compelled to award such testimony doubtless will again be offered. Is not that a sufficient attack upon the deceased's character to justify the admission of rebuttal testimony of his good character? We think it is. As already noted, evidence of uncommunicated threats is admissible to show the attitude of mind of the deceased, and to aid the jury in determining who was the aggressor in the fight. Such testimony is a direct attack upon his reputation for quiet and peaceable conduct, and evidence of good character in that regard may be admitted to rebut it and to create a countervailing inference that he was not the aggressor. Crawley v. State, 137 Ga. 777, 74 S. E. 537; Vernon v. State, 146 Ga. 715, 92 S. E. 76; State v. Vacos, 40 Utah, 169, 120 Pac. 497; Davis v. People, 114 Ill. 86, 29 N. E. 192; Russell v. State, 11 Tex. Cr. 288; Canon v. State, 59 Tex. Cr. 398, 128 S. W. 141; Berry v. State, 73 Tex. Cr. 203, 163 S. W. 964; Hussey v. State, 87 Ala. 121, 6 South. 420; Weaver v. State, 83 Ark. 119, 102 S. W. 713; State v. Feeley, 194 Mo. 300, 92 S. W. 663, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 351, 112 Am. St. Rep. 511; 1 Wharton's Criminal Evidence (10th Ed.) § 57; 21 Cyc. 908; 1 Michie on Homicide, § 163 (2b), p. 683. Again referring to Wigmore on Evidence, vol. 1, § 63, the author says:

"When the issue of self-defense is made in a trial for homicide, and thus a controversy arises whether the deceased was the aggressor, one's persuasion will be more or less affected by the character of the deceased; it may throw much light on the probabilities of the deceased's action. * * * In the present use, this additional element of communication is unnecessary; for the question is what the deceased probably did, not what the defendant probably thought the deceased was going to do. The inquiry is one of objective occurrence, not of subjective belief."

See, also, State v. Waldron, 71 W. Va. 1, 75 S. E. 558. Generally, as Prof. Wigmore suggests, in order to avoid abuse, there ought to be some other appreciable evidence of the deceased's aggression before such character evidence should be admitted; but evidence of the threats introduced by the defense, and other testimony relating to his active part in the fight, are sufficient to justify its admission in this case.

For the reasons stated, we reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, and award defendant a new trial.

MORRISON v. SMITH-POCAHONTAS COAL CO. (No. 4060.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Oct. 26, 1920. On Rehearing,
March 8, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Continuance \S 30—After trial amendment to conform to proof court may properly proceed with trial.

If during the progress of a trial it becomes necessary to amend the declaration so as to make it conform to the proof, as may properly be done pursuant to section 8 of chapter 131 (sec. 4912) of the Code, it is not error for the court to proceed with the trial, notwithstanding objection thereto by the opposite party, unless upon motion made and for good cause shown for a continuance.

2. Master and servant \S 264(6)—Proof held admissible under averments as to instructing inexperienced employee.

Where in a suit by an employee for personal injuries due to the alleged negligence of defendant the primary act of negligence alleged is the failure of defendant to instruct plaintiff, inexperienced and ignorant of the dangers incident to his employment, in relation thereto and how to avoid the same, evidence of all such incidental facts and circumstances as fairly tend to establish the fact of such negligence and the manner in which his injuries were sustained is admissible without specific averment thereof.

3. Master and servant \S 95—Failure to require statutory affidavit as to age not excused by misrepresentations.

Neither the appearance of an employee nor the fact that he or his parent or guardian misrepresented his age will excuse the owner of a coal mine for failure to require the necessary affidavit of the parent or guardian required by section 25 of chapter 15H of the Code of 1918.

4. Appeal and error \S 179(1)—Question not fairly presented or arising from the record is not ground for reversal.

A question not fairly presented or arising upon the record, though made a point of error in this court, will not be considered or regarded as ground for reversal.

5. Master and servant \S 366—Payment of premiums into compensation fund no protection against unlawful employment.

Payment of premiums into the workmen's compensation fund of this state will not protect an employer against the action of an infant unlawfully employed by him in a coal mine. In such case the rights and liabilities of employer and employee are controlled by the common-law principles applicable to master and servant.

On Rehearing.

6. Infants \S 14—Boy over 14 and under 16 may not be employed in mine while schools are in session, though parents domiciled elsewhere.

Notwithstanding the provisions of section 69, chapter 45 of the Code, limiting the right to attend the free schools and receive instruction therein, in any district or independent district, to those who reside therein with intent to make such district their home, a boy over the age of fourteen and under the age of sixteen years may not be employed in any coal mine in this state while the schools of the district in which such mine is located are in session, although the domicile of his parents is in another district or state.

Error to Circuit Court, Wyoming County.

Action by Banner Morrison, an infant, etc., against the Smith-Pocahontas Coal Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Toler & Moran, of Mullens, for plaintiff in error.

Anderson, Strother, Hughes & Curd, of Welch, for defendant in error.

MILLER, J. The purpose of the present writ is to review and reverse the judgment below in favor of plaintiff for $8,000.00, for personal injuries sustained while employed in defendant's coal mine.

At the time of plaintiff's injuries, according to the declaration and proof, he was an infant between the ages of fourteen and sixteen. The declaration is in two counts, the first averring as the sole act of negligence the employment of plaintiff by defendant while the public schools of the district in which he lived were actually in session, contrary to the statute in such cases made and provided. The second count avers the failure of defendant to pay into the workmen's compensation fund the premiums prescribed by law, plaintiff's employment contrary to law as averred in the first count, his inexperience and his incapacity because thereof to comprehend the dangers and hazards incident to his employment, and the negligence of defendant to use all reasonable care and caution to instruct him as to the manner in which he should perform his work, and to warn him as to the dangers attending his employment, by reason whereof he sustained the injuries of which he complains.

The record shows no demurrer to the declaration or either count thereof, except that after the jury had been sworn to try the issue joined on defendant's plea of not guilty, and during the trial, when plaintiff was permitted to amend each count so as to make the allegata and probata agree as to the manner in which he sustained his injuries, the defendant demurred generally to the declaration as amended, not to each count thereof, which was overruled, and the trial thereon was proceeded with to verdict and judgment.

[1] The first, second and third points of error relied on are without merit. The first and second relate to the question of variance between the allegata and probata as to the particular manner in which plaintiff sustained his injuries, cured as we have shown by the amendments to the declaration during the trial. The third point relates to the action of the court, after the amendments, in proceeding with the trial over the objection of defendant. Citing and relying on the case of Travis v. Peabody Insurance Co., 28 W. Va. 583. That case has been substantially overruled in the late case of Koen v. Brewing Co., 69 W. Va. 94, 70 S. E. 1098, holding that the question for which that case is cited did not arise therein, and that the point was obiter. The latter case gives proper construction to our statute on the subject, section 8, chapter 131 (sec. 4912) of the Code. This statute permits amendments to pleadings to meet the very case presented here, a variance between averment and proof, and provides that a continuance not a matter of right need not be had unless rendered necessary thereby. In the case at bar defendant made no motion for a continuance, and there was no surprise or cause for a continuance presented.

[2] The fourth point of error is that the declaration as amended during the trial in each count thereof is faulty in not sufficiently averring the manner, time and place in which plaintiff's injuries were sustained, so as to show defendant's negligence. The time and place are averred, also, in the alternative, that plaintiff was mashed or thrown between the cars or between the cars and the rib of the coal. The form of this averment in the alternative was to cover the case as the facts might appear from the evidence when presented to the jury. The primary act of negligence alleged is the employment of plaintiff contrary to law. The manner in which the injuries were sustained, assuming the declaration to be good, is unimportant. In the second count the primary negligence alleged is the failure of defendant to instruct plaintiff, because of his youth and inexperience, how to do the work and avoid injury. Such averment of negligence furnishes the basis or predicate for the evidence of all such incidental facts and circumstances of omission or commission as fairly tend to establish the negligence of the primary act, according to the cases cited by defendant's counsel. Snyder v. Wheeling Electrical Co., 43 W. Va. 661, 28 S. E. 733, 39 L. R. A. 499, 64 Am. St. Rep. 922; Veith v. Hope Salt & Coal Co., 51 W. Va. 96, 41 S. E. 187, 57 L. R. A. 410.

[3] The fifth point of error affirmed by defendant's counsel is that the court erred in refusing to allow it to prove by its superintendent and mine boss that plaintiff's size and appearance and what he said indicated that he was eighteen years of age and an experienced brakeman. The evidence of these witnesses shows that they were in doubt, and questioned the plaintiff and required of him the statutory affidavit of parent or guardian that he was of the age rendering it lawful for him to be employed in or about a coal mine, and there is some evidence tending to show that they did get some sort of a certificate, not an affidavit, of a brother-in-law of the plaintiff, not his parent or guardian, consenting to his employment, but this certificate was not produced. In Norman v. Virginia-Pocahontas Coal Co., 68 W. Va. 405, 69 S. E. 857, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 504, and Blankenship v. Ethel Coal Co., 69 W. Va. 74, 70 S. E. 863, we distinctly held that the fact that such employee or his parent has misrepresented his age does not preclude recovery; so held in construing our statute, sections 24 and 25, chapter 15H of the Code of 1918, which does not excuse an employer from requiring the affidavit because of the appearance or false representation of the employee or his friend as to his age. To be protected the employer is bound to require the proper affidavit of parent or guardian.

A sixth proposition presented by counsel is that the court below committed prejudicial error in permitting one of defendant's expert witnesses to be asked and to answer, on cross-examination, whether if some other expert who did not testify in the case had given it as his opinion that the particular condition of plaintiff was caused by the injury sustained, he would say such opinion was correct or incorrect. Counsel for plaintiff say the question and answer were not objected to. We find with respect to the testimony of Dr. Hunter, one of the experts, there was an objection and an exception, but with respect to the evidence of Dr. Wood, the other expert, there was no objection or exception to the question asked him, nor to his answer thereto, which was favorable to defendant. However, the opinions of the experts not examined by plaintiff were brought out on cross-examination of plaintiff by defendant's counsel, wherefore we can see no error in the rulings of the court of which defendant can complain. The seventh proposition is covered by the sixth, and we make the same reply.

[4, 5] The eighth proposition urged, and the only one argued by defendant's counsel, is that the violation of the statute against employment of minors within the prohibited ages does not constitute actionable negligence unless such violation thereof is the proximate cause of the injury; that an employer as a matter of law is not chargeable with all injuries that result during the unlawful employment, but is liable only for those injuries against which the statute is intended to guard. And the argument is that section 33, chapter 10, Acts 1915 (Code Supp. 1918, c. 15H, § 36 a. xxxiii [sec. 495-33]), prohibiting the employment of boys between the ages of fourteen and sixteen years, was not intended to protect them from personal injuries as was section 32 (sec. 495-32) thereof, inhibiting the employment of boys under the age of fourteen years, but that its purpose was to provide for their education and protect them therein. Our answer to this proposition is that the question does not seem to fairly arise on the record. A demurrer to the first count would likely have presented the question, but so far as the record discloses there was no demurrer to either count until after the trial began, and then the demurrer after the amendments were made was general and not to each count, and as the second count is concededly good, the demurrer was properly overruled. The question might have been presented by instructions, but though the order giving judgment on the verdict and filing the only bill of exceptions, No. 1, indicates that instructions to the jury were given and refused, no such instructions appear, and the bill of exceptions does not purport to contain or identify any such instructions. Nor does the question arise on the motion for a new trial, for as the second count is good and there was evidence introduced sufficient to support the case made thereby, we can not say the verdict is not well founded on pleadings and proof.

It is true, the defendant proved payment of the proper premiums into the workmen's compensation fund so as to protect against damages sustained by anyone lawfully employed in its mines. But as the jury must have found the plaintiff was unlawfully employed while the schools in his district were in session, defendant was not protected against action by plaintiff by the workmen's compensation fund. The protection given by the statute does not extend to persons unlawfully employed. Section 9, chapter 15P, (sec. 665), of the Code, specifically provides that the act shall not apply to employers of employees whose employment is prohibited by law. And we have recently decided that in cases not falling under the compensation law the common-law rights and liabilities of employer and employee must control in actions of negligence. Barnett v. Coal & Coke Ry. Co., 81 W. Va. 251, 94 S. E. 150.

Wherefore, we must affirm the judgment.

WILLIAMS, J. absent.

On Rehearing.

Two additional propositions are urged for reversal. First, that plaintiff, a boy over fourteen years of age, was not, while and where employed by defendant, residing in the sub-district or independent school district with intent to make such district his home, and was not, within the provisions of section 69 of chapter 45 of the Code 1916, (Code 1913, sec. 2110), entitled to attend the free schools of said district, wherefore his employment by the defendant was not unlawful, and defendant was protected by its compliance with the workmen's compensation law; second, that the evidence shows plaintiff to have been a skilled work hand, acquainted with the duties of his employment, and that the theory that he was not properly instructed as to the dangers of his employment was unavailing and should have been disregarded by the trial court and by the jury.

[6] The argument adduced in support of the first of these propositions is that section 33 of chapter 10, Acts 1915 (section 25, chapter 15H, Code 1916 [Code Supp. 1918, c. 15H, § 36a xxxiii] sec. 495—33), relating to mines and labor, and sections 69, 72 and 74 of the chapter relating to education (Code 1913, secs. 2110, 2113, 2115), being in pari materia, should be read together, and the former chapter interpreted in the light of the latter. In this view we entirely agree with counsel. Section 33 of said chapter 10, makes it "unlawful for any person, operator, agent or mine foreman, to employ or permit any boy between the ages of fourteen and sixteen years, to work in or about a coal mine at any time in which a free school is in session in the school district where said boy resides." And section 72 of chapter 45 of the Code requires every person having under his control a child between the ages of eight and fifteen years to cause him to attend some free school for a period of twenty-four weeks yearly, beginning with the opening of the school term, and makes it a misdemeanor and imposes a penalty for failure to do so; and section 74 of that chapter makes it an offense punishable in like manner for any person to induce any such child to unlawfully absent himself from school, or to harbor or employ him, when the school in the district in which the child lives is in session.

Defendant relies on the evidence that plaintiff's father resided in Virginia, and that when on the witness stand plaintiff said his home was in Virginia, and that after being hurt in defendant's coal mine he said he wanted to go home. He did so testify, but he also testified that he had been working in West Virginia in a coal mine before being employed by defendant, and during his employment by defendant that he at least had a temporary residence with a relative, Rokie, in the school district where he was employed, and who undertook to make out a certificate which was shown or delivered to defendant, giving his consent to the boy's employment, but not sworn to by him. Plaintiff was employed by defendant during the months of November and December, 1917. It is contended by defendant's counsel that such residence in the State did not give plaintiff the status of one residing within the school district with intent to make such district his home, within the meaning of section 69 of said chapter 45 of the Code, entitling him to attend the free schools thereof, wherefore his employment could not have been unlawful as contemplated by the provisions of the mining statute referred to. On the other hand counsel for plaintiff insist that these mining laws inhibiting the employment of boys between the ages of fourteen and sixteen years have their safety as well as their education in view, and that the provisions of the chapter on education and those of the mining statutes can not be construed as strictly in pari materia. Our opinion, however, is that as they relate to boys between the ages of fourteen and sixteen years, the purpose is education, not safety; for when over fourteen years of age, if the schools are not in session, boys may be lawfully employed in or about coal mines, and be subject to the laws pertaining to master and servant the same as adult employees.

The question is therefore squarely presented. What construction should be given to the words of said section 69 of chapter 45, "residing in a sub-district or independent district with intent to make such district their home"? It will be observed that the statute does not say "permanent home." Counsel for defendant, however, contend that the statute uses the word "home" in the sense of "domicil," and that the domicil of an infant is that of his parent or guardian, and that he is incapable of choosing a domicil other than that of his parent or guardian. For some purposes this may be true. For example, for the purpose of determining the rights of administration of his estate, or of inheritance. White v. Tennant, 31 W. Va. 790, 8 S. E. 596, 13 Am. St. Rep. 896; or in the case of a pauper, in determining the place of his residence or domicil for the purpose of his support. Town of Salem v. Town of Lyme, 29 Conn. 74; or for the purpose of determining the proper forum in divorce proceedings, Blumenthal v. Tannenholz, 31 N. J. Eq. 194; or in bankruptcy proceedings. In the matter of John M. Wrigley, 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 134.

But when the question is one relating to the education of the youth of the land, no narrow construction of the statute ought to be indulged in. In Yale v. West Middle School District, 59 Conn. 489, 22 Atl. 295, 13 L. R. A. 161, it was decided that a child living with a domiciled resident and tax payer of a school district as a member of his family with the expectation on the part of all parties interested that this relationship will continue permanently, although she has never been formally adopted and may not have a domicil in the technical sense of that term in the district, has a residence in the district for school purposes and can not be compelled to pay tuition as a non-resident. In State ex rel School District No. 1 of Waukesha v. Thayer, 74 Wis. 48, 41 N. W. 1014, it was held that a minor may have for school purposes a residence other than that of his parents. And in that case it was decided that where the mother deserted by her husband and unable to support their minor children, found a home for the child in Waukesha, where he worked and boarded and had no other home, was a resident of Waukesha for school purposes, although the mother herself was employed as a school teacher in Milwaukee and boarded there.

And so we hold that although the domicil of the plaintiff in this case for some purposes may have been that of his parents in Virginia, nevertheless as he left his home in Virginia, with or without their consent, and was allowed to labor and appropriate his earnings, and was liable to become a citizen and resident of this State, the State thereby became interested in his education and good citizenship. In the light of these facts we should not give the statute such a narrow construction as to relieve him or his employer from the compulsory provisions of the statute. A narrow construction thereof might permit the persons thereby prohibited, to employ boys from adjoining school districts or adjoining counties of the State, if perchance the schools in such counties or districts did not happen to be in session at the particular time, which would be bad policy and lead to evasions of the law and render it abortive.

As to the second proposition relied on, relating to failure to instruct, it is conceded that plaintiff was not instructed. We can not say from the evidence that he was so skilled or acquainted with the dangers to which his employment subjected him as not to call for instruction, or that these dangers were so open and apparent that instructions were not necessary. The record shows that the jury were instructed, but not what the instructions were. Presumptively they were properly instructed on the duty of an employer in the premises, and that they found against the defendant on the conflicting evidence relating to the necessity to instruct.

For the reasons formerly given and now adhered to, as well as for the additional reasons now presented, we adhere to our former opinion to affirm the judgment.

(No. 218.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 23, 1921.)

1. Trial ⚡260(1)—Requests covered properly refused.

There is no error in refusing requested instructions which are covered by the charge given.

2. Negligence ⚡93(1)—Occupant of automobile chargeable with negligence of driver where joint enterprise exists.

Where the driver and occupant of an automobile are engaged in a joint enterprise, the occupant is chargeable with the negligence of the driver.

3. Negligence ⚡93(1)—Driver's negligence held not imputable to guest.

Where the occupant of an automobile was merely a guest and had no control over the car which was owned by the driver, the occupant cannot be charged with the negligence of the driver on any theory of joint enterprise.

4. Trial ⚡252(1)—Instructions must be applicable to evidence.

There is no error in refusing requested instructions which are not applicable to the evidence.

5. Trial ⚡253(9)—Instruction ignoring fact of knowledge of occupant as to speed of driver properly refused.

In action for death of occupant of automobile who was thrown out when car struck the rails of newly built track having no planks between, an instruction imposing duty on occupant to remonstrate with driver as to his speed, although he might not have known that driver was exceeding speed limit, was properly refused.

6. Railroads ⚡303(1)—Instruction on safety of highway crossing held correct.

In action for death of occupant of automobile who was thrown out when car struck the rails of newly built track having no planks between, it was not error to instruct that, unless defendant maintained its tracks at crossing in a manner as safe as it would have been if railroad had not been built across the highway, then the neglect of duty would be negligence.

7. Railroads ⚡337(1)—Instruction on proximate cause of injury to guest of negligent automobile driver held correct.

In an action for death of an occupant of an automobile who was thrown out when car struck the rails of newly built track without planks between the rails, an instruction that, if negligence of railroad was the proximate cause of injury, then jury must find defendant negligent, notwithstanding negligence on part of driver, and if the negligence of both the driver and the railroad, both acting together, both concurring, both contributing to the result, that plaintiff was entitled to recover of either, was correct.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Connor, Judge.

Action by J. H. Pusey, administrator, against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. No error.

This is a civil action to recover damages for wrongful death alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant.

Randall Pusey, plaintiff's intestate, together with Henry Vann and Festus Turlington, were going from Falcon to Fayetteville, riding in a Ford runabout, Vann being the owner and driver of the car. The public road upon which the plaintiff's intestate was traveling crosses the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad just above Wade station in Cumberland county at an acute angle. At the time of the injury complained of, August 29, 1914, the defendant company was constructing a new track, parallel to its original track, and about eight feet distant therefrom, the new track having been practically completed at the crossing referred to, except that the dirt had not been packed in guard planks laid down over the cross-ties as is always done when such crossings are completed.

The young men approached this crossing from the west side, passed over the old track, but when the wheels struck the rails of the new track they skidded, and the car was thrown something like 15 feet across the track to the point indicated on the plat, the front end of the car was reversed, and the three occupants thrown out, young Pusey being instantly killed.

The evidence was conflicting as to the rate of speed of the automobile at the time of the injury. Henry Vann, the driver of the car, testified that when he got on the track he was running from 6 to 10 miles per hour. He also admitted that he had been drinking cider, and other witnesses testified to the same effect.

The evidence showed that many automobiles had passed over the crossing on the day in question, that there was a camp meeting going on at Falcon, and that the cars going to and coming from Fayetteville had to pass over this crossing.

There were three issues submitted to the jury: First, as to the negligence of the defendant; second, as to the contributory negligence of the plaintiff's intestate; and, third, as to damages.

The jury answered the first issue "Yes," the second issue "No," and the third issue "$10,000."

The only exceptions in the record are based upon the charge of the judge to the jury, and his refusal to give certain instructions as prayed for by the defendant as follows:

"(1) The defendant contends that a passenger in an automobile, which is being driven by another at a dangerous rate of speed, may be chargeable with negligence if he remains in the car and does not remonstrate with the driver, and that, if the jury should have found from the greater weight of the evidence in this case that Henry Vann was driving the car at a dangerous rate of speed, and that Pusey remained in the car and made no effort to stop him, and that such conduct on the part of Vann, acquiesced in by Pusey, contributed to the injury complained of, then the jury should have answered the second issue 'Yes,' and his honor erred in refusing to so charge.

"(2) That his honor should have given the second prayer for instructions, to wit: 'If the jury shall find from the greater weight of the testimony that young Pusey was going to Fayetteville with Turlington and Vann on a pleasure trip, and that they were all engaged in a joint enterprise, either of business or pleasure, and if the jury shall further find by the greater weight of the evidence that Pusey trusted the management of the car to Vann, and that Vann drove the car at a dangerous rate of speed, or entered a dangerous zone or crossing at a rate of speed in excess of what would be prudent under the circumstances, and if the jury shall further find that the injury would not have occurred but for said conduct on the part of Vann, then I charge you that Pusey would be guilty of contributory negligence, and it would be your duty to answer the second issue "Yes."'

"(3) That it was error to refuse to charge as requested as follows: 'I charge you that it is negligence on the part of a passenger if he commits his safety to an intoxicated driver of an automobile; and if the jury shall find from the greater weight of the evidence that Henry Vann was intoxicated or under the influence of intoxicating liquors, and that this fact was known to young Pusey, and that Pusey continued his journey to Fayetteville under such circumstances, and if the jury shall find from the greater weight of the evidence that the injury complained of was caused by the intoxicated condition of Vann or if said intoxicated condition contributed to said injury, then the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, and it would be your duty to answer the second issue "Yes."'

"(4) That it was error to refuse to charge the jury that, if they should find from the greater weight of the evidence that Henry Vann, the driver of the car, entered upon the crossing of the defendant at a greater rate of speed than six miles per hour, in violation of chapter 191 of the Public Laws of 1909, then Vann would be guilty of a violation of the criminal law; and if the jury should further find that Randall Pusey, at the time of the accident, was engaged with Vann in a joint enterprise, that is to say, that they were going to Fayetteville for recreation, and that Pusey did not remonstrate with Vann, or undertake to control the speed of the car, that Pusey would also be guilty of a misdemeanor in that he aided and abetted Vann in the violation of the criminal statute, and if the jury shall further find that but for such act and conduct on the part of Pusey the injury would not have occurred, then it would be the duty of the jury to answer the second issue 'Yes.' His honor refused to give said instruction, and defendant excepted.

"(5) That it was error to charge the jury as follows: 'The court charges you that from the evidence in this case, and the defendant so admits, that the crossing in question was across a public highway extending from Dunn to Fayetteville, and unless the defendant company built and maintained its tracks at said crossing in a manner as safe and convenient to the public as it would have been if said railroad had not been built across said highway, then such neglect of duty would constitute negligence,' and defendant excepted.

"(6) That it was error to charge the jury that, if they found that the negligence of the railroad company was the proximate cause of the injury, then they should answer the first issue 'Yes,' notwithstanding the fact that there was also negligence on the part of the driver; and he also charged them that, if they found that the negligence of both the driver and the railroad company, both acting together, both concurring, both contributing to the result, caused the death of Mr. Pusey, then both the driver and the railroad company would be liable, and it mattered not which one the plaintiff sued; that he was entitled to recover of either, and in that event they would answer the first issue 'Yes,' and defendant excepted."

Grady & Graham, of Clinton, for appellant.
Fowler & Crumpler, of Clinton, Manning, Kitchin & Gavin, of Sanford, and Butler & Herring and Kerr & Herring, all of Clinton, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. [1] The charge states clearly the contentions of the parties and covers the first and third exceptions by specific instructions.

[2, 3] The courts recognize the doctrine included in the second prayer for instruction, but, as is said in Withey v. Fowler Co., 164 Iowa, 877, 145 N. W. 923:

"It is somewhat difficult to state a comprehensive definition of what constitutes a joint enterprise as applied to this class of cases, but it is perhaps sufficiently accurate for present purposes to say that, to impute a driver's negligence to another occupant of his carriage, the relation between them must be shown to be something more than that of host and guest, and the mere fact that both have engaged in the drive because of the mutual pleasure to be so derived does not materially alter the situation."

The rule seems to be:

"That the occupant of the automobile must be in a position to assume the control or control in some manner the means of locomotion. Lawrence v. Sioux City, 172 Iowa, 320, 154 N. W. 494. And it has been held that the fact the driver and the occupant were mutually engaged in a pleasure ride did not create a joint enterprise. Withey v. Fowler Co., 164 Iowa, 377, 145 N. W. 923; Beard v. Klusmeier, 158 Ky. 153, 164 S. W. 319, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1100, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 342."

In Hunt v. Railroad, 170 N. C. 442, 87 S. E. 210, this principle was adopted, the court saying:

"Furthermore, it is held by the great weight of authority that negligence on the part of the driver of an automobile will not, as a rule, be imputed to another occupant or passenger unless such other occupant is the owner or has some kind of control over the driver. This is undoubtedly the view prevailing in this State. See a learned opinion on the subject by Associate Justice Douglas in Duval v. Railroad, 134 N. C. 331, citing Crampton v. Ivie, 126 N. C. 894, both of these decisions being approved in the more recent case of Baker v. Railroad, 144 N. C. 37-44."

See, also, Bagwell v. Railroad, 167 N. C. 611; McMillan v. Railroad, 172 N. C. 853.

In this case there is no evidence that Pusey had any control over the car, and therefore none that he was engaged in a joint enterprise with Vann, and, on the contrary, all the evidence is that Vann was the owner and driver of the car; that Pusey was a guest riding for the pleasure of the trip, and had no control over the car and nothing to do with driving it.

The prayer therefore had no evidence to support it and could not have been given.

[4] The fourth prayer for instruction is objectionable in several respects. It required the submission to the jury of the question of Vann and Pusey being engaged in a joint enterprise when there was no evidence to support it, and it contains the direction to the jury that going to Fayetteville for recreation is a joint enterprise, which, as we have seen, is not in accord with the authorities.

[5] It also imposed the duty on Pusey to remonstrate, although he might not have known that Vann was exceeding the speed limit.

[6, 7] The fifth exception is to a part of the charge, which is substantially copied from Raper v. Railroad, 126 N. C. 563, 36 S. E. 115, approved in Tate v. Railroad, 168 N. C. 523, 84 S. E. 808, and the sixth to a charge which is fully sustained by Bagwell v. Railroad, 167 N. C. 616, 83 S. E. 814.

After careful consideration of the record and briefs, we conclude that the judgment ought to be affirmed.

No error.

STACY, J., took no part in the decision of this case.

(181 N. C. 117)

HOWELL v. PATE. (No. 110.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 23, 1921.)

1. New trial \S 58—Granted for uncertainty as to amount of damages.

In an action for breach of a contract for the sale of land, where plaintiff had paid $500 to bind the bargain and the jury found plaintiff's damages for defendant's breach $500, without indicating whether that included the return of the payment, so that the verdict was uncertain, a new trial will be granted.

2. Vendor and purchaser \S 351(3)—Measure of damages for vendor's breach stated.

The measure of damages for a breach by a vendor of his contract to sell real property is the difference between the contract price and the market value of land at the time of the breach, plus any part of the purchase price which has been paid with interest.

3. Frauds, statute of \S 131(2)—Vendor and purchaser \S 3(4)—Agreement held not mere option, so that time for payment could be extended by parol.

A written agreement to make a deed for land when the purchaser paid the balance of the purchase price, he now paying $500 to bind said trade, is a contract for the sale of the land binding on and enforceable against both parties, and not merely an option to the purchaser, and therefore the time for payment of the balance of the purchase price could, under the statute, be extended by parol.

Allen, J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wayne County; Devin, Judge.

Action by John D. Howell against J. H. Pate for damages for breach of a contract for the sale of land. From a judgment giving plaintiff only a part of the amount claimed, both parties appeal. New trial granted on plaintiff's appeal, and no error on defendant's appeal.

Civil action for damages, tried upon an alleged breach of the following contract:

"Goldsboro, N. C., Oct. 6, 1919.

"I agree to make John D. Howell a deed for the 27 acres of land that I bought from Willie B. Pate, when he pays me on Jan. 1, 1920, the balance of purchase price, $6500.00, he now paying me $500.00 to bind said trade.

"J. H. Pate.

"Witness: John D. Howell."

It appears from the pleadings that the $6,500 stipulated in the contract to be paid on January 1, 1920, was not tendered until the 6th day of January, 1920. But in this connection it is alleged that on the 6th day of October, 1919, after the execution of the contract, and again later, the defendant orally agreed to extend the time of payment for a period of two weeks. Defendant moved for judgment on the pleadings. Motion overruled and exception.

Upon issues joined, the jury rendered the following verdict:

"(1) Was the plaintiff prevented from paying the purchase money for the Pate land on January 1, 1920, by reason of the agreements and representations of the defendant as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"(2) What damage if any is the plaintiff entitled to recover of the defendant for failure to convey said land? Answer: $500.00."

Plaintiff tendered judgment for $500 on the verdict and for $500 with interest from October 6, 1919, to cover the initial payment on the contract, which was admitted in the pleadings to have been made and not refunded. His honor declined to sign judgment tendered by plaintiff, and entered judgment on the verdict for $500 and costs. Both plaintiff and defendant excepted and appealed.

Kenneth C. Royall, of Goldsboro, for plaintiff.

Langston, Allen & Taylor, of Goldsboro, for defendant.

Plaintiff's Appeal.

STACY, J. [1] Upon the entire record, considering the evidence, the charge of the court, and the verdict, it is not sufficiently clear for us to say whether or not the partial payment of $500, made at the time of the execution of the contract, was considered and taken into account by the jury in answering the issue of damages. By reason of this uncertainty, we have decided to send the case back for a new trial.

[2] It has been held with us, in a number of cases, that a verdict may be given significance and correctly interpreted by reference to the pleadings, the evidence, and the charge of the court. Reynolds v. Express Co., 172 N. C. 487, 90 S. E. 510, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 1071; Bank v. Wilson, 168 N. C. 557, 84 S. E. 866; State v. Murphy, 157 N. C. 615, 72 S. E. 1075. Thus it would appear that a new trial should be awarded when, upon a proper perusal and examination, the true intent and meaning of the verdict is found to be doubtful, uncertain, and ambiguous. Donnell v. Greensboro, 164 N. C. 330, 80 S. E. 377.

"The proper measure of damages for the breach by a vendor of his contract to sell real property is the difference between the contract price and the market value of the land at the time of the breach, plus any part of the purchase price which has been paid, with interest." Hale on Damages, p. 364; Nichols v. Freeman, 33 N. C. 99; Le Roy v. Jacobsky, 136 N. C. 443, 48 S. E. 796, 67 L. R. A. 977; Hopkins v. Lee, 6 Wheat. 109, 5 L. Ed. 218.

Defendant's Appeal.

[3] Defendant moved for judgment on the pleadings, which was overruled; and this is the only point raised on his appeal. Defendant took the position that the paper writing, above set out, was an option, and that the oral agreement to extend the time of payment for a period of two weeks was such a covenant as is required to be put in writing, under the statute of fraud. Holding, as we do, that the instrument which forms the basis of this action is a contract to convey land, and not an option, it follows that his honor's ruling on defendant's motion was correct.

The agreement contains the necessary elements of an executory contract, to wit, mutuality of obligation and remedy. Pollock v. Brookover, 60 W. Va. 75, 53 S. E. 795, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 403; Davis v. Martin, 146 N. C. 281, 59 S. E. 700. As said in Davis' Case:

"There is a decided distinction between an option to purchase, which may be exercised or not by the prospective purchaser, and an absolute contract of sale, wherein one of the parties agrees to sell and the other to buy certain property, the sale to be completed within an agreed time. In the latter case the mere lapse of time with a contract unperformed does not entitle either party to refuse to complete it, and therefore time is not of the essence of the contract; but where the contract is merely an option, generally without consideration, of course, time is of the essence."

The true character of the instrument is manifest from its recital of $500 "to bind said trade," evidently meaning a part of the purchase money, as the $6,500 is called "the balance of purchase price."

On plaintiff's appeal, new trial.

On defendant's appeal, no error.

ALLEN, J. (dissenting). No error is pointed out in the opinion of the court, and I see no uncertainty in the verdict. The amount of damages awarded by the jury is easily understood when considered in connection with the evidence as it appears that the contract price for 27 acres of land was $7,000, and the opinions of the witnesses as to the value of the land at the time of the breach ranged from $200 to $400 per acre.

I think it is clear that the jury concluded that it would be a fair and just settlement for the defendant to return to the plaintiff the amount he had paid, and that this ought to be a settlement of the controversy.

STATE v. RHODES. (No. 209.)

Witnesses §414(2)—Statements by prosecuting witness next day admissible to corroborate testimony.

Where the prosecuting witness had testified that defendant and another assaulted him and took from his person a sum of money, testimony by three witnesses that on the following morning the prosecuting witness told them of the occurrence, stating that defendant and the other had robbed him, was competent for the purpose of corroboration; the defense being alibi.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Connor, Judge.

Blanch Rhodes was convicted of larceny from the person, and he appeals. No error.

T. C. Wooten, of Kinston, for appellant.

Attorney General Manning and Assistant Attorney General Nash, for the State.

PER CURIAM. Upon trial in the superior court, the prosecuting witness, Jerry Pettaway, testified that Fred Stiles and the defendant, Blanch Rhodes, assaulted him on the night of October 14, 1920, knocked him down, and took from his person the sum of $22 in money. In corroboration of this evidence, the state offered three witnesses, who testified that on the following morning the prosecuting witness told them of the occurrence, stating that Stiles and the defendant had robbed him. This evidence was admitted only for the purpose of corroboration, and in this view it was clearly competent. This is the only exception in the record.

The defendant Rhodes went upon the stand and testified that he was at home at the time of the alleged robbery; and there was other evidence tending to support his alibi. The case presents a simple question of identification, and, upon the evidence, the jury found against the defendant.

We have carefully examined the record and find no reason for disturbing the results of the trial.

No error.

BOONE et al. v. SYKES et al. (No. 250.)

1. Deeds §203—Evidence of grantor's physical incapacity admissible.

In action to set aside deed because of grantor's insufficient mental capacity, evidence of an injury to grantor by a fall resulting in a fractured hip about a year before the deed was competent, in view of evidence that the grantor was over 80, of weak mind, and that her mental and physical condition grew worse from the time of the fall until her death.

2. Evidence §502 — Examination of opinion witness in reply to cross-examination proper.

Where, in action to set aside a deed because of grantor's mental incapacity, a witness for plaintiff was asked on cross-examination his opinion as to the grantor's sanity, assuming certain facts as true, plaintiff was properly permitted in reply to ask the witness for his opinion if the facts were otherwise.

3. Deeds §203—Evidence as to grantor's recollection proper.

In action to set aside deed because of grantor's insufficient mental capacity, evidence that, while the grantor did not at first recall signing another deed, but when her memory was refreshed "she remembered it and seemed satisfied," was competent on the issue of her mental capacity at the time of executing the deed in suit, a few months after the incident testified to.

4. Evidence §502—Cross-examination as to value of land held competent.

In action to set aside deed because of grantor's insufficient mental capacity, where in support of defendant's contention that the consideration named in the deed was adequate a witness had testified the land was "poor sorry land," his testimony on cross-examination that in 1919 the land raised "a good crop, about 6 acres, of tobacco, worth about $1,000," and "the crops this year are about as good as they were last year," was admissible to contradict or test him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Franklin County; Kerr, Judge.

Action by S. R. Boone and others against Eugene Sykes and another. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. No error.

This is an action to set aside a deed made by Mrs. Cornelia M. Boone to her daughter, Mrs. Eugene Sykes, upon the ground that the grantor did not have sufficient mental capacity to execute a deed. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, and the defendants excepted, and appealed from the judgment rendered on the verdict, assigning the following errors:

"(1) To the admission of the evidence in regard to a fall which happened in 1916 more than a year prior to the execution of the deed here in question, on the grounds that the admission of such evidence tended to confuse the issues in the minds of the jury, and led them to think that grantor's mind was affected by said fall.

"(2) To the admission of an imaginary conclusion based upon an imaginary statement which had no evidence to sustain it. The witness previously admitted that he heard the other Mr. Edwards testify that Mrs. Boone told him Mr. Collie was riding up and down the road trying to sell the land, and there is no evidence that Mrs. Boone did not make this statement, or that Collie was not trying to sell said land.

"(3) To the admission of evidence in regard to the mind of the deceased grantor based on a conversation between witness and deceased grantor eight months after the execution and delivery of the deed, on the grounds that the condition of the grantor's mind at this time had nothing to do with the condition of the same at the time of executing and delivering deed, and that the admission of such testimony tended strongly to influence the jury in sustaining the contention of the plaintiff that she was mentally incapable when she signed and delivered the deed.

"(4) To the admission of the testimony relative to the value of the 1919 crop on the land in question, on the ground that such testimony is irrelevant in any aspect of the case, and especially so for the reason that the value of the crops in no wise showed the value of the lands because the crops depended upon fertilizer, improvements put on the lands by the defendant, their skill as farmers, and also upon the ever varying law of supply and demand."

Wm. H. & Thos. W. Ruffin and Ben T. Holden, all of Louisburg, for appellants.

W. M. Person and W. H. Yarborough, Jr., both of Louisburg, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. [1] The deed, which plaintiffs attack, bears date December 31, 1917, and the first exception is to permitting a witness who had testified to an injury to the grantor, resulting in a fractured hip, to fix the time of the fall as early in 1916. We see nothing in this prejudicial to the defendants, and it was competent in view of the evidence of the plaintiffs tending to prove that the grantor was more than 80 years of age, of weak mind, and that her mental and physical condition gradually grew worse from the time of the fall until her death.

[2] The second assignment does not comply with the rule, requiring the appellant to at least set forth in the assignment of error the evidence objected to, but upon examination of the record it appears that a witness for plaintiff was asked on cross-examination his opinion of the sanity of the grantor, assuming certain facts to be true, and plaintiff was permitted in reply to ask for his opinion if the facts were otherwise, which was necessary to give the jury a proper estimate of the testimony of the witness.

"She sent for me six or eight months afterwards to come, and I went to see her, and she said I signed some papers before you, they tell me and I do not recollect it, and I want to know what sort of papers they were. I told her it was a deed for 28 acres of land, and it was to Mrs. Geneva Sykes, but she did not seem to know or recollect about it, and said she was bothered about it. I explained it to her, and tried to refresh her memory, and then she remembered it and seemed satisfied. This was some time in August."

This evidence was very favorable to the defendant, because, while she (the grantor) at first said she did not recollect signing the deed, when her memory was refreshed "she remembered it and seemed satisfied," thus confirming the deed eight months after its execution, but if hurtful to the defendant it was competent to be considered on the question of the mental capacity of the grantor at the time of the execution of the deed, as it was in evidence that the grantor was old and gradually growing weaker in mind and body.

[4] The evidence of the value of the crops on the land in 1919 was brought out on the cross-examination of a witness for the defendant, who had testified "some of the land was worth $15 or $20 an acre, but it was poor sorry land, big gullies and washes, so that you could bury a horse anywhere you wanted to," and was properly admitted for the purpose of contradicting or testing this witness.

The witness testified when asked the value of the crops in 1919:

"I declare I do not know how much crop was raised on it, but a good crop, about 6 acres of tobacco, worth about $1,000. The crops this year are about as good as they were last year."

If, as was thus shown, the crops raised on the land in 1918 and 1919 or 1919 and 1920 were good, the jury might well doubt the statement of the witness on his examination in chief that on December 31, 1917, when the deed was executed, "It was poor sorry land, big gullies and washes, so that you could bury a horse anywhere you wanted to," evidence offered by the defendant to show that the consideration named in the deed was adequate.

We find no error in the trial.

No error.

HART v. WOODMEN OF THE WORLD.
(No. 290.)

1. Insurance \S 755(3)—Acceptance of original premium after notice of hazardous occupation precluded forfeiture of benefit certificate.

Where the jury found that the holder of a benefit certificate gave to the clerk of his camp, as required by his certificate, notice of engaging in a hazardous occupation, and the corporation thereafter collected and retained the premiums paid at the original rate, it waived its right to forfeit the certificate for nonpayment of the additional premium required from those engaged in hazardous occupations.

2. Insurance \S 755(2)—Notice to the clerk of camp as required is notice to a fraternal benefit association.

Notice of engaging in a hazardous occupation, given to the clerk of the local camp as required by the by-laws of a fraternal benefit association, is notice to the association, so that its retention of the premiums paid without increase for such occupation was waiver by its own acts of its right to forfeit for nonpayment of the additional premium, and it cannot rely on a provision of its by-laws denying to any officer the right to waive any provision thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover County; Daniels, Judge.

Action by Catherine H. Hart against the Woodmen of the World. Judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals. No error.

This was a civil action to recover on a contract of insurance issued by the defendant on the life of Lee Roy Hart for the benefit of his mother, plaintiff herein.

The defendant's constitution and by-laws contain the following stipulations:

(1) "If a member engage in any of the (hazardous) occupations mentioned in this section he shall within 30 days notify the clerk of his camp of such change of occupation, and while so engaged in such occupation shall pay on each assessment 30 cents for each $1,000 of his beneficiary certificate in addition to the regular rate. Any such member failing to notify the clerk and to make such payments as above provided shall stand suspended, and his beneficiary certificate be null and void."

(2) "No officer, employé, or agent * * * shall have the power, right, or authority to waive any of the conditions upon which beneficiary certificates are issued, or to change, vary, or waive any of the provisions of the constitution and by-laws," etc.

It was admitted that after the insured had received his beneficiary certificate he changed his occupation and became a brakeman on a freight train, which is denominated in the defendant's by-laws as hazardous. The insured continued in this work for a period of more than a year and until his death, during which time he paid the regular premiums on his certificate, but did not pay the additional 30 cents due by reason of the change in his employment.

Upon issues joined, the jury returned the following verdict:

"First. Did the plaintiff's intestate fail to give notice to the defendant within 30 days of the change of his occupation? Answer: No.

"Second. Was the plaintiff's intestate able and willing to pay the increased premium required for such changed occupation? Answer: Yes."

Judgment on the verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of the certificate, less 30 cents per month for the time plaintiff's intestate was employed in the said hazardous work. Defendant excepted and appealed.

Jos. W. Little and Geo. H. Howell, both of Wilmington, for appellant.

E. K. Bryan, of Wilmington, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The following reasons are assigned by his honor in support of the judgment entered in the superior court:

"It further appearing to the court that after the plaintiff's intestate changed his occupation he made to the defendant as many as 12 or more monthly payments of dues and assessments, and that the same was transmitted to the defendant by the clerk of the local camp, as required by the by-laws, and that after the death of the plaintiff's intestate proofs of death and loss were duly made out and transmitted to the defendant, as required by the said policy of insurance, constitution, and by-laws, and after the receipt of the same the defendant denied liability and refused to pay to the plaintiff, the beneficiary in the policy, the amount thereof, and that the defendant has failed and refused to return to the plaintiff's intestate, or his personal representative, the premiums, dues, and assessments levied on account of said policy, and in filing its answer herein made no offer to return the same, but has kept the said premiums, dues, and assessments which were paid to it for the purpose of keeping in force the insurance contract sued on, and the court being of the opinion, on such facts, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover of the defendant, it is therefore ordered," etc.

[1] The defendant takes the position that none of the provisions of its constitution and by-laws could be waived by any officer or agent, and that the failure of the insured to pay the additional 30 cents per month, while engaged in the hazardous work, rendered his certificate null and void. We do not think this position open to the defendant on the record. The insured was required to notify the clerk of his camp within 30 days of his change of occupation, which was done, ac-

ording to the verdict of the jury. With knowledge of the changed and hazardous employment of the insured, the defendant continued to accept the dues and assessments at the old rate. This was not an unauthorized act of an officer or an agent, but the defendant's own election deliberately made. Such was a waiver of its right to insist upon a forfeiture of the policy. Bergeron v. Insurance Co., 111 N. C. 45, 15 S. E. 883.

It has been held with us, in a number of cases, that where an applicant knowingly misrepresents a material fact, and the company, with full knowledge of the circumstances and falsity of the statement, issues a policy, receives the premiums, and recognizes and continues to recognize the applicant as holding a contract of insurance, it ordinarily will be estopped from insisting on a forfeiture of the policy that otherwise might ensue. Robinson v. Brotherhood, 170 N. C. 545, 87 S. E. 537; Grabbs v. Insurance Co., 125 N. C. 389, 34 S. E. 503.

[2] It is not necessary to discuss the principle, announced in numerous decisions, that notice to the agent is notice to the company; for in the instant case the insured, when he changed his occupation, was only required to notify the clerk of his camp, which he did, and this was notice to the defendant. Fishplate v. Fidelity Co., 140 N. C. 589, 53 S. E. 354. See, also, Carden v. Sons & Daughters of Liberty, 179 N. C. 399, 102 S. E. 610.

After a careful examination of the defendant's exceptions and assignments of error, we are convinced that the case was tried according to law and precedent.

No error.

NEWMAN v. MASONIC MUT. LIFE INS. CO. (No. 221.)

Insurance §186(2)—Recovery under life policy held proper where insured died during grace period for payment of last premium.

Where a 10-year renewable life insurance policy with premiums payable quarterly provided for 30 days' grace for payment of premiums, the policy expiring by its terms December 31st, the last premium being due on that date, and insured died on January 23d, insurer sending proof of death together with a statement that, as insured had 30 days' grace in which to pay the premium, the policy was in full force, a recovery on the policy was proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Connor, Judge.

Action by Sarah E. Newman against the Masonic Mutual Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action on a policy of insurance.

The facts appear in the judgment rendered in the superior court, which is as follows:

"This cause coming on for trial before his honor, George W. Connor, and a trial of the issues by jury being expressly waived by counsel of both sides, who agreed that the court should find the facts and enter judgment, etc., and upon consideration of the entire evidence submitted the court finds the following facts:

"(1) That on December 15, 1906, M. J. Newman applied to defendant company for policy of insurance, the form of policy being a 10-year renewable policy, with premiums payable quarterly.

"(2) That pursuant to said application policy numbered 6640 was duly issued on December 3, 1906, payable to plaintiff, Sarah E. Newman, upon proper proof of the death of her husband, the insured, provided the policy was in force at the time of his death.

"(3) By the terms of said policy it was expressly stipulated that 30 days' grace would be given for payment of any premiums after the first without interest, and the policy should be null and void immediately after the time of grace, allowed for payment of any premium, had expired.

"(4) By the terms of said policy it was further stipulated that the same might be exchanged (without re-examination and without written application to the association at any time before its expiration when no premium was due and unpaid) for any other form of policy written by said association. (Whereby the association's liability shall not be increased, or premium rate lowered.) The new policy to run from the date of the surrender of this policy, at the rate of premium then chargeable by the association, on policies of that date, at the then age of the insured.

"(5) That by the terms of said policy it was expressly stipulated that the privilege was given for renewing said policy without re-examination for successive periods of 10 years each, before the expiration of each period, the premiums for new periods to be increased with the increased age of the member according to table of rates stated and printed upon the policy, and to be payable on the dates mentioned therein.

"(6) That said M. J. Newman paid all the premiums on said policy up to and including the quarterly premium due October 1, 1916, and said policy by its terms would have expired on December 31, 1916.

"(7) That on December 4, 1916, defendant company wrote a letter to said Newman, calling his attention to the fact that his policy would expire December 3, 1916, and if he renewed it for another period of 10 years the quarterly premium due December 31, 1916, would be $23.44, in which letter the said company directed his attention to his rights to exchange this policy to a whole life policy, setting forth the advantages to the insured of the exchange.

"(8) That on December 13, 1916, the defendant company again wrote Newman a letter, acknowledging its receipt of its letter of the 12th of December, 1916, setting forth in full the terms and provisions in accordance with which he might take a whole life policy, and by said letter advised the insured further as follows: 'You of course have until January 30th, 1917, to pay the premium due December 31st, 1916.'

"(9) That on December 15, 1916, the defendant company forwarded to insured a notice by postal card, advising him that the premium on his policy of $23.44 would be due December 31, 1916, and this premium would keep his policy in force till April 1, 1917, and that said notice was duly received by said Newman.

"(10) That on January 3, 1917, the insured, M. J. Newman, wrote defendant company advising it that he was unable to avail himself of his privilege of exchanging his 10-year renewal policy for a whole life policy.

"(11) That on January 3, 1917, the defendant company wrote said M. J. Newman a letter advising him that no reply had been received from him to its letter of December 13, 1916, relative to the exchange and conversion of the 10-year policy into a whole life policy, and further advising him that it had mailed him on December 15, 1916, its regular postal card notice for the quarterly premium sum of $23.44, due December, 1916, under his 10-year term policy, and further advising him that if he desired to make the change it would adjust his premium accordingly.

"(12) That on January 23, 1917, the insured died, was buried the 24th of January, 1917, and on the 25th of January, 1917, the plaintiff through his attorney, Henry E. Faison, Esq., duly mailed notice of insured's death to the defendant company at Washington, D. C., and requested its blanks upon which proofs of his death could be made.

"(13) That replying thereto on January 26th, the said company wrote the said attorney for plaintiff, acknowledging receipt of the proofs of death of M. J. Newman, requesting the same to be filled up and returned, and further stating, 'That this association does not take advantage of technicalities in settlement of policies.'

"(14) That said blanks were duly filled out and returned to the company on January 27, 1917, and on February 3d, following, the defendant company advised said attorney that the proofs of death had been duly received, but declined to pay the plaintiff anything on the policy.

"And upon the foregoing facts, the court being of the opinion that the policy was valid and in force at the death of the insured, M. J. Newman, adjudges that the defendant company is liable to the plaintiff herein and hereby rendering judgment in her behalf that she recover of the defendant company the sum of $2,000, less the sum of $23.44 and interest on said balance of $1,976.56 from February 3, 1917, till paid, and the costs of this action to be taxed by the clerk. Geo. W. Connor, Judge."

Winston & Matthews, of Windsor, and J. P. Schick, of Washington, D. C., for appellant.

Henry E. Faison, of Clinton, and James S. Manning, of Raleigh, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The facts found are sufficient to support the judgment, which seems to be in accord with the views of the defendant before this action was commenced, as its secretary and general manager wrote the attorney for the plaintiff on January 28, 1917:

"Mr. Newman's premium was due on December 31st, and he had thirty days' grace in which to pay it. The policy was therefore in full force and effect when he died. We are therefore inclosing you the proofs of death."

Affirmed.

SCOTLAND NECK COTTON MILLS v.
SHAW COTTON MILLS, Inc.
(No. 103.)

1. Sales ⇐176(1)—Breach of contract to deliver yarn may be waived.

Though a breach of contract to deliver yarn occurred, giving buyer right to sue for damages, the breach might be waived by extending time for performance.

2. Sales ⇐182(1)—Time of breach of contract held question of fact.

Though there was evidence that a breach of contract to deliver yarn occurred in June, 1919, the time of breach is a question of fact for the jury; there also being evidence that the parties treated the contract as in force in March, 1920.

3. Sales ⇐418(2)—Evidence of market value of yarn at a date later than first breach of contract held admissible.

In an action for breach of contract to deliver yarn, in which there was evidence that the parties treated the contract in force in March, 1920, though first breach occurred in June, 1919, evidence of the market value of the yarn in March, 1920, was admissible.

4. Trial ⇐295(4)—Charge to be construed as a whole.

A charge is not erroneous which, when considered as a whole, merely stated the contentions of the parties, though isolated statements might be held to be expressions of opinion.

5. Sales ⇐418(2)—Measure of damages for failure to deliver yarn held difference between market price and contract price.

In an action for breach of contract to deliver blue yarn at 31 cents per pound, in which there was evidence that contract was breached in March, 1920, and the market price at that time was 66 cents—68 cents, per pound, an instruction that measure of damages would be difference between contract price and market price of blue yarn at time of breach held not erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Halifax County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by the Scotland Neck Cotton Mills against the Shaw Cotton Mills, Incorporated.

Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. No error.

The court instructed on the measure of damages that—

"If you find from the evidence * * * that the contract was not broken and that it continued in existence up to March 10, 1920, and you further find that the market price of blue yarn was 66 cents, 67 cents, or 68 cents, * * * plaintiff would be entitled to recover the difference between whatever amount you find the market price of blue yarn was on that date and the contract price."

The contract price was 31 cents per pound.

This is an action to recover damages for breach of a contract, under which the defendant agreed to deliver to the plaintiff 30,000 pounds of blue yarn at the price of 31 cents per pound.

The defendant admitted the execution of the contract and its breach, and the principal controversy was as to the time of the breach, the defendant contending that the breach occurred in June, 1919, and the plaintiff that the breach was on the 10th of March, 1920.

On the trial of the action the plaintiff was permitted to offer evidence showing the market value of blue yarns on the 10th of March, 1920, and the defendant excepted upon the ground that all the evidence showed that the breach was in June, 1919. The market price of yarn increased from June, 1919, to March 10, 1920.

There are other exceptions taken by the defendant to the charge.

There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant excepted and appealed.

Ashby W. Dunn, of Scotland Neck, and Daniel & Daniel, for appellant.

E. L. Travis, of Halifax, A. P. Kitchin, of Scotland Neck, and Geo. C. Green, of Weldon, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. [1-3] There was undoubtedly a breach of the contract by the defendant in June, 1919, in that it failed to deliver the yarns according to its agreement, and the plaintiff then had the right to sue to recover damages, but it could also waive the breach and could extend the time for the performance of the contract, and an examination of the correspondence in the record leads us to the conclusion that there is evidence that both parties treated the contract in force and were expecting performance up to the 10th of March, 1920, and, if so, the time of the breach was a question of fact to be determined by the jury.

On the 10th of March the defendant wrote the plaintiff, "I find it impossible to resume shipments on your order and an adjustment of the matter will have to be made on other lines," indicating that up to that time parties dealt with the contract as still in force.

The letter goes on to state the different efforts made by the defendant to perform the contract, and then says, "We are so badly behind with orders that should have been delivered last fall that it is impossible to figure when we can produce any yarn in excess of our own requirements," and again, "If the mill could have run you would have gotten your yarn before January 1st," from which it may reasonably be inferred that the parties had not regarded the contract at an end before that time.

It follows, therefore, as there was evidence that the time of the breach was on the 10th of March, 1920, that evidence of the market value at that date was competent and properly received.

The other exceptions relied on by the defendant are to the statements of the contentions of the parties.

[4] We have examined these with care, and while there are statements which, standing alone, might be held to be expressions of opinion, when the charge is considered as a whole, it is manifest that the judge presiding was only stating the contentions of the parties, and, as it appears to us, this was done impartially and with due regard to the rights of both parties.

[5] The rule for the measure of damages laid down for the guidance of the jury is the one approved in Hoslery Co. v. Cotton Mills, 140 N. C. 454, 53 S. E. 140.

We have carefully considered all of the exceptions, and find nothing that will warrant a reversal of the judgment.

No error.

BARDEN v. AMERICAN RY. EXPRESS CO.
(No. 220.)

1. Carriers ⇨228(5)—Loss or damage in transit makes out prima facie case of negligence.

Loss of or injury to animals while in the possession of a carrier or under its control makes out a prima facie case in favor of shipper.

2. Carriers ⇨228(1)—Presumption of negligence where stock lost or injured not rebutted by shipper's contract to care for and feed stock.

The presumption of negligence of carrier arising from proof of injury to or loss of stock while in carrier's control is not overcome or rebutted because of an agreement to give plaintiff free transportation, and that he would feed and care for the stock, where damage was not caused by failure of plaintiff to perform his agreement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Duplin County; Connor, Judge.

Action by J. J. Barden, Jr., against the American Railway Express Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. No error.

This is an action to recover the value of one gray mare and one mule.

On November 13, 1917, the plaintiff purchased a carload of stock in East St. Louis, Mo., consisting of 21 mules and 8 horses, to be shipped to Warsaw, N. C. The stock were loaded on the car about 7 p. m., and left at 8 p. m. the same day; none of the stock were lame or sick, and they all appeared to be in good condition. The plaintiff entered into the written contract set out in the record, and was furnished a free pass to accompany the stock as far as Washington, D. C., and agreed on his part to look after the stock, care for, feed, and water them. Plaintiff left on the same train with stock, which reached Harrisburg, Pa., about 5 a. m. November 15th. The stock were unloaded and fed at Harrisburg, and the mule was lame when driven off the car at Harrisburg, and the horses were in good condition.

Plaintiff then left Harrisburg with the stock, went on to Washington, D. C., and on to Richmond, Va., and he saw the stock at Richmond. At Richmond plaintiff bought a ticket, took a berth, and went to bed, and the stock reached Warsaw on the morning of the 17th, one day after the arrival of the plaintiff, although the agent of the defendant told the plaintiff at Richmond the car of stock would go on same train with him, and when unloaded the mule was still lame, and after reaching plaintiff's stable a wire nail was found in his foot. The gray mare appeared to be paralyzed, when stock was unloaded, hurt on the back, and died in a day or two. The mule got better and was sold.

The evidence of the plaintiff tended to prove that the injury to the mare was caused by something falling on her back, and that the nail in the foot of the mule was in the car when the shipment began.

There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant excepted and appealed.

Stevens & Beasley, of Kenansville, for appellant.

Gavin & Blanton, of Kenansville, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. All of the exceptions of the defendant raise the same question, and that is whether there was sufficient evidence to be submitted to the jury.

[1, 2] The defendant does not deny the proposition that proof of loss or damage while in its possession or under its control makes out a prima facie case in favor of the plaintiff, but it contends that this principle has no application because of the agreement to give the plaintiff free transportation, and that he would feed and care for the stock.

There is authority for this position, although it is held by some of the courts that such a stipulation in a bill of lading is void because it is a contract to relieve the carrier of its common-law duty. (See Railroad v. Fagan, 72 Tex. 127, 9 S. W. 749, 2 L. R. A. 75, 13 Am. St. Rep. 776; Heller v. Railroad, 109 Mich. 53, 66 N. W. 667, 163 Am. St. Rep. 554; Stiles v. Railroad, 129 Ky. 175, 110 S. W. 820, 19 S. L. R. A. [N. S.] 86, 130 Am. St. Rep. 461, note), but however this may be, it cannot prevail, and cannot rebut the presumption arising from injuries and damage sustained while in the possession of the defendant, except where the damage is caused by the failure of the plaintiff to perform his agreement, and in this case there is no evidence of such failure.

Again, the free transportation did not extend beyond Washington City, and up to that point did not require the plaintiff to ride in the car with the stock, and although the defendant's agent promised to do so it did not carry the stock on the same train with the plaintiff from Richmond to Warsaw, and during this part of the shipment and for more than 24 hours the defendant had complete control and custody of the car of stock in the absence of the plaintiff.

Also the nature of the injuries furnished circumstantial evidence that the defendant did not furnish a reasonably safe car, and that this was the cause of the injury, and, if so, the defendant was negligent.

(181 N. C. 79)

WHICHARD et al. v. WHITEHURST et al.
(No. 171.)

1. Deeds ⇨ 124(1)—Before 1879 words of inheritance were necessary to conveyance of fee.

Prior to Laws 1879, c. 148, now C. S. § 991, the word "heirs" was generally necessary in conveyances to the creation of a fee-simple estate, with the exception of devises and equitable estates, as to which it was held an estate of inheritance would pass without such word if such was the clear intent of the parties.

2. Deeds ⇨ 124(2) — Conveyance to woman and nearest blood relative held intended to convey fee.

A deed conveying property to a named woman and her nearest blood relations forever for the recited consideration of natural love and affection for the grantee, who was grantor's daughter, and as her full share of grantor's property, was intended to convey the fee to grantee, and not to convey merely a life estate to her with remainder to her nearest blood relation.

3. Deeds ⇨ 124(2)—Construed to give effect to intent to convey fee without words of inheritance.

The decisions of the courts have extended and broadened the application of the principle that the intention of the grantor is to be considered in the interpretation of the deed in accord with the spirit of C. S. § 991, so as to give effect to an intention manifested by the whole instrument to convey a fee, though no words of inheritance were used in the deed.

4. Deeds ⇨ 124(2) — Corrected by inserting words of inheritance to effectuate intent.

Where a deed executed prior to enactment of C. S. § 991, was manifestly intended to convey a fee-simple estate and was a substitute for a devise, but failed to use the word "heirs" therein, the court, in a cause submitted on case agreed, in the exercise of its equitable powers, can consider the suit as one to correct the instrument by inserting therein the word "heirs," and so carry into effect the evident intent of the parties.

Stacy and Allen, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Devin, Judge.

Suit by Z. V. Whichard and others against C. J. Whitehurst and others, submitted on an agreed statement of facts. From a judgment holding plaintiffs entitled to an undivided six-tenths interest only in the land, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

This case was submitted under C. S. § 961, upon the following "facts agreed":

In 1871 John F. Whichard and his wife conveyed to their daughter the land in controversy, duly described, "unto said Anne E. Page and her nearest blood relation forever."

At the date of said deed, said Anne E. Page had living one son named Billy Page, who died before reaching his majority and left no children, but since the date of said deed there has been born to her five children who were living when Billy died.

In 1910 said Anne E. Page conveyed said land to the wife of one of her sons in fee simple, who subsequently conveyed the same, with the joinder of her husband, to the plaintiffs. This proceeding was instituted for the purpose of selling the land for partition and was bought by the the defendants, who now decline to accept a deed from the commissioner and pay for the land solely upon the ground that they cannot obtain fee-simple title to the same. The court held that the plaintiffs were entitled to an undivided one-half interest in the land by reason of the deed from Anne E. Page and to a one-tenth undivided interest by reason of the deed from C. F. Page and wife, but that the other four defendants, children of Anne Page, are the owners in fee simple of an undivided four-tenths, as tenants in common, interest in said lands, from which judgment the plaintiffs appealed.

S. J. Everett, of Greenville, for appellants.
Skinner & Whedbee, of Greenville, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. [1] Prior to the act of 1879, now C. S. § 991, the word "heirs" was generally held necessary to the creation of a fee-simple estate in conveyances, but there is an exception as to devises and equitable estates as to which it was held that an estate of inheritance would generally pass without the word "heirs" if such was the clear intent of the parties. Holmes v. Holmes, 86 N. C. 205-207, cited by Hoke, J.; Smith v. Proctor, 139 N. C. 319, 51 S. E. 889, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 172. This conveyance is in the nature of a devise, or rather is a substitute for it and is so expressed.

[2] This is not a conveyance to Anne E. Page for life only and then to her nearest blood relation, but the conveyance is to "Anne E. Page and her nearest blood relation forever." In Cullens v. Cullens, 161 N. C. 344, 77 S. E. 228, L. R. A. 1917B, 74, it is stated that it is settled in this state that, when a conveyance of land is made to a woman "and her children," the grantee named and her children living at the date of the deed are tenants in common, but we think that upon the face of this deed the intent was not to convey the land to Anne E. Page and her living son, Billy Page, as tenants in common, but that the true intent was to convey the land to her in fee simple. In Beacom v. Amos, 161 N. C. 366, 77 S. E. 411, it is said:

"The law will not allow the plain intention to be defeated by any omission to use technical words to express it, if equivalent terms are employed for the purpose."

This conveyance recites in the first paragraph that it is made "to Anne El Page, daughter," by the grantors, saying in the second paragraph that the consideration is "natural love and affection for her"; and the fourth paragraph recites that "this and the other property given to our said daughter is a full and equitable share of all our property and we do hereby declare that in case we die intestate she shall never inherit anything else from our estate." There is no indication that it was intended that the "nearest blood relation" was intended to be a beneficiary of any interest in said conveyance, the consideration of which was "love and affection to the daughter," and, together with other property given her, was "her full and equitable share" of all the property of the grantors, and upon that ground they disinherit her from inheriting any other part of their estate if they should die intestate.

[3] As far back as Armfield v. Walker, 27 N. C. 583, it was held that—

"If a deed, for a valuable consideration, give land to another and his heirs, it is a good deed on delivery to pass the estate in fee, notwithstanding it be very informally framed (Co. Lit. 7[a]; Kent's Com. 461), and it is a rule of law that, if two constructions can be placed upon a deed or any part of it, that shall be given to it which is most beneficial to the grantee."

The decisions since have extended and broadened the application of the principle that the intention of the grantor is to be considered in the interpretation of a deed. Smith v. Proctor, 139 N. C. 314, 51 S. E. 889, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 172; Fulbright v. Yoder, 113 N. C. 456, 18 S. E. 713; Winborne v. Downing, 105 N. C. 20, 10 S. E. 888; Vickers v. Leigh, 104 N. C. 248, 10 S. E. 308; Hicks v. Bullock, 96 N. C. 164, 1 S. E. 629; Ricks v. Pulliam, 94 N. C. 225; Bunn v. Wells, 94 N. C. 67. Indeed, the latest decisions hold that the intention now is to be gathered from the whole deed without dissecting it into parts as at common law. Gulford County v. Porter, 167 N. C. 366, 83 S. E. 564; Triplett v. Williams, 149 N. C. 394, 63 S. E. 79, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 514.

In Fulbright v. Yoder, 113 N. C. 456, 18 S. E. 713, it is held, citing Holmes v. Holmes, 86 N. C. 205, that—

"Although words of inheritance are omitted in a deed, yet, if the real intention of the grantor appear to be to confer a fee, that effect will be given to the limitation."

In that case the deed was made in 1860, and, like this, was made to a son, and the court held that—

While this construction "is not supported by text-writers or the previous decisions of this court, yet it is believed to be founded upon more equitable principles in arriving at the real intention of the grantor. It is also in accord with the spirit of recent legislation, Code, § 1280 [now C. S. 991], which declares the limitations without the use of the word 'heirs' shall be construed as limitations in fee, unless a contrary intention plainly appears."

This case has been cited often since, among others in Helms v. Austin, 116 N. C. 753, 21 S. E. 556, and Smith v. Proctor, 139 N. C. 314, 51 S. E. 889, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 172.

Among other cases, Moore v. Quince, 109 N. C. 92, 13 S. E. 872, and Rackley v. Chestnutt, 110 N. C. 262, 14 S. E. 750, hold that, where the instrument upon its face contains sufficient evidence of a manifest purpose of the grantor to convey an estate in fee, it will be so construed. Formerly the court, in its efforts to effectuate the grantor's intent, had resort to equitable principles, or lay hold upon expressions in other parts of the deed containing the sacramental words "heirs" and transposed it into the conveying clause, and would go through the formality of requiring an amendment or correction of the deed. The later decisions, as above set forth, conforming to the evident intention of the parties and the legislative construction dispensing with the word "heirs," have resorted to the direct process of construing the conveyance to mean in fee when such intention clearly appears. In this case, in addition to what is already said, the intention of the grantor to convey a fee simple to the daughter is apparent from the reading of the whole deed, for not only the grantor uses the words "her equitable share," "her," "she," but adds the word "forever," which evidently intended to convey the property in fee to her. There is no limitation of a life estate or any intention indicated to convey any interest therein to her son.

In a very illuminative opinion in Beacom v. Amos, 161 N. C. 365, 77 S. E. 407, citing numerous cases, Walker, J., thus quotes from Gudger v. White, 141 N. C. 507, 54 S. E. 386, as a correct statement of the modern rule for the construction of deeds:

"We are required by the settled canon of construction so to interpret it as to ascertain and effectuate the intention of the parties. Their meaning, it is true, must be expressed in the instrument; but it is proper to seek for a rational purpose in the language and provisions of the deed and to construe it consistently with reason and common sense. If there is any doubt entertained as to the real intention, we should reject that interpretation which plainly leads to injustice and adopt that one which conforms more to the presumed meaning, because it does not produce unusual and unjust results. All this is subject, however, to the inflexible rule that the intention must be gathered from the entire instrument, 'after looking,' as the phrase is, 'at the four corners of it.'"

And again:

"Words shall always operate according to the intention of the parties, if by law they may, and, if they cannot operate in one form, they shall operate in that which by law shall effectuate the intention. This is the more just and rational mode of expounding a deed, for, if the intention cannot be ascertained, the rigorous rule is resorted to, from the necessity of taking the deed most strongly against the grantor."

[4] Ordinarily in a deed of this kind of date prior to 1879, even when containing on its face sufficient evidence of an intent by the grantor to convey the fee, a suit to correct the instrument is required; but this cause being submitted on case agreed, or when all the facts affecting the rights of the parties are set forth, and there being plenary evidence on the face of the instrument itself that a fee-simple estate was intended, the court, in the exercise of its equitable powers, is fully justified in treating this as a suit to correct the instrument by inserting the word "heirs," and so carry into effect the evident intent of the parties. Vickers v. Leigh, 104 N. C. 248, 10 S. E. 308.

Construing the conveyance, therefore, according to its meaning and intent as appears upon the face of the instrument, we think the conveyance was to her, the daughter, in fee simple, though inartificially expressed.

The grantee so understood it and made the conveyance in fee simple to the wife of one of her sons who has since joined in the conveyance to the plaintiffs in this action. All of the children of Anne Page for over 30 years have acquiesced in the sole possession by their mother, and for 10 years in the conveyance by her.

We think upon the facts agreed that judgment should have declared that the plaintiffs were owners in fee simple, and that the purchasers should pay the purchase money.

Reversed.

STACY, J., dissenting (ALLEN, J., concurring in dissent). The deed submitted for construction in this proceeding was made in 1871. In the granting clause these words appear, "unto the said Anne E. Page and her nearest blood relation forever," and the habendum contains the following language:

"To have and to hold said tract of land and premises with all the appurtenances thereto belonging to her, the said Anne E. Page and her nearest blood relation."

- At the time of the execution and delivery of said deed Anne E. Page had only one son living, Billy Page, who was her nearest blood relation. The word "heirs" appears nowhere in the conveyance, either in connection with the names of the grantors or the grantees. It is omitted entirely from the instrument.

In the majority opinion it is conceded that prior to the enactment of chapter 148, Public Laws of 1879, in real property conveyances the use of the word "heirs" in connection with the name of the grantee was necessary to convey a fee-simple estate, except in devises and trusts or equitable estates, where it clearly appeared that a fee simple was intended. As stated by Mr. Justice Hoke in Smith v. Proctor, 139 N. C. 314, 51 S. E. 889, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 172:

"It is true that prior to the act of 1879 the word 'heirs' was generally held necessary to the creation of a fee-simple estate in deeds conveying the legal title. It was not so in devises nor in equitable estates, where it was generally held that an estate of inheritance would pass without the word 'heirs' if such was the clear intent of the parties"—citing Holmes v. Holmes, 86 N. C. 205.

The case at bar, however, comes under neither of these exceptions. The instrument is not a devise, nor do we think it can be held as a substitute for one. It falls in many respects to meet the requirements of a valid will. It is a deed only, and we are asked to construe it as such. It does not purport to create or convey a trust estate, and no equitable relief is sought. The pleadings present only a construction of the deed as a question of law. The parties have thus elected to stand upon their rights, and the case should be decided accordingly.

It has been held with us in a long line of decisions that, as a mere construction of the legal title on the face of the instrument, in deeds bearing date prior to the statute of 1879, the use of the word "heirs" in some way descriptive of the grantee's interest was necessary, and always required, for the creation of a fee-simple estate. Boggan v. Somers, 152 N. C. 390, 67 S. E. 965; Real Estate Co. v. Bland, 152 N. C. 225, 67 S. E. 483. And where the word "heirs" or words of inheritance are entirely omitted from the deed, only a life estate passes by such conveyance. Cullens v. Cullens, 161 N. C. 844, 77 S. E. 228, L. R. A. 1917B, 74; Batchelor v. Whitaker, 88 N. C. 350. "There is no principle of law better established than that the word 'heirs' is absolutely necessary in a deed [executed prior to 1879] to convey a fee-simple estate." Stell v. Barham, 87 N. C. 62. The omission of the word "heirs," or words of inheritance, from a deed, if executed before the act of 1879, will have the effect of vesting only a life estate in the bargainee. Anderson v. Logan, 105 N. C. 268, 11 S. E. 361; Boggan v. Somers, supra.

It should be remembered that the aid of equity is not invoked in this case. There is no allegation that the word "heirs" or words of inheritance were omitted by mistake, inadvertence, etc., which would bring the case under the doctrine announced in Fulbright v. Yoder, 113 N. C. 456, 18 S. E. 713, Rackley v. Chestnutt, 110 N. C. 262, 14 S. E. 750, Vickers v. Leigh, 104 N. C. 248, 10 S. E. 308, Rutledge v. Smith, 45 N. C. 283, Armfield v. Walker, 27 N. C. 583, Real Estate Co. v. Bland, supra, and other cases to like import. Nor is there any question of a trust or equitable estate involved, as in the cases of Moore v. Quince, 109 N. C. 89, 13 S. E. 872, Holmes

v. Holmes, 86 N. C. 205, supra, and Smith v. Proctor, supra.

But conceding, for the moment, that the instrument clearly shows an intention on the part of the grantors to convey a fee-simple estate, and that upon proper allegations the deed should be reformed or corrected, how can we say that Anne E. Page is to take a fee simple, and Billy Page, her nearest blood relation living at the time of the execution of the deed, is to take no interest at all? It was held in Cullens v. Cullens, supra, that a deed executed prior to 1879 to "Sarah A. Cullens and her children" conveyed only a life estate, but that the woman and her three children living at the time took as tenants in common and that the children were entitled to share with the mother in the estate—citing Campbell v. Everhart, 139 N. C. 511, 52 S. E. 201, Heath v. Heath, 114 N. C. 547, 19 S. E. 155, Gay v. Baker, 58 N. C. 344, 68 Am. Dec. 229, and Dupree v. Dupree, 45 N. C. 164, 59 Am. Dec. 590.

For the foregoing reasons, and on account of the numerous decisions in our reports contra, we are unable to agree with the conclusion reached in this case by a majority of the court

THOMAS v. HOUSTON et al. (No. 219.)

1. Gifts ¶53—Elements of "gift causa mortis" stated.

To constitute a "gift causa mortis," not only is an intentional transfer and actual or constructive delivery necessary, but it must be made in view of impending dissolution or in contemplation of death from a present illness or some immediate peril.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Gift Causa Mortis.]

2. Gifts ¶66(2)—Husband held not to have made gift causa mortis of money deposited in his name and that of his wife.

Where a husband, at a time when he was up and about his business, deposited money in a bank on a certificate of deposit payable to the order of himself or his wife, stating that he wanted to deposit it so that in case he died his wife could get it, and placed the certificate of deposit in his wife's trunk where his other valuable papers were kept, there was no gift causa mortis accompanied by actual or constructive delivery.

3. Gifts ¶19(1)—There may be possession without delivery but not delivery without possession.

Possession of the subject of an alleged gift may be had where no delivery has been made, but there can be no valid delivery unless possession actual or constructive accompanies it.

4. Gifts ¶18(1)—Intent and delivery essential to gift inter vivos.

To constitute a gift inter vivos there must not only be a donative intent, but delivery is an indispensable requisite.

5. Gifts ¶11—Gift inter vivos cannot take effect in the future.

A gift inter vivos cannot be made to take effect in the future, as this would amount only to a promise or agreement to make a gift.

6. Gifts ¶55—"Gifts inter vivos" and "causa mortis" distinguished.

The chief distinguishing characteristics between a "gift inter vivos" and one "causa mortis" are that the former is absolute and takes effect in present, while the other is revocable and takes effect in futuro.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Gift Inter Vivos.]

7. Gifts ¶49(5)—Evidence held not to show intention to give or deliver deposit.

Evidence showing that a husband deposited money in a bank on a certificate of deposit, payable to himself and his wife, stating that he wanted to leave it so his wife could get it if he died, and that he placed the certificate of deposit in his wife's trunk where his other valuable papers were kept, was insufficient to show either an intention to make a gift inter vivos or a delivery of the certificate of deposit.

8. Wills ¶566—Certificate of deposit held not to pass as "moneys on hand."

A will containing a bequest of all moneys on hand at the testator's death held to indicate a purpose not to include a certificate of deposit as "money on hand."

9. Wills ¶487(3)—Testator's declaration as to intent held inadmissible on question of construction.

In construing a will, the testimony of a witness that the testator told him prior to the execution of the will what he wanted done with money in a bank was incompetent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Duplin County; Connor, Judge.

Action by H. S. Thomas, executor of R. C. Houston, against Hattie Houston and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Civil Action brought to determine the ownership of $1,500 deposited in the Bank of Beulaville by plaintiff's testator on February 26, 1917, taking from the bank a certificate of deposit in words and figures as follows, to wit:

"Beulaville, N. C., Feb. 26, 1917.

"This is to certify that R. C. Houston has deposited with the Bank of Beulaville fifteen hundred dollars, payable in current funds to the order of himself or wife Hattie Houston on return of this certificate properly indorsed with interest at 4 per cent. per annum if left 3 months.

"No interest after one year unless renewed.
"[Signed] A. L. Cavanaugh, Cashier."

The cashier of the bank testified that at the time of this deposit the deceased stated:

"He wanted to deposit it on interest so that in case he died, leaving the money in the bank, his wife, Hattie Houston, could get it."

There was also evidence tending to show that R. C. Houston, the deceased, on the date of issuance of said certificate of deposit, placed the same in his wife's trunk where his deeds, notes, and other valuable papers were kept.

The deceased also left a will, from which it appears no specific disposition was made of this certificate of deposit as such, and the residuary legatees, save the appellant, contend that this item would pass under the residuary clause.

Excluding formal parts, the will was as follows:

Second. I give and devise to my beloved wife, Hattie Houston, the tract of land on which I now reside, containing 86½ acres, for her natural life in satisfaction of her dower and thirds in all my lands also her share of team horse or mule one cart and one buggy, together with harness, also my entire household and kitchen furniture of every description except one large chest and its contents all my entire stocks of hogs, poultry, cattle, and also my entire growing crops, and provisions that I may have on hand at my death. Also all moneys that I may have on hand at my death.

Third. I give and devise to my granddaughter, Kitsy Elizebeth Jones and her heirs in fee simple the remainder of my entire tract of land of one hundred and seventy three acres also one large chest and its contents together with my photograph.

Fourth. I give and bequeath to George Baker, my great-nephew, at the death of my present wife Hattie Houston, the tract of land willed to her by me during her natural life.

Fifth. My will and desire is that all residue of my estate if any after taking out the devises and legacies above mentioned shall be sold and the debts owing to me collected, and if there should be any surplus over and above the payment of debts, expenses and legacies, that such surplus shall be equally divided between my wife, Hattie Houston, Kitsy Elizebeth Jones, George Baker, and Charlie Hulbert and wife.

Sixth. I hereby constitute and appoint my trusty friend, H. S. Thomas, lawful executor to all intents and purposes to execute this my last will and testament according to the true intent and meaning of the same and part and clause thereof hereby revoking and declaring void all other wills and testaments by me heretofore made.

His honor, being of opinion that the evidence was insufficient to establish a gift to Hattie Houston, instructed the jury to answer the issue of ownership in favor of the plaintiff. From the verdict thus rendered and judgment thereon, the defendant Hattie Houston excepted and appealed.

Gavin & Blanton, of Kenansville, for appellant.

H. D. Williams, of Kenansville, for appellee.

STACY, J. [1] The appellant in her brief takes the position that under the evidence offered, his honor should have submitted to the jury the question as to whether the certificate of deposit would pass to her as a gift causa mortis. We do not think this position tenable. To constitute a "gift causa mortis," not only is an intentional transfer and actual or constructive delivery necessary, but it must be made in view of impending dissolution, or in contemplation of death from a present illness or some immediate peril. 12 R. C. L. 962; Patterson v. Trust Co., 157 N. C. 13, 72 S. E. 629; Newman v. Bost, 122 N. C. 524, 29 S. E. 848; and Wilson v. Featherstone, 122 N. C. 750, 30 S. E. 325. As very tersely and succinctly stated in McCord v. McCord, 77 Mo. 166, 46 Am. Rep. 9:

"To constitute such a gift, it must be made in the last illness of the donor or in contemplation and expectation of death. There must be a delivery of the subject by the donor, and it is 'defeasible by reclamation, the contingency of survivorship, or deliverance from peril.' 2 Kent, Com. 444. * * * It must be a delivery as a gift, and such a delivery, as in case of a gift inter vivos would invest the donee with the title to the subject of the gift."

[2, 3] In the instant case, there is no evidence of any intentional gift accompanied by an actual or constructive delivery during the last illness of the deceased. He was up and about his business at the time the money was placed in bank; and there is no evidence that anything transpired between him and his wife, with respect to this certificate of deposit, subsequent to the date of its issuance, which would amount to a valid transfer. It does not appear that any delivery was ever made to the appellant. It is true the certificate was placed in her trunk where her husband kept his deeds and other valuable papers, but there is no evidence of any intention to thus deliver it to her. Under the circumstances, it is not even clear that it was in her possession. Even if it were, delivery and possession are two different things. "Possession" may be had where no delivery has been made; but there can be no valid "delivery" unless possession, actual or constructive, accompanies it. Whalen v. Milholland, 89 Md. 199, 43 Atl. 45, 44 L. R. A. 208.

Around every other disposition of the property of the dead the Legislature has thrown safeguards, and wisely so. Around this mode (donatio mortis causa) the requirement of actual or constructive delivery is the only substantial protection which the law affords, and the courts should not weaken this salutary requirement and wise precaution by permitting the substitution of convenient and easily proven devices. Keepers v. Fidelity Co., 56 N. J. Law, 302, 28 Atl. 585, 23 L. R. A. 184, 44 Am. St. Rep. 397.

[4, 5] On the other hand, we do not think the evidence sufficient to warrant a finding of a gift inter vivos. Not only must there be a donative intent, but delivery is an indispensable requisite to such a gift under our law. Gross v. Smith, 132 N. C. 604, 44 S. E. 111. It cannot be made to take effect in the future. Minor v. Rogers, 40 Conn. 512, 16 Am. Rep. 69; Askew v. Matthews, 175 N. C. 187, 95 S. E. 163. This would amount only to a promise or an agreement to make a gift. Spencer v. Vance, 57 Mo. 429.

"To constitute a valid gift inter vivos, there must be an intention to give and a delivery to the donee, or to some one for him, of the property given. An intention of the donor to give is not alone sufficient. The intention must be executed by a complete and unconditional delivery. Neither will a delivery be sufficient, unless made with an intention to give. The transaction must show a completely executed transfer to the donee of the present right of property and the possession. The donee must become the owner of the property given." Harris Banking Co. v. Miller, 190 Mo. 640, 89 S. W. 629, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 790.

It has been held that a deposit under an agreement which preserves to the depositor the right to deal with the deposit for his own benefit, but which provides that upon his death any balance standing to his credit shall be paid to the donee, though accompanied by a delivery of the deposit book to the donee, does not constitute a valid gift inter vivos. Stevenson v. Earl, 65 N. J. Eq. 721, 55 Atl. 1091, 103 Am. St. Rep. 790, 1 Ann. Cas. 49. A gift is incomplete if the donor "retains the dominion, if there remains to him a locus penitentiae, * * * there cannot be a perfect and legal donation." Murray v. Cannon, 41 Md. 466. See also Schippers v. Kempkes, (N. J. Err. & App.) 67 Atl. 74, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.), 355 and note.

[7] Upon the record, there is no evidence tending to show any surrender, during the lifetime of the deceased, of his dominion or control over the deposit in question. Without such surrender and actual or constructive delivery to the donee, a parol gift, in law, is but a promise to give, which, being without consideration, is not obligatory. Picot v. Sanderson, 12 N. C. 309. "A transfer of the property is required, and 'an intention to give is not a gift.'" Adams v. Hayes, 24 N. C. 361.

Furthermore, there is no evidence to support the conclusion that the deceased, during his lifetime, had promised his wife that she might have the money which he had placed in bank. The only competent testimony tending to show what disposition R. C. Houston wished to make of this particular deposit, in the event he died leaving it in the bank, comes from the cashier of the bank of Beula-ville, and the record is silent as to whether such desire was ever communicated to appellant during the lifetime of her husband. Hence there is not sufficient evidence to show an intention to make the gift and a delivery of the thing given. Without both of these prerequisites, there can be no gift inter vivos or causa mortis. Newman v. Bost, supra; Medlock v. Powell, 96 N. C. 499, 2 S. E. 149.

[8, 9] There are some decisions in our own reports and elsewhere to the effect that a certificate of deposit or money in bank will pass by will under the designation of "money on hand," where it clearly appears that such was the intention of the testator; but in the instant case, a contrary purpose is quite apparent. All the facts and circumstances lead to a different conclusion. The testimony of the witness Potter that the testator had told him, prior to the execution of his will, what he wanted done with the money in bank, was incompetent and should have been excluded. Wills are made by testators, not by witnesses.

From the foregoing, it follows that his honor was correct in charging the jury to answer the issue, with respect to the ownership of the certificate of deposit, in favor of the executor.

After a careful examination of the entire record and the defendants' exceptions and assignments of error, we think the ruling as indicated should be sustained.

No error.

SMITH et al. v. BANKHEAD. (No. 10587.)

1. Partition §109(1)—Purchaser acquires unsevered crops, though due as rent before sale.

Where land was sold in a partition suit without any reservation, and the deed conveyed "all and singular the rights, * * * rents, issues, and profits," crops still attached to the freehold when the sale was made and when the purchasers complied with their bid passed to the purchasers, though the land was rented, and the rent was payable in cotton and corn, and was due before the sale.

2. Partition §109(1)—Failure of purchasers to exhibit deed held not to affect right to crops.

Where a tenant of land sold at partition sale had attorned to the purchasers, at the request of the agent of the former owners, and the purchasers were in possession when such agent attempted to gather crops due as rent, the failure of the purchasers to exhibit their deed did not defeat their action to recover possession of the crops.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court, of York County; Thos. S. Sease, Judge.

Action by J. D. Smith and another against J. H. Bankhead, Agent. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

W. W. Lewis and John A. Marion, both of York, for appellants.

J. S. Brice and John R. Hart, both of York, for respondent.

FRASER, J. The defendant, J. H. Bankhead, was entitled to an undivided interest in the land described in the complaint and other lands. The defendant acted as agent for his cotenants and rented this tract to Ed. Good, a negro. An action for partition was brought, to which the defendant was a party, and this tract was sold under an order of the court, and was bought by the plaintiffs herein at that sale. At the request of Mr. Bankhead, the plaintiffs re-rented the land for the following year to Ed. Good, on the day following the sale. The sale was made on the 4th of November. The plaintiffs paid the money on the 9th of November, took their deed, and filed it for record on that day. The report of sale was confirmed on the 25th day of November. On the 19th of November, 10 days after the deed was delivered, Mr. Bankhead undertook to gather the crop, and the plaintiffs brought this action for the possession of the crops so gathered. The case was referred to a special referee, who found that the rent was due before the sale, and the defendant was entitled to the crop. The circuit judge affirmed this finding.

The rent was payable in cotton and corn. The record does not show that there was any reservation of anything in the order of sale, in the deed, or by notice at the sale. Much has been said in argument about the time at which the rent was due and the failure of the plaintiffs to exhibit the deed to the land, and they were treated as crucial points in the case.

[1] I. It makes no difference when the rent was due. The crops in dispute were still attached to the freehold when the sale was made and when the plaintiffs complied with their bid. The sale of the land carried with it all that was attached to the land, houses, fences, trees, cotton stalks, with their unpicked cotton, and corn stalks and unsevered corn. So far as the parties to that action were concerned, all were included in the sale. The deed that has been confirmed contains the following:

"Together with all and singular the rights, members, hereditaments, and appurtenances whatsoever to the said premises belonging, or in any wise appertaining, and the reversions and remainders, rents, issues, and profits thereof, and also all the estate, right, title, and interest, dower, possession, property, benefit, claim, and demand whatsoever, both at law and in equity of the said plaintiffs and defendants, and all of the parties to the said suit, and of all other persons rightfully claiming or to claim the same, or any part thereof, by, from, or under them, or either of them."

It thus appears that the rents were expressly conveyed. The defendant was a party to the case under which the sale was made.

[2] II. The failure of the plaintiffs to exhibit their deed is equally ineffective. If there had been a dispute about the possession, then the failure of the plaintiff to produce the evidence of their title might have been a factor in the case. There was no such issue here. The tenant of the defendant had already, at the request of the defendant, attorned to the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs were already in possession. The defendant is estopped from claiming any interest in the land or rents.

The judgment is reversed.

BELLINGER, Probate Judge, v. UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO.
(No. 10,586.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 16, 1921.)

1. Insane persons \S 45—Surety on committee's bond not discharged by failure to require accountings.

The surety on the bond of the committee of a lunatic, conditioned that the committee shall faithfully execute his duties and yearly account to the judge of probate, is not released by the failure of the probate judge to require annual returns by the committee, as it was the duty of the surety to see that this duty of the committee was performed.

2. Insane persons \S 45—Allegation of surety that it was not bound by decree properly stricken, if bound prima facie.

In an action on the bond of the committee of a lunatic, an allegation of the surety that it was not bound by a judgment against the committee was properly stricken, if it was bound either conclusively or prima facie.

3. Insane persons \S 45—Decree against committee only prima facie binding on surety.

A decree of the probate court, finding the amount due from the committee of a lunatic, on an accounting by him to which his surety is not a party, is only prima facie binding on the surety.

4. Insane persons \S 45—Surety's answer, not stating grounds of attack on settlement, properly stricken.

The surety on the bond of a lunatic's committee has only a limited right to impeach the final decree settling the accounts of the committee, and hence, in an action on the bond, an allegation of the surety that it was not bound by the decree, without stating the grounds of its attack on the decree, was properly stricken.

5. Insane persons \S 45—Children of lunatic are strangers to estate.

Children of a lunatic petitioning for their substitution as sureties for the committee in order to save premiums were strangers to the estate, and might have been treated by the probate judge as intermeddlers.

6. Insane persons \S 45—Probate court cannot release committee's surety on execution of substituted bond.

The probate court has no power, either under its general power of control over the estates of lunatics or under Civ. Code 1912, § 3613, authorizing such court, on the application of sureties on administration and guardianship bonds, to make such order or decree for the relief of the surety as may not impair or affect the right of the parties interested, to discharge the surety of a lunatic's committee upon the execution of a substituted bond.

7. Constitutional law \S 70(3)—Propriety of law discriminating between sureties of different classes held a question for the Legislature.

Whether the probate court should be authorized to discharge sureties on administration and guardianship bonds, and not sureties on other bonds, is a question for the Legislature, and not a judicial question.

8. Appeal and error \S 248, 839(1)—Questions not passed on below or covered by exceptions not considered.

Questions, argued but not passed on by the circuit judge, or covered by exceptions, will not be considered on appeal.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Edward McIver, Judge.

Action by G. Duncan Bellinger, as Judge of Probate, against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Robert Moorman, of Columbia, for appellant.

Tompkins, Barnett & McDonald, of Columbia, for respondent.

COTHRAN, J. Action against the defendant as surety upon the bond of Walter J. Simons, committee of R. J. Palmer, a lunatic. The trial was before Hon. Edward McIver, presiding judge at spring term, 1920, without a jury, upon the pleadings and an agreed statement of facts. He rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $1,105.18 May 27, 1920, from which the defendant appeals.

In 1908 R. J. Palmer was adjudged a lunatic. Walter J. Simons was appointed his committee, and on February 4, 1908, qualified by furnishing a bond to the probate judge in the sum of $5,000, conditioned in the usual form, with the defendant as surety. The committee took charge of the estate, and administered it until March 11, 1913, at which time an order was passed by the probate court, discharging R. J. Palmer from the custody of the court, and requiring the committee to make a final accounting. This accounting was had, and resulted in a judgment by the probate court in favor of R. J. Palmer against Walter J. Simons, the committee, for $759.61, dated January 18, 1915. The surety company was not a party to this proceeding.

Prior to this time, that is, on February 2, 1910, while the lunatic was confined in the state hospital, three of his children petitioned the probate court to allow them to be substituted as sureties on the bond in the place of the defendant surety company, that the annual premium of $25 paid to the surety company might be saved to the estate. On February 10, 1910, the probate judge signed an order to that effect, and that upon the execution of a new bond signed by said petitioners the defendant "be released and discharged from any and all further liability under the bond heretofore filed in this action." The proposed bond was duly executed.

During the entire period of his incumbency the committee made no returns of the estate transactions until April 22, 1913, after the legal status of the lunatic had been restored, or purported to be, and then only an unitemized return for the five years. This return was objected to by Palmer, and on September 22, 1913, the committee filed what appears to have been duly itemized returns for five years. Upon rendition of the judgment for $759.61 on January 18, 1915, execution was issued against Walter J. Simons, the committee, which was returned nulla bona, and this action followed on May 17, 1918. The circuit judge charged the defendant with the amount of the probate court decree of January 18, 1915, plus interest and costs, amounting to $1,230.18, less five-year bond premiums, $125, and rendered judgment for $1,105.18.

The questions that arise in this appeal are as follows:

(1) Does the failure of the probate judge to require annual returns by the committee of a lunatic to secure the faithful performance of whose duties the bond was given to the probate judge discharge the surety?

(2) Is the surety upon the bond of a committee of a lunatic bound by the decree of the probate court ascertaining the amount due by the committee in a proceeding to which the surety was not a party?

(3) Is an order of the probate judge, purporting to discharge the surety of the committee of a lunatic, upon the execution of a substituted bond, effective for that purpose?

The two questions first stated above were raised in paragraphs 4 and 5 of the defendant's answer, but on motion before Judge Moore, prior to the trial before Judge McIver (upon a date not appearing in the "case") these paragraphs were stricken from the answer. Question No. 3 was decided by Judge McIver against the defendant.

[1] The First Question. The condition of the bond was that—

The committee "shall and do well and faithfully execute the duties of committee and also yearly and every year account to the said judge of probate * * * for all such sum or sums of money * * * which he * * * may have received * * * and in other respects behave and demean himself honestly and faithfully touching said committee'ship."

One of the duties imposed upon the committee by law, and specifically undertaken by him in the bond, was to make annual returns. The surety was bound to see that this duty was performed; he so undertook. It would be an anomalous conclusion to release the surety from his entire obligation upon the ground that the principal had not forced the obligor to perform a specifically assumed duty for which the surety was equally bound. For his own protection it was the duty of the surety to see that this duty was performed; the court was open to him for that purpose; it does not lie in his mouth to say that he should be discharged because the probate judge did not compel the performance of a duty which he himself had neglected to compel.

The Second Question. The probate judge by regular proceeding called the committee to account, took testimony, examined the itemized returns and vouchers, and arrived at the judicial conclusion that the committee was indebted to the estate in the sum of $759.61. Judgment was accordingly rendered. The surety was not a party to that proceeding and now claims that it is not bound by the adjudication and claims the right to a readjustment of the committee's accounting.

[2] It will be noted that the defendant does not attempt to assail the probate decree for want of jurisdiction, fraud, or collusion; nor does it attempt to surcharge or falsify the accounting. The allegation simply is that "it is not bound" by the decree. This is the allegation stricken out by Judge Moore's order. If the defendant is bound either conclusively or prima facie, it is clear that it can take nothing by this appeal. Judge Moore's order is not set out in the record for appeal, and we have no means of knowing whether he ruled that the surety was bound conclusively or prima facie. It matters not which, for, if it was bound in either way, the defendant's allegation that it was "not bound" cannot be sustained.

[3] It appears to the writer, and expressing his individual views of the matter, that the logical conclusion should be that the surety upon a committee's bond, in an action at law upon the bond, is concluded by the decree of the probate court, duly rendered upon a final settlement and accounting by his principal, as to the amount of the principal's liability, notwithstanding the fact that the surety was not a party to the accounting; that such a decree is a final judgment which may be enrolled in the clerk's office and upon which execution may issue; that such record establishes the committee's failure to respond to the judgment. A breach of his bond is conclusively shown. Certainly he is concluded and the surety is bound to the full extent to which his principal is bound. He cannot attack collaterally a decree made against the committee for whose fidelity to his trust he has bound himself. Stovall v. Banks, 10 Wall. 583, 19 L. Ed. 1036. See Rose's Notes, 170, where numerous authorities are cited.

The remedy of the surety should be an appeal from the decree or a direct attack upon it in the probate court, unless want of jurisdiction appears upon the face of the record.

But whether or not it is due to the difference in the legal effect of a decree of the present probate court and that of the old court of ordinary (compare Ordinary v.

Mortimer, 7 Rich. 176, with sections 73, 74, 75, Code of Civil Procedure), it is settled by a practically unbroken line of cases in this state that such a decree is only prima facie binding upon the surety. Cureton v. Shelton, 3 McCord, 413; Joyner v. Cooper, 2 Bailey, 199; Ordinary of Charleston District v. Condy, 2 Hill, 813; Ordinary v. Carlile, McMul. 100; Norton v. Wallace, 1 Rich. 507; Davant v. Webb, 2 Rich. 379; Norton v. Wallace, 2 Rich. 460; Taylor v. Taylor, 2 Rich. Eq. 123; Stewart v. McCully, 5 Rich. 80; State v. Cason, 11 S. C. 392; Crane v. Moses, 13 S. C. 561; Fellers v. Davis, 22 S. C. 425; Kennedy v. Adickes, 37 S. C. 176, 15 S. E. 922.

[4] Even in these cases the right of the surety to impeach the final decree of settlement is limited, as will appear upon the examination, to certain objections which must be set forth in the pleading of the surety, "in an action on a guardianship or administration bond against a surety, errors in the decree against the principal, unless set out by the surety in his pleadings, cannot be proved." Davant v. Webb, 2 Rich. 379; Norton v. Wallace, 1 Rich. 507.

The appellant's attorney admits in his printed argument that the probate court decree was at least prima facie evidence against the defendant. This admission, coupled with the failure to set forth in his pleadings the grounds of the attack upon the decree of which he assumes that the defendant was deprived by the order of Judge Moore, renders untenable the position that the defendant was not bound by the decree; he was bound presumptively, until he pleaded and established grounds of attack made legitimate under the foregoing authorities. Judge Moore's order may be sustained upon either ground; that the decree was prima facie binding upon the surety, or that the specific grounds of attack were not pleaded.

The Third Question. The circuit judge and the respondent take the position that the surety's relief is determined by the provisions of section 3613, 1 Code of Laws, and that, the course therein prescribed not having been pursued, the order is a nullity. The appellant's position is that the probate court, under the general powers of control over the estate of lunatics, was authorized to sign the order. We do not think that either position can be sustained.

[5] The position for the substitution of the three adult children of the lunatic as sureties upon the bond of the committee in the stead of the guaranty company was filed in the name of those children. They could not, except in a prospective sense, have had the slightest legal interest in the lunatic's estate. They were strangers to the estate, as much so as if they had not been related to him, and may well have been considered by the probate judge as intermeddlers. But in view of the complacency and evident approval of the guaranty company in relation to the substitution, and its reliance in this proceeding upon the order as a release of it from all liability, we may assume that it was taken with the knowledge and consent of the guaranty company, and will treat the matter as if the order had been taken upon the petition of the surety.

"The motion need not be made by the surety; it is sufficient if made with his knowledge, and consent by the guardian." Black v. Merritt, 13 Ky. Law Rep. 367.

[6] The statute (section 3613) does not provide the machinery for the discharge of a surety; it authorizes, after examination, the making of "such order or decree, for the relief of the petitioner, as may not impair or affect the rights of the parties interested in the estate."

The obligation of the principal, for which the surety stands bound, begins before he receives a dollar of the estate, for it is his duty to collect the assets; it continues through his administration of his office, and ends only after he shall have made a full and honest accounting and distributed the net assets to those entitled to them. It is to the interest of the beneficiaries of the estate that these obligations be fulfilled, obligations of the principal and of the surety. Any action therefore which touches these obligations necessarily "impairs," certainly "affects," that interest.

The statute is one of exceptional privilege extended to sureties upon administration bonds and (by reference, section 3764) to sureties upon guardianship bonds. All that the surety has to do is to file his petition, alleging that he conceives himself to be in danger of being injured by his suretyship, and to claim the privilege guaranteed to him as a right by this statute, whereupon it is made the duty of the probate judge to make a decree for his relief, limited only by the condition that the rights of the parties interested in the estate may not be impaired or affected; the surety's apprehension of injury, not the fact of danger, is made the test. McKay v. Donald, 8 Rich. 331.

This court, upon review of many conflicting decisions and dicta, has settled upon a construction of this statute in the case of Hall v. Hall, 45 S. C. at page 178, 22 S. E. at page 822, as follows:

"First. When the surety on a guardian's bond files a petition to be discharged from liability, and the court grants an order for such discharge, and a new bond is executed, but no new letters of guardianship are issued, the surety is liable for all the property of the ward in the hands of the guardian at the time of the discharge. 2d. Such surety * * * is not liable for the property of the ward that may come into the hands of the guardian after the surety has been discharged."

This construction adds another feature of exceptional privilege to these classes of sureties; it relieves the surety from a substantial portion of the obligation which he assumed when he signed the bond, which was intended to secure the continuing obligation of the principal until his final and legal release. And however much the writer of this opinion may approve of the reasoning and conclusion of Chancellor Harper in the case of Field v. Pelot, McMul. Eq. 369, that there can be no discharge from future liabilities of the principal except by revocation of his authority, and that both sets of sureties are liable for all defalcations of the principal, both before and after discharge, the substituted sureties being primarily liable, the authority of Hall v. Hall, should not now be questioned; it certainly should not, however, be extended to sureties of other classes to whom this exceptional privilege has not been accorded by statute.

We apprehend that the court of equity with its ample powers could not grant to a surety the relief which this statute accords to him; certainly a court of limited power could not, independently of the statute. He, therefore, who claims the benefit of a statute of exceptional privilege, must bring himself within the terms of that statute. We have been pointed to no statute, and have found none which accords to the sureties upon any other class of bonds than administration and guardianship bonds and the privilege of section 3613.

[7] It may be difficult to explain why this exceptional privilege should be accorded to certain classes of sureties and not to others, practically of the same fiduciary character; there appears no reason for the distinction. That is a matter, however, that may appeal to the legislative sense of justice; it is not a judicial question.

We lay little stress upon the suggestion that the petition was filed, not by the surety, but by the children of the lunatic. If the surety had had the right to file the petition, and it was filed by others, though the application was made upon a different ground from that prescribed in the statute, we apprehend that the surety would not be deprived of the status established by a proceeding which it has evidently ratified and the benefit of which it claims in this proceeding.

It may be remarked that the order purports to discharge the surety from all liability, past as well as future. The utmost that could be claimed under this special statute would be a release from the future defalcations of the principal. For the reasons stated we conclude that the order of the probate court, purporting to discharge the surety, was a nullity.

The relative rights and liabilities of the defendant and the signers of the substituted bond have not been considered.

[8] The appellant has raised several questions in the printed argument which have not been considered for the reason that they are not properly before us, not having been passed upon by the circuit judge or covered by exceptions.

The respondent has pressed with great force the objection that the exceptions do not conform to the rules of this court, in that they fail to point out specific errors. We have not sustained the objection from an anxiety to decide these very interesting questions upon their merits.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

WATTS, J., concurs in the result.

JUMPER v. QUEEN MAB LUMBER CO.
(No. 10582.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 12, 1921.)

1. Reformation of Instruments §20—Fraud or concealment unnecessary if mistake is mutual.

Equity can reform a contract for mutual mistake of the parties in reference to the facts upon which it is based or in the omission or insertion of some material stipulation in the written contract, even when there is no element of misrepresentations or concealment, though, if the mistake was unilateral, it must have been induced by misrepresentation, concealment, or imposition.

2. Appeal and error §901, 1009(4)—Findings in equity sustained unless appellant shows them contrary to evidence.

The findings of fact by the circuit judge on an equitable issue will be sustained, unless the appellant shows that they are against the preponderance of the evidence; the burden of such showing being on him.

3. Reformation of Instruments §45(6)—Evidence held to show mutual mistake as to terms of contract signed.

Evidence that the vendor owned only the timber rights in a certain tract, which the purchaser knew, held to sustain the trial judge's finding of mutual mistake in a contract for the conveyance of the title to the tract which was prepared with another contract for the sale of a tract the title to which the vendor owned.

4. Logs and logging §2—Vendor and purchaser §31—Mutual mistake without fraud not ground for rescission.

A mutual mistake, whereby the written contract provided for conveyance of the title to a tract of land, instead of the conveyance of merely the timber rights therein as agreed upon by the parties, does not entitle the vendor to rescind the contract, though it does entitle him to have it reformed to conform to the oral agreement.

5. Reformation of Instruments ¶16—Correction of written agreement to correspond with understanding not relief against mutual mistake.

The relief granted by equity in reformatting a written contract to conform to the actual agreement of the parties is not, strictly speaking, relief on the ground of mutual mistake, but is a distinct branch of equity jurisprudence.

6. Reformation of Instruments ¶25—Negotiation does not defeat right to have written agreement conform to understanding.

The right of a party to a written contract to have it reformed so as to conform to the real agreement of the parties is not defeated by his negligence, in failing to discover the discord between the written contract and the agreement, since the other party was equally negligent, or, if he discovered the discord and kept silent to reap the benefit thereof, is without standing in equity.

7. Appeal and Error ¶1073(1)—Consent order as to fund held to entitle defendant to affirmance of decree rescinding instead of reforming contract.

In an action for breach of a contract for the sale of land where defendant established his right to reform the contract to provide only for sale of the timber, but the court erroneously decreed a rescission of the contract, and it appeared that the timber rights had been sold under a consent order and the proceeds deposited to await the outcome of the suit, so that defendant was entitled to the fund which represented the subject-matter of the controversy, whether the contract was reformed and specifically enforced or was rescinded, the decree awarding the fund to him will be affirmed, regardless of error as to rescission.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Georgetown County; T. J. Mauldin, Judge.

Action by W. J. Jumper against the Queen Mab Lumber Company. From a decree for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The decree of the circuit judge was as follows:

This case was instituted in the court of common pleas for Aiken county, but, on motion, Hon. H. F. Rice, by order dated August 19, 1919, charged the venue to Georgetown county, and the entire record therein was transferred to that county.

The complaint alleged that the defendant, on October 17, 1917, agreed to sell in fee, for $5,000, to the plaintiff, a tract of land in Aiken county, containing 498.8 acres; that the contract was broken by the defendant; and that the plaintiff was entitled to the sum of $4,900 the difference in the alleged value of the land and the contract price. The defendant answered, admitting the formal execution of the alleged contract, but alleging that the same was executed in error and mistake, both parties intending to contract only as to certain timber and timber rights on said land, this being the true agreement, and both parties well knowing that the defendant did not own the fee; that if the contract be reformed so as to express the true intention of the parties, and so as to cover the timber and timber rights owned by the defendant on the said tract of land, that it was ready and willing to carry out the same on its part. There were other defenses, but the conclusion I have reached renders a consideration of them unnecessary.

A consent order was passed by me at the November, 1919, term of court for Georgetown county, whereby a jury trial was waived, the cause transferred to Calendar No. 2, and referred to Arthur R. Young, Esq., of Charleston, S. C., as special referee, to take testimony on all issues, legal and equitable, arising therein; and to report the testimony so taken to me as presiding judge, and that if said report should not be filed in time for a hearing at said term the cause should be marked "Heard" and argument should take place at such time and place as might be subsequently agreed on. This order further provided that by reason of the short period of time remaining under the timber deed within which to cut and remove the timber that the said timber be sold at such price as might be agreed on by counsel, or fixed as reasonable by the court, and the proceeds deposited at interest to await the final determination of the court and its further orders—said sale to be without prejudice to the rights of either party to the cause, the proceeds of sale standing in lieu and stead of the timber and timber rights aforesaid.

Subsequently, on petition of the defendant, I passed an order, dated April 17, 1920, authorizing the defendant to accept an offer of $5,000 cash, made by Farr-Barnes Lumber Company to it, and to convey the said timber and timber rights to the said Farr-Barnes Lumber Company and deposit the proceeds of sale at interest according to the provisions of said order, in the event that the plaintiff did not, within 10 days from the service of a copy of said order on his attorney, avail himself of certain options which I allowed him and which are fully set forth in said order.

The defendant subsequently reported that a copy of the said order was duly served on the attorney for the plaintiff, that the options therein contained were not exercised by the plaintiff, and that pursuant to the requirements of the said order it conveyed the said timber and timber rights to the said Farr-Barnes Lumber Company and deposited the purchase price of $5,000 in the savings department of the Bank of Summerville, at interest, to the credit of this case, and subject to, and to await the final determination of, the court and its further orders in this cause.

The report of the special referee not coming in before the adjournment of the court, as aforesaid, the case was marked "Heard." The special referee took all testimony offered on behalf of both parties, reported the same to me, and the cause has been fully argued before me.

I have carefully considered the testimony and the authorities bearing on the questions involved. The testimony clearly and fully shows, and so as to leave no doubt in my mind, that the alleged contract involved in this case was executed in mutual mistake, neither party intending that it should cover the fee, and that their minds have never met on such a proposition; but, on the contrary, that the parties intended only to contract as to the timber and timber rights on the said tract of land. The alleged contract should, therefore, be rescinded and set aside and the parties left in the same status they were in before the execution of the same.

The defendant, however, offers to perform the contract, if it be reformed so as to cover the timber and timber rights only. While I am satisfied of my power to rescind the alleged contract for the reasons given, I am not so sure that the cases would support me in reforming the contract, and in requiring the plaintiff to perform the same as so reformed, nor if I had the power would I care to so exercise it in this case.

The $50 paid to the defendant by the plaintiff when the alleged contract was executed should be returned by the defendant to the plaintiff, but as it has been fully established that the plaintiff prosecuted this case well knowing that the contract he relied on was not enforceable, he should be charged with the costs.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that within 20 days from the date of this order, the defendant do pay to the plaintiff the sum of $50.

It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the Bank of Summerville, upon presentation to it of a certified copy of this order, do pay over to the defendant, Queen Mab Lumber Company, the fund of $5,000, with any interest earned thereon, now held on deposit by it to the credit of this cause.

It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiff do pay the costs and disbursements (i. e., costs paid) of this case.

T. J. Mauldin, Circuit Judge.

John F. Williams, of Alken, for appellant.
Legare Walker, of Summerville, for respondent.

COTHRAN, J. Action at law for $4,960 damages on account of alleged breach by defendant of a written contract for the sale of land, dated October 17, 1917. The defendant admits the execution of the contract, but alleges that it owned only the timber rights on the land; that prior to the formal execution of the contract, which was but the written evidence of their agreement, the plaintiff and the defendant had agreed upon a purchase and sale of the timber rights on the land at $5,000, the plaintiff being aware of the fact that the title to the land was in another; but that owing to the fact that at the same time another transaction between the parties involved a contract for the conveyance of the title to another tract, and the attorney who drew both sets of papers, not being fully advised by the parties, drew the contract in question in like form, the defendant alleges mutual mistake and asks for a reformation of the contract, and that when so reformed the plaintiff be required to comply.

The case was referred to a special referee simply to take the testimony and report same, and upon the testimony so reported, was tried before Judge Mauldin, a jury trial having been duly waived.

The circuit judge filed a decree which will be reported, finding that "the alleged contract involved in this case was executed in mutual mistake, neither party intending that it should cover the fee, and that their minds have never met on such a proposition; but, on the contrary, that the parties intended only to contract as to the timber and timber rights on the said tract of land," and ordered the contract to be rescinded and the parties restored to their status quo.

The plaintiff appeals and relies upon these propositions:

(1) That there can be no relief from a mutual mistake in the absence of misrepresentation or concealment of fact.

(2) That there is no testimony to sustain the finding of fact of mutual mistake, for two reasons: (a) The burden was upon the defendant to maintain such plea, and the overwhelming weight of the evidence is opposed to such finding; (b) there was no sufficient evidence to show misrepresentation or concealment upon the plaintiff's part.

(3) That rescission of a contract should not be decreed in the absence of misrepresentation or concealment, where it appears that it was entered into by competent parties, at arm's length, when they read or should have read the same.

[1] 1. The appellant's position that there can be no relief from a mutual mistake, unless there enter into the mistake an element of misrepresentation or concealment, cannot be sustained for this reason: A contract may be reformed or rescinded, as the justice of the case may require, upon the ground of mistake, under these circumstances: (1) Where the mistake is mutual and is in reference to the facts, or supposed facts, upon which the contract is based; (2) where the mistake is mutual and consists in the omission or insertion of some material element affecting the subject-matter or the terms and stipulations of the contract, inconsistent with those of the prior agreement which necessarily preceded it; (3) where the mistake is not mutual, but unilateral, and has been induced by the fraud, deceit, misrepresentation, concealment, or imposition in any form of the party opposed in interest to the reformation or rescission, without negligence on the part of the party claiming the right; (4) where the mistake is not mutual, but unilateral, and is accompanied by very strong and extraordinary circumstances, showing imbecility or something which would make it a great wrong to enforce the agreement, sustained by competent testimony of the clearest kind. Kennerly v. Etiwan Co., 21 S. C. 226, 53 Am. Rep. 669; Forrester v. Moon, 100 S. C. 157, 84 S. E. 532.

It thus appears that both the first and second conditions, instances of mutual mistake, are independent of the elements of misrepresentation and concealment.

[2, 3] 2. The appellant's contentions that there is no testimony to sustain the finding of fact by the circuit judge of a mutual mistake, and that the overwhelming weight of the testimony is against such finding, cannot be sustained. The demand of the defendant for affirmative relief, in the reformation of the contract, presents an equitable issue. The findings of facts by the circuit judge will be sustained unless the appellant may show that they are against the preponderance of the evidence, the burden of which is upon him. He has not only failed to sustain this burden, but, after careful review of the testimony, we are entirely satisfied with the conclusions of the circuit judge. The defendant owned only the timber rights on the land, and we begin with the natural assumption that they would not intend to sell something they did not own. We are satisfied from the evidence that, when the defendant bought the timber rights in 1906, the plaintiff was informed of the limitations of their holding; that in 1916 conditions had not changed; that in March, 1917, the plaintiff and Farr, president of the defendant company, were in negotiation about the timber on both this tract and another, no reference being made to the fee-simple title to the land; that in May, 1917, Farr wrote to the plaintiff to know whether or not the deal was off "for the purchase of the Peeples and Courtney tracts of timber," about which they had been negotiating in March, the Courtney tract being the one now in question; that in July, 1917, the plaintiff was at Farr's office in Columbia and opened negotiations for the purchase of the Mears tract which the defendant owned in fee; he admits that Farr proposed that if he would buy the Courtney timber at $5,000 he would sell him the Mears tract for $35,000; that in October, 1917, they again met in Columbia to close both deals, for the Mears tract in fee, and for the timber rights in the Courtney tract, the plaintiff yielding commissions of 10 per cent. on the Courtney deal in order to secure the Mears tract.

We are satisfied that neither party had any other thought than that, so far as the Courtney tract was concerned, the one was selling and the other buying only what the plaintiff knew the defendant possessed, the timber rights. After they met in Farr's office in Columbia and agreed upon both deals, an attorney was called in to prepare the contracts. The papers relating to the Mears deal were given to the attorney and the plat of the Courtney land. From a lack of information which should have been communicated to the attorney by either the plaintiff or Farr or both, or from a misunderstanding of directions, the attorney prepared the two contracts as if a sale of both tracts of land, and not the Mears tract and the timber rights of the Courtney tract, was intended. The contracts in that form were signed up, apparently not having been read over by either party. The $50 cash payment was made by the plaintiff, and each party received a copy of the contract. The remainder of the purchase price of the Courtney deal, $4,950, was due November 17th. On the 12th, the defendant drew upon the plaintiff for this amount, payable on the 17th, attached a deed conveying the timber rights, and forwarded it through the banks for collection. Upon notification the plaintiff stated that he had given a third party an option upon the deal and the draft should have been drawn upon him. He does not appear to have called for an inspection of the deed, although he had had the contract in his possession for a month. Prior to that time Farr had discovered the mistake and called the plaintiff's attention to it; the plaintiff stating to him that he understood what he was buying, that is, only the timber rights, that he knew a mistake had been made, and that there would be no trouble. The plaintiff denies this statement, but it is corroborated by Mrs. Fairry, a stenographer for Farr at the time, and we are satisfied of its truth.

[4] 3. The appellant further contends that the circuit judge erred in decreeing a rescission of the contract, not upon the ground that there was no evidence of a mutual mistake, but no evidence of misrepresentation or concealment, and in this we think he is correct. The circuit court has misconceived the legal result of his findings of fact. He does not find that there was any fraud, misrepresentation, concealment, imposition, or other conduct on the part of the plaintiff which are the usual grounds for rescinding a contract. While we apprehend that such an instance of mutual mistake might be established as would avoid the contract ab initio, as when it related to the facts or supposed facts upon which it was based, and thus justify a decree of rescission, we do not think that the mutual mistake established in this case is of such character. The theory of the defendant, supported as we think by the evidence, is that there was a valid contract between them and the plaintiff for the sale and purchase of the timber rights, but that the written contract, the evidence of their agreement, does not express the terms of that agreement, but by mistake contains terms contrary to the common intention of the parties; that for that reason they are entitled to have the contract accordingly reformed, and to have it specifically enforced when thus reformed. The circuit judge was in error in decreeing a rescission of the contract as the following authorities show:

"To entitle the plaintiff to a reformation of the contract, he must prove that it was the intention of both parties to make a contract such as he sought to have established, and that this intention was frustrated, either from some fraud, accident, or mutual mistake of the parties." Jackson v. Andrews, 59 N. Y. 244; Kilmer v. Smith, 77 N. Y. 226, 33 Am. Rep. 618.

"Where an instrument is drawn and executed which professes or is intended to carry a prior agreement into execution, whether in writing or by parol, which by mistake violates or fails to fulfill the manifest intention of the parties, equity, if the proof is clear, will correct the mistakes, so as to produce a conformity of the written instrument to the antecedent agreement of the parties." Ivinson v. Hutton, 98 U. S. 79, 25 L. Ed. 68.

"The reformation of written contracts for fraud or mistake is an ordinary head of equity jurisdiction. * * * Where the agreement as reduced to writing omits or contains terms or stipulations contrary to the common intention of the parties, the instrument will be corrected so as to make it conform to their real intent. The parties will be placed as they would have stood if the mistake had not occurred." Moffett v. Rochester, 178 U. S. 373, 20 Sup. Ct. 957, 44 L. Ed. 1108.

"The courts will interfere where * * * the minds of the parties, * * * in the case of a written contract * * * did not meet on the terms expressed in the writing, but did meet on other terms not there appearing." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. (14th Ed.) pp. 161, 204 (notes).

"It follows that the mistake which it (the court of equity) may correct in such writing must be, as it is usually expressed, the mistake of both parties to it; that is, such a mistake in the drafting of the writing as makes it convey the intent or meaning of neither party to the contract." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. (14th Ed.) § 162.

"The phrase 'mutual mistake,' as used in equity, means a mistake common to all the parties to a written contract or instrument, and it usually relates to a mistake concerning the contents or the legal effect of the contract or instrument. A mutual mistake which will afford ground for relief from a contract by reforming it, means a mistake reciprocal and common to both parties when each alike labors under the misconception in respect to the terms of the written instrument." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. (14th Ed.) § 162.

"Where an instrument is drawn and executed which professes or is intended to carry a prior agreement into execution, whether in writing or by parol, which by mistake violates or fails to fulfill the manifest intention of the parties, equity, if the proof is clear, will correct the mistakes, so as to produce a conformity of the written instrument to the agreement of the parties." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. (14th Ed.) § 159.

"If through mistake or accident the instrument has been incorrectly framed, or if the transaction is vitiated by illegality or fraud, or if the instrument was executed in ignorance or mistake of facts material to its operation, the error may be corrected or the erroneous transaction may be rescinded." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. (14th Ed.) § 159.

4. The appellant further contends that rescission of the contract should not have been decreed for the reason that it was entered into by competent parties, at arm's length, and that they read or should have read it before execution. Though scarcely raising the issue of negligence on the part of the defendant, we will consider the exception as fairly raising that issue. We have held above that rescission of the contract should not have been decreed, and will therefore consider this objection as applicable to the defendant's demand for a reformation of the contract.

[5] We are of the opinion that much of the confusion incident to this question would be dissipated, if it should be recognized as a distinct branch of equity jurisprudence to reform a written contract where it unquestionably appears that, contrary to the intention of both parties, it does not express the prior oral agreement of the parties in a material particular, irrespective of the cause of such discord. Where this discord appears, some one has blundered; if the paper was prepared by an attorney or scrivener, he has either not been sufficiently informed of the agreement of the parties by them, or has erroneously interpreted his information and directions; if not sufficiently informed, it was the fault of the parties; if when presented for their signatures they thought or assumed that no discord existed, their signing would be the result of their co-operative fault; if one of them discovered the discord and remained silent, it would be a fraud upon the other not to call attention to it. In any conceivable event, therefore, reformation would be decreed. Why then not recognize it as a distinct branch of equity jurisprudence and be relieved of the reduction of the facts to a case of mutual mistake? Such a reduction is to a large extent a matter of argument, if not fiction. As is said in a note, 1 Story, Eq. Jur. (14th Ed.) at pages 162, 205, speaking of mutual mistake in connection with this ground for reformation:

It is "not a perfectly accurate term for the case, as the mistake is in the writing, and not in the agreement. * * * This circumstance has often led courts to say that there must be a mutual mistake to authorize the reformation of a contract, when it is only necessary to say that the intention with regard to a term sought to be imported into the writing must be mutual, that is that that term has been part of the contract actually made."

In other words, if the contract does not express the terms of the prior agreement, contrary to the intention of both parties, a case for reformation is presented. Further the author of the note says:

"It is clear that it need not be shown, as necessary to this result either that the defendant (i. e., the party resisting the reformation, we interpolate) was mistaken concerning the written instrument, or that he was guilty of fraud in putting it or having it put into the improper form. He merely may have seen that it was not in conformity with the agreement and kept silent; but this will not prevent rectification on satisfactory evidence of what was agreed."

We are thoroughly convinced that the written contract did not express the terms of the parol agreement between the parties; that the discord was due to the fault of both parties in not sufficiently informing the attorney as to the terms of the agreement between them, or of his failure to properly interpret that information, and to the failure of both parties not to carefully read the contract before signing and to detect the discord; that both parties honestly believed at the time of the execution of the contract, or confidently assumed, that the written contract correctly stated the terms of that agreement.

[6] Under these circumstances, we assert that it would be a monstrous perversion of justice to deny the right of reformation upon the ground that the defendant was negligent in not reading the contract before signing it. It was as much the duty of the plaintiff to read the contract and see that it conformed to the agreement as it was the defendant's. If the plaintiff read it and discovered the discord and allowed the execution to proceed intending to take advantage of it, he does not assume a position that commends him to a court of equity. If he did not read it and thereby discover the discord, he himself was guilty of negligence. Is he to be relieved of the consequence of his negligence which was beneficial to him, and the defendant charged with the consequence of the same act of negligence which was prejudicial to him? In other words, is immunity from negligence to be determined by the fact of its beneficial consequences? The English authorities declare that relief based upon mutual mistake of fact is not to be refused on the ground that the party claiming it had the means of knowledge at the time of the mistake. See Story, Eq. Jur. (14th Ed.) p. 209. The author of the note pertinently states:

"It is conceived that the English rule is the correct one, so far as the mere question of failing to inquire is concerned; for how can a man be entitled to property by an unintended gift simply on the ground that the giver was negligent?"

The case of Forrester v. Moon, 100 S. C. 157, 84 S. E. 532, cited by appellant, is not at all controlling upon the facts of the case at bar. There the plaintiff owned property adjoining the railroad right of way. Her first idea was to lay off a street upon her own property, paralleled with the line of the right of way, subdivide her property into lots fronting on this street, and sell them. She had a plat made carrying out this idea. Afterwards she changed her mind and had a new plat made, omitting the street, and fronting the lots directly on the right of way. One of the lots she sold to the defendant. She then went with him to her attorney, presented to him the new plat, and directed him to draw a deed conveying the lot to the defendant, which he did in her presence and that of the defendant, using the new plat which omitted the street. The deed was executed, drawn as she had directed her lawyer to draw it. The defendant paid the purchase price, had his deed recorded, and went into possession. The plaintiff then brought suit against the purchaser of the lot contending that there was a mistake in the deed, that she did not intend to convey up to the right of way, but to the street indicated on the first plat. Under these circumstances, even if she could have convinced the court that she had made a mistake which is extremely doubtful, she utterly failed to show that the purchaser had done so, or that her mistake was due to misconduct on his part, or to her own imbecility, or that other circumstances existed making it a very great wrong to sustain the deed. The court following the Kennerty Case held that the plaintiff was not entitled to a reformation of the deed.

The cases relied upon by the appellant, upon this question of negligence, are without exception, cases involving the mistake only of the party claiming reformation, cases of unilateral and not mutual mistake, as to which there does not appear to be any doubt of the application of the doctrine. Kennerty v. Etiwan Co., 21 S. C. 226, 53 Am. Rep. 669; Forrester v. Moon, 100 S. C. 157, 84 S. E. 532; Montgomery v. Scott, 9 S. C. 20, 30 Am. Rep. 1; Coates v. Early, 46 S. C. 220, 24 S. E. 305; Murrel v. Murrel, 2 Strobel. Eq. 148, 49 Am. Dec. 664; Gilchrist v. Martin, Bail. Eq. 494; Lumber Co. v. Matheson, 69 S. C. 91, 48 S. E. 111; Baum v. Raley, 53 S. C. 32, 30 S. E. 713; Case Threshing Co. v. Dyches, 108 S. C. 417, 94 S. E. 1051; Baldwin v. Tel. Co., 78 S. C. 419, 59 S. E. 67.

The case of Montgomery v. Scott, 9 S. C. 20, 30 Am. Rep. 1, has little, if any, application to the facts of this case. It and all the cases cited in the opinion involve unilateral mistakes and the rights of innocent third parties. The kernel of the decision is in the following extract:

"The plaintiff knew that she was signing some kind of a written obligation, and if she, through carelessness or negligence, signed a paper of a different character from that which she intended, and that paper has been received by an innocent third person, for value, she ought not to be allowed, when called upon to respond to the obligations imposed by the terms of the paper, to contest her liability upon the ground of mistake.

The circuit judge should therefore have decreed a reformation of the written contract and specific performance by the plaintiff according to the terms of such reformed contract in harmony with the oral contract which preceded it.

Now this extraordinary situation is presented: The circuit judge decreed rescission of the contract; this court declares that to have been erroneous; the circuit judge did not decree reformation and specific performance; this court declares that also to have been erroneous; the plaintiff has appealed from the order decreeing rescission; the defendant has not appealed from the order refusing reformation.

[7] In the consent order of reference there is a provision that, in consideration of the brief life of the timber contract held by the defendant, the timber be sold and the proceeds deposited in the bank, to await the final determination of this case; said proceeds to stand in lieu of the timber and timber rights without prejudice to the rights of either party. Pursuant to this and a subsequent order of the court, which does not appear to be objected to by the plaintiff, the timber and timber rights were sold for $5,000 cash, and the proceeds deposited in the savings department of the Bank of Summerville, at interest, to the credit of this case and subject to and to await the final determination of the circuit court and its further orders in this cause. The parties have therefore by these orders, unobjectioned to, transferred the contest as to their respective rights under the contract, for damages on account of its alleged breach for a rescission of the contract for a reformation of the contract and specific performance, to the fund in bank. We hold that the plaintiff is not entitled to damages on account of the alleged breach, and it is apparent that whether the defendant be entitled to a rescission of the contract or a reformation of it, the result is the same; he is entitled to the said funds on deposit. It follows that the administrative portion of the decree is, in its result, the proper determination of the controversy.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court, subject to the conclusions herein announced, be affirmed.

WEST v. SOVEREIGN CAMP, W. O. W.
(No. 10588.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 16, 1921.)

Insurance — 755(1)—Knowledge that insured was working on train not basis of waiver or estoppel.

Where the laws of a fraternal beneficiary association specified certain occupations, including that of brakeman on a railway freight train, as hazardous occupations, for which additional dues were required, which one becoming a brakeman never paid, waiver or estoppel could not be predicated on the knowledge of officials of the local camp that he was "working on a train"; that not being specified as a hazardous occupation.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; T. S. Sease, Judge.

Action by Frances West against Sovereign Camp, Woodmen of the World. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. E. De Pass and J. Hertz Brown, both of Spartanburg, for appellant.

Bomar & Osborne, of Spartanburg, for respondent.

FRASER, J. The appellant in her argument in this case thus states her cause:

"This action was commenced by the service of summons and complaint on June 2, 1919, and was heard before Hon. T. S. Sease and a jury at the May, 1920, term of the court of common pleas for Spartanburg county. The action was brought on a beneficiary certificate of insurance issued by the defendant, which was a fraternal beneficiary association, on the life of John Claud West, in which Frances West, his wife, the plaintiff, was named as beneficiary. The amount of the certificate was $1,000, and the certificate also provided for the payment of $100 for the erection of a monument to the memory of the insured. The certificate was issued subject to the terms of the constitution and by-laws of the defendant.

"The answer admitted the insurance and the death of the insured, but alleged that his certificate was void because, at the time of his death, the insured was not in good standing as a member of the defendant order, in that he had entered a hazardous occupation without giving, within 30 days thereafter, the required notice of change of employment to the clerk of the local camp of which he was a member and without paying to the said local clerk the sum of 30 cents per month in addition to the regular payment under his certificate, all of which, the answer alleges, is provided in the laws of the defendant order. The defendant then denies liability for both the amount of the insurance and the monument fund.

"At the trial, it was shown that insured had been a conductor on an electric street railway in Charleston for six years prior to January, 1918, and that this employment was known to the clerk of the local camp. It was shown also that insured became a brakeman on a Southern Railway freight train in January, 1918, and that while so employed, he was killed in a railroad accident on September 24, 1918; that in June or July, 1918, three or four months before his death, insured told the clerk of his local camp that he was 'working on a train,' but the clerk could not remember whether insured had stated that his new employment was as a brakeman or as a flagman and whether on a freight or a passenger train.

"Insured had always been particular about paying his dues, had frequently paid them in advance, and had paid them for September, the month of his death; but neither during the six years of his employment on a street railway nor during the nine months of his employment on a steam railway had he ever paid any additional hazardous occupation dues. Neither had the local clerk, during any of this time, ever called on him for additional dues on account of his hazardous employment.

"The laws of the defendant order class the following among so-called hazardous occupations: 'Conductor or brakeman on railway freight trains, baggageman, locomotive engineer, locomotive fireman, expressman, switchman, hostler or other similar railway and steamship employee (excepting agents, office men and those engaged in employment not more hazardous.)'

"At the close of all the testimony, defendant moved for a directed verdict upon the grounds set out in the case, the substance of the grounds being (a) that insured was not in good standing at the time of his death and his certificate void because he had engaged in a hazardous occupation without giving the required notice within thirty days thereafter and without making the required additional monthly payments; (b) that there was no evidence of waiver of the forfeiture thus brought about; and (c) that there was no evidence sufficient to estop defendant from relying on the forfeiture.

"The motion was granted, and a verdict was directed substantially on the grounds (a) that the members of the local camp cannot waive any rights of the headquarters; and (b) that the superior officers of this insurance company did not know of insured's entering a hazardous occupation.

"Plaintiff's exceptions charge error in directing a verdict, the substance of the exceptions being that there was (a) error in holding that there was no evidence of waiver to be submitted to the jury, whereas it was shown that the local clerk knew of insured's employment and continued to collect his regular dues after such knowledge without protest up to his death; (b) error in holding that the insurance was forfeited because the superior officers of the defendant did not know of deceased's hazardous employment, whereas, it is submitted, the knowledge of the local clerk, as the agent of the sovereign camp, was the knowledge of the sovereign camp; and (c) error in failing to submit the question of estoppel to the jury, whereas, it is submitted, the sovereign camp was estopped from denying liability on the ground of the failure of its agent, the local clerk, to perform his duties required by the laws of the order."

It thus appears that the record shows that the company itself had no knowledge of the extra hazard; that all that the local officers knew was that the deceased was "working on a train." Merely "working on a train" is not rated in the policy as an extra hazard, for which an extra premium was required. The extra hazardous employments are specified, and working on a train is not one of the specifications. There was no basis, therefore, for waiver or estoppel. There was no error in directing a verdict.

The judgment is affirmed.

LONG et al. v. COMMISSIONERS OF BRUNSWICK COUNTY. (No. 284.)(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 30, 1921.)Counties ~~§~~35(2)—Majority vote of qualified electors required for removal of county seat;
"majority of qualified vote of county";
"vote."

For removal of county seat under Pub. Loc. & Priv. Laws 1919, c. 263, there must be a vote in favor of a particular place of a majority of the qualified electors of the county, whether voting or not, this being the meaning of the statute's requirement of "a majority of the qualified vote of the county"; vote being used in the sense of voters.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Majority; Vote.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Brunswick County; Daniels, Judge.

Action by W. A. Long and others against the Commissioners of Brunswick County to enjoin the removal of the county seat. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The General Assembly of North Carolina, at its regular session, 1919, passed an act entitled "An act to submit to the voters of Brunswick county the question of the location of the county seat, and to provide county buildings," same being chapter 263 of the Public Local and Private Laws of 1919. Under this act, the board of elections of Brunswick county was authorized and directed to submit to the qualified voters of the said county the question of whether the county seat should be located at Southport, Bolivia, or Supply. It was provided in said act that in the event no one of these places received a majority of the qualified votes of Brunswick county in said election, then under this statute a second election should be held for a choice to be made between the two places receiving the highest and the next highest votes.

In the first election Bolivia received 624 votes, Supply, 562, and Southport, 406; and it appears that 474 registered voters did not vote in said election. No one place receiving a majority of the qualified votes, a second election was ordered to be held between Bolivia and Supply. In this second election Bolivia received 754, Supply, 370 votes, and it appears that 1,003 registered voters cast no ballot. The returns of said election were duly canvassed and the result declared by the board of commissioners of Brunswick county on the 5th day of July, 1920, said board declaring and designating Bolivia the county seat of Brunswick county. This action of the board of commissioners of Brunswick county in declaring and designating Bolivia as the county seat is attacked by the plaintiffs on the ground that a majority of the qualified voters resident in Brunswick county did not cast their ballots in favor of Bolivia, either in the first or second election. It appears from the allegations of the complaint that 754 qualified votes were cast in the second election for Bolivia, the same being a majority of the qualified votes polled, but less than a majority of the total number of registered voters in the county.

The whole case presents the question as to whether it was necessary for Bolivia, in the second election, to receive a majority of the qualified vote, as cast, or the vote of a majority of the total number of registered voters in said county, in order to be declared the county seat. The court then held that, before Bolivia could be declared the county seat of Brunswick, it must have received the favorable vote of a majority of the qualified voters resident in said county, whether all of them actually voted or not. The action was brought to enjoin defendants from declaring Bolivia the county seat of Brunswick county, or to take any action whatever for the purpose of effecting a removal of the county seat from its present location at Southport. Upon the foregoing ruling, the court gave judgment for the plaintiffs, citizens, and taxpayers of Brunswick county, enjoining the removal of the county seat. Defendants appealed.

McLean, Varser, McLean & Stacy, of Lumberton, for appellants.

John D. Bellamy and Robert Ruark, both of Wilmington, for appellees.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). The only question necessary to be considered is whether a removal to Bolivia could take place, under the terms of the statute, unless a majority of all "the qualified voters of Brunswick county" had actually voted in favor of the same at the polls, or whether a majority of those who voted at the election was sufficient to authorize the removal, and the decision of this question turns on the meaning of the word "voters" as used in the statute. If the words "qualified vote or voters" is equivalent to "qualified electors," the judgment of the court below is correct, as Bolivia did not receive a majority of the qualified electors, or of the qualified votes of the county, when the word "vote" is taken in the sense of the registered vote, or list of registered electors.

There may be, and perhaps is, apparent conflict in the authorities elsewhere, but in this state, and by this court, the meaning of the words "a majority of the qualified voters of a county" was finally settled long ago, and that meaning must now prevail with us. In Railroad v. Commissioners, 72 N. C. 486, the very question we have here was presented.

There the plaintiff applied for a mandamus to compel the defendant to subscribe for 600 shares of the plaintiff's stock for the county, and to issue county bonds in payment thereof. An election was held to ascertain the will of the people and to get their approval thereof. Here the proposal is to remove the county seat from Southport (formerly Smithville), and for that purpose that the county shall incur a very large debt to pay the costs and expenses of the removal and the erection of new buildings; that is, $60,000 or more. In Railroad v. Commissioners, supra, the object was to buy stock of the railroad company with bonds of the county, while in this case the purpose is to remove the county seat, and thereby to incur a debt for which the defendants are authorized to issue the bonds of the county. It will be seen, therefore, that this case and that of Railroad v. Commissioners, supra, are alike for all practical purposes, and are governed by the same principle. It was said in Railroad v. Commissioners, supra, by Justice Rodman:

"Our opinion as to the meaning of section 7 of article 7 of the state Constitution relieves us from the necessity of considering any of the other questions which were ably and learnedly discussed by counsel. That section is in these words: 'Sec. 7. No county, city, town or other municipal corporation, shall contract any debt, pledge its faith, or loan its credit, nor shall any tax be levied or collected, by any officers of the same, except for the necessary expenses thereof, unless by a vote of a majority of the qualified voters therein.' It is contended for the plaintiffs that these words mean a majority of the qualified voters therein, who actually vote at the election upon the question. It is not the natural meaning of the words used, but requires an addition of words to qualify and limit the generality of the expression. If the words used are so ambiguous as to be unintelligible without some addition (as were the words prescribing the tenure of a judge appointed to fill a vacancy, commented on by the Chief Justice, in the case of Cloud v. Wilson [ante, 155]), such addition must be made as may be found proper on a consideration of the context, and of all other circumstances bearing on it. But to add limiting or qualifying words is not in general permissible, or except for very strong reasons, when the words used contained an intelligible description of the object. The word 'therein' is important. It means 'in the county,' and the phrase may then be read as, 'a majority of the qualified voters of the county.'"

And likewise in Duke v. Brown, 96 N. C. 127, 1 S. E. 873, Chief Justice Smith says that it was not intended to dispense with the approval of a majority of the qualified voters, and allow a minority, or inconsiderable fraction it might be, to determine the result. Indifference, he says, is not the test, but an "active and expressed approval is necessary, and this is ascertained by a majority of those entitled to vote," and he further says that, however numerous the contrary rulings in other states, we must adhere to our own construction of the words "qualified voters" as being necessary to protect our people. To the same effect are Southerland v. Goldsboro, 96 N. C. 49, 1 S. E. 760, McDowell v. Construction Co., 96 N. C. 514, 2 S. E. 351, Norment v. Charlotte, 85 N. C. 387, and Clark v. Statesville, 139 N. C. 490, 52 S. E. 52, where the words "qualified voters" have been used in different connections. It is a rule applicable to the construction of statutes that, where they make use of words which have definite and well-known sense in the law, they are to be received and expounded in the same sense in the statute. Asbury v. Albemarle, 162 N. C. 247, 78 S. E. 146, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1189, citing Adams v. Turrentine, 30 N. C. 149. As said by a very able and learned judge, whose opinion is entitled to the greatest weight, "the literal meaning of the clause (majority of the qualified voters) seems to me unmistakably to require a majority of the qualified voters, whether they voted or not." The Supreme Court of the United States adopted this view in Harshman v. Bates County, 92 U. S. 569, 23 L. Ed. 747, by a unanimous opinion written by Justice Bradley. It is true that court afterwards in County of Cass v. Johnston, 95 U. S. 380, 24 L. Ed. 416, overruled the former case as to this point, but only for the reason that the court had, in that case, overlooked the decision of the Supreme Court of Missouri, from which both cases came, upon the question, by which Chief Justice Waite said they were bound, but no indication whatever is given in the opinion by him in the later case that any of the Justices concurring in the former opinion had abandoned, or even abated, his own individual view of the matter, but there is room for clear inference that there had been no such change of mind. Two of the judges dissented, Bradley and Miller, Justice Bradley writing an able opinion, if not unanswerable, and both he and Justice Miller expressly adhering to their first opinion, and dissenting from the last opinion upon the ground that not even the Missouri cases had given any contrary meaning to the phrase we are considering, and therefore the general rule of procedure did not apply, and the court was free to express, and enforce, its own independent opinion, and to give effect to its own construction of the statute, and also, upon such construction, to declare its invalidity. The case of State ex rel. Woodson v. Brassfield et al., 67 Mo. 331, directly sustains our conclusion.

We do not agree that the use of the word "vote" instead of "voters" should make any difference in the result. It means substantially the same thing. The words "vote" and "voters" are inaccurately used to express what is manifestly the meaning as heretofore held by us. "Vote" is the choice expressed at the ballot box, "ballot" the means by which it is expressed, and "voter" the person who expresses it. The proper, or more exact, word, perhaps, would have been "electors," instead of "voters" or "vote" in the phrase "a majority of the qualified voters or vote." But the intent and meaning of the Legislature is just as clear with either word, and the legislative will is not to be disappointed by the lack of rhetorical, or verbal, accuracy, if the meaning and intention are plainly disclosed. 36 Cyc. 1114-1127. But without the aid of any authority, or decided case, we are of the opinion that it was intended by the Legislature that all of the "qualified electors" should be counted in ascertaining whether a majority of those entitled to vote, and called "qualified voters," or "qualified vote" in the act, had actually voted.

The judgment of the court directing a permanent injunction was correct.

STATE v. HALL. (No. 275.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 30, 1921.)

1. Criminal law §1038(1)—Timely objection to judge's statement of contentions necessary for review.

That there may be review of the judge's manner of stating to the jury the contentions of the parties, objection must have been made in time for him to make any needed correction.

2. Criminal law §957(1)—Verdict not impeachable by testimony of jurors.

A verdict cannot be impeached by the testimony of jurors, especially where the only witness by whom this could be met is dead.

Appeal from Superior Court, Cumberland County; Daniels, Judge.

George Hall was convicted of a secret assault, and he appeals and petitions for certiorari. No error, and petition denied.

W. C. Downing, McCormick & Clark, and Robinson & Robinson, all of Fayetteville, for appellant.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. The defendant was convicted of a secret assault, and from the judgment upon such conviction he appealed to this court, and assigns several errors.

[1] First. That his contentions were not stated, though the state's were given in full. This exception is not supported by the record, which shows that the contentions of both sides were stated by his honor with fairness and impartiality. Besides, the objection, or rather suggestion, came too late. We have often held that such an objection must be made in apt time, so that the court may have opportunity to supply any omission. The proceedings of the court must be conducted in an orderly manner, and, of course, all objections should be made at the proper time, and especially an objection of the kind here made. The latest case on the subject is McMahan v. Spruce Co., 180 N. C. 636, 105 S. E. 439, where other authorities are cited. It is there held that an exception to the manner of stating contentions of the parties must be brought to the attention of the court by action taken promptly and for the obvious purpose of having the omission, if there is one, corrected by the presiding judge at the time. There was no proper request to correct this oversight, if there was any, in the respect indicated.

Second. The contention as to the absence of a motive for the assault was stated to the jury in such a way that they must have understood it. The state contended that there was a motive for committing the assault, and the defendant denied that there was any such motive, or any evidence of one, and the judge explained these contentions pro and con to the jury, stating both phases of it, and certainly allowed neither side any advantage in the statement. The jury could not well have misapprehended the court, and the defendant's rights were fully protected. He therefore suffered no harm.

[2] Third. The power of the court to set aside a verdict for cause after the adjournment is discussed in State v. Alphin, 81 N. C. 566, State v. Bennett, 93 N. C. 503, and State v. Kinsauls, 126 N. C. 1096, 36 S. E. 31. But we need not refer to this feature of the case any further, and will assume, for the sake of argument, that we have possession of the cause sufficiently to grant relief, if the appellant is entitled to any, and we think he is not. He seeks to set aside the verdict, because of misbehavior of the jury, and proposes to impeach their verdict by their own affidavits. This is not allowable, as we have repeatedly decided in former cases, and his honor, Judge Daniels, so held, and was, of course, right in so deciding. Justice Bynum said, in State v. Smallwood, 78 N. C. 560:

"Misconduct on the part of the jury to impeach their verdict must be shown by other testimony than their own. This has been long settled and for the most convincing reasons, which will readily suggest themselves to all minds at all familiar with the administration of justice through the medium of trial by jury"

—citing State v. McLeod, 8 N. C. 344, where Judge Henderson said:

"As to the misconduct of the jury, it has been long settled, and very properly, that evidence impeaching their verdict must not come from the jury, but must be shown by other testimony. We can therefore perceive no grounds for a new trial."

In State v. Best, 111 N. C. 638, 15 S. E. 930, much like this one, Justice MacRae stated the rule very strongly when he said:

"To meet the earnest contention of the prisoner's counsel that the presiding judge, having permitted the affidavits to be filed, ought to have found the facts and spread them upon the record, it appears that the affidavit offered alleges, or was intended to allege, that the affiants had agreed to the verdict of guilty through mistake in their understanding of the effect of the verdict. In this event, as has been said above, the Supreme Court cannot correct errors committed by a jury. This is the province of the judge below, and therefore it was unnecessary for his honor to find the facts upon the affidavits. But it might well be held that the affidavit, if we were at liberty to consider it, alleges misconduct upon the part of the five jurors making it, for, if they were not satisfied by the evidence of the guilt of the prisoner, it was a gross wrong in them, for any consideration of personal inconvenience, to compromise with the other members of the jury and agree to a verdict of guilty, with a recommendation to mercy, in the hope that the life of the prisoner would be spared at the cost of a long imprisonment. If they were not satisfied of the prisoner's guilt, the only verdict they could conscientiously render would have been one of not guilty. And if the ground of the motion was the misconduct of the jurors, it should, as we have seen, have been based upon other testimony than the affidavits of the jurors who alleged their own misconduct, for they cannot be heard, and no facts could be found by the judge below upon their affidavit."

And again:

"We find ourselves concluded by the authority of an established and long-settled rule, based upon the wisest reasons of public policy, that a juror should not be permitted to impeach his own conduct in the rendition of a verdict. The result of a departure from the old rule would unsettle other important principles, protract litigation, and weaken the public regard for the ancient and well-tried methods of trial by jury."

It was deemed necessary to discuss this matter somewhat at length, with a citation of a few leading cases, in order to prevent inferences from some of the general language used in State v. Fuller, 114 N. C. 885, 19 S. E. 797, which we think are unwarranted, but which may lead to confusion and a correct understanding of the law in cases belonging to same class as this one. It would lead to very grave consequences if we should permit jurors to impeach their own verdict. It would render judicial trials unstable, and soon undermine public confidence in the integrity of our courts and the justice of their decisions.

In this respect, at least, we had better take heed of the ancient landmarks, and follow the precedents so firmly established by those who have gone before us. The rule should be especially applicable to this case, where the only witness upon whose testimony the state could possibly, or safely, rely is dead, and any decision must necessarily rest upon the impeachment of jurors alone. But it appears that what the jurors did has worked no substantial harm to the defendant. Language of the presiding judge, much stronger and more emphatic than that which the jurors here supposed the judge had used, but which he did not use, was held by this court, in a former case, not to impair the verdict. Osborne v. Wilkes, 108 N. C. 615, 13 S. E. 285. But the decisive test is that some of the jurors are attempting to impeach their own verdict and to state the mental process by which they reached their verdict.

No error.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a certiorari in this case is denied, for the reason set forth in the opinion filed in this case on the merits.

Denied.

ALLEN v. CAMERON. (No. 251.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 23, 1921.)

Willis §587(3)—Daughter named as residuary "legatee" held entitled to realty as well as personalty; "legacy."

Under a will whereby testator, to provide for any omission, declared his daughter to be residuary legatee, to receive and take all that should be omitted, or that should fall in and become his, with further provision that she should have paid her full child's part on the division of his personal property, without any deduction for advances, such daughter took, not only the undisposed-of personalty of testator, but also the undisposed-of realty; such being his intention, in view of the clause itself and the remainder of the will, "legacy" including a devise, and "legatee" a devisee, if necessary.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Legacy—Legatee.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Kerr, Judge.

Action by W. M. Allen against Bennehan Cameron. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This is a civil action, brought by W. M. Allen against Bennehan Cameron for the specific performance of a written contract, whereby Mr. Cameron agreed to sell to W. M. Allen, and said Allen agreed to buy from him, a house and lot in Raleigh, N. C., on East Jones street, at the price of $8,000 in cash. The defendant Cameron, in apt time, tendered the deed from him and his wife to said Allen, and demanded the payment of the sale price of $8,000. Mr. Allen made no objection to the form of the deed, or that the property was not free from incumbrance, but refused to accept the deed, or to pay the sale price, solely on the ground that item 16 of the will of Mr. Paul C. Cameron did not pass said house and lot to his daughter, Mildred Cameron, who devised the same to defendant, Bennehan Cameron, and hence that the defendant, Bennehan Cameron, did not have and could not convey a good title to said house and lot; the said Allen contending that the words "residuary legatee" in item 16 passed undisposed-of personal property alone, but did not pass undisposed-of real estate, while the defendant, Cameron, claimed that item 16 passed undisposed-of real estate also, including the house and lot in question.

The house and lot was owned by Paul C. Cameron at the time of his death, but is not specifically mentioned in his will, and there is no other residuary clause in the will except item 16. Mr. Paul C. Cameron wrote his own will. Item 16 of the will of Paul C. Cameron is as follows:

"Item 16. And to provide for any omission I name and declare my daughter, Mildred Cameron, the residuary legatee, to receive and take all that shall be omitted, or that shall fall in and become mine, either in law or equity, and that she shall be paid her full child's part on the division of my personal property, without any deduction for any advances, as she has needed none and received nothing beyond what she deserved for her care of her parents, and as a member of my family."

The court below rendered judgment in favor of the defendant, and held that item 16 of the will of Paul C. Cameron did pass the house and lot to Mildred Cameron, and that her will devised the same to the defendant, Bennehan Cameron, and therefore that he was the owner in fee simple of the same, and that, upon his tendering to the plaintiff a deed in sufficient form to pass title in fee to the house and lot free from incumbrances, the plaintiff should accept the same and pay the sale price of $8,000 over to the defendant.

The plaintiff excepted and appealed, and filed six exceptions and assignments of error set out in the record. All of plaintiff's exceptions and assignments of error are based upon his contention that the court erred in holding that item 16 of the will of Paul C. Cameron operated to make his daughter, Mildred Cameron, his residuary devisee as well as residuary legatee, and that the house and lot passed to her; it being conceded that, if she acquired the title to the house and lot, it passed by her will to the defendant, and that he is now the owner in fee of the same, and that the deed already tendered by him is fully sufficient to convey the house and lot to plaintiff in fee. Therefore all of plaintiff's exceptions and assignments of error will be considered together.

The only question is as to whether item 16 of the will of Paul C. Cameron passed to his daughter, Mildred Cameron, the undisposed-of real property as well as the undisposed-of personal property.

R. N. Simms, of Raleigh, for appellant.

Ernest Haywood, of Raleigh, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). We have no doubt as to what Mr. Cameron meant by the language employed in the residuary clause of his will. It is clear from the preamble, or introductory clause, that he intended to dispose of all that he owned or possessed, and not to die intestate as to any part of his large estate. He disposed of the larger part of it with great care and particularity, and when he came to the final clauses, thinking that he may have inadvertently overlooked some part of it, he inserted the residuary clause to provide for any such omission on his part. This is generally the intention of a testator in making such a provision, and is the peculiar office of a residuary clause. It will embrace anything not before disposed of in the will, both real and personal property, unless there are words used to restrict its meaning. Perusing the entire will of Mr. Cameron, and comparing all of its parts with each other, we are led to the conclusion that he has expressed his intention throughout with unusual clearness and precision; with the clear understanding of the other parts of his will, in which he provides for all those whom he regarded as the proper objects of his bounty and solicitude, he then takes precaution against the contingency of anything being left out, which shows additionally that he intended to dispose of everything he had, and this also is according to the presumption of fact which the law raises, for Justice Ruffin said in Reeves v. Reeves, 16 N. C. 386:

"It is to be remembered that every testator is presumed not to intend to die intestate, as to any part of his estate, and, therefore, that a residuary clause is always, unless expressly restrained, held to pass whatever is not otherwise disposed of. If there was nothing particular, therefore, in this will, there could be no question."

See, also, Powell v. Wood, 149 N. C. 235, 62 S. E. 1071; Austin v. Austin, 160 N. C. 367, 76 S. E. 272; Homes v. Mitchell, 6 N. C. 228, 5 Am. Dec. 527; Williams v. McComb, 38 N. C. 450; Page v. Foust, 89 N. C. 447; Foil v. Newsome, 138 N. C. 115, 50 S. E. 597, 3 Ann. Cas. 417; Jones v. Myatt, 153 N. C. 225, 69 S. E. 135; Norris v. Durfey, 168 N. C. 325, 84 S. E. 687.

Cases in other jurisdictions are to the like effect. Wilson v. Wilson, 261 Ill. 174, 103 N. E. 743; Russell v. Elden, 15 Me. 193; Bacon v. Bacon, 55 Vt. 243; Yopp v. Railroad, 148 Ga. 539, 97 S. E. 534.

Justice Story in Burwell v. Cawood, Executor of Mandeville, 2 How. 560, 577, 11 L. Ed. 378, 385, considered a case very much like ours, and thus said, after referring to certain legal principles and to the testator's intention, as disclosed by his will, when read in the light of these principles:

"There can, we think, be no doubt that the testator intended by his will to dispose of the whole of his estate, real and personal. The introductory words to his will, already cited, show such an intention in a clear and explicit manner. * * * He therefore looks to the disposal of all the estate he shall die possessed of. It is said that, admitting such to be his intention, the testator has not carried it into effect, because the residuary clause declares John West his 'residuary legatee' only, and not his residuary devisee also, and that we are to interpret the words of the will according to their legal import as confined altogether to the residue of the personal estate. This is, in our judgment, a very narrow and technical interpretation of the words of the will. The language used by the testator shows him to have been an unskillful man and not versed in legal phraseology. The cardinal rule in the interpretation of wills is that the language is to be interpreted in subordination to the intention of the testator, and is not to control that intention, when it is clear and determinate. Thus, for example, the word 'legacy' may be construed to apply to real estate, where the context of the will shows such to be the intention of the testator."

He then cites some of the English cases. Hope v. Taylor, 1 Burr. Rep. 269, where the word "legacy" was held to include lands, from the intention of the testator, deduced from the context of his will; and Hardacre v. Hash, 5 Term Reports, 716, where a like doctrine was announced upon similar facts. Doe, dem Tofield, v. Tofield, 11 East, 246, and Pitman v. Stevens, 15 East, 505, were to the same effect. He treats the law as settled upon this point. The above English decisions have been followed by the courts of this country, and especially by this court.

We may therefore take the general rule to be unquestioned that, where it appears to be the intention of the testator, the word "legacy" may include "devise," and "legatee" a "devisee," so that a "residuary legatee" would take land as well as personalty. In the following cases the words "residuary legatee" were used by the testator and held by the court to have the same meaning as if they had been "residuary legatee and devisee." Evans v. Crosbie, 15 Sim. 600, 60 Eng. Rep. 753; Estate of Henderson, 161 Cal. 354, 119 Pac. 496; Dann v. Canfield, 197 Mass. 591, 84 N. E. 117, 14 Ann. Cas. 794; Day v. Daveron, 12 Sim. 200 (59 Eng. Rep. 1108); Wilds v. Davies, 1 Smale & Giffard, 475 (65 Eng. Repr.

Rep. 208); Laing v. Barbour, 119 Mass. 523; Singleton v. Tomlinson, 3 Appeal Cases, 404. So it is seen that the current of authority is decidedly in one and the same direction.

But the language of the residuary clause is itself sufficient to show the intention of the testator. He first declares that he wishes "to provide for any omission" and therefore appoints his daughter, Mildred Cameron, his "residuary legatee"—"to receive and take all that shall be omitted or that shall fall in (or lapse) and become mine." Nowhere does he restrict this gift to personal property, but uses general words, such as "any" and "all," which included his property of every kind not expressly given to another, or which reverts to him by reason of a lapse on account of the death of any beneficiary during his lifetime. He could not have written a more inclusive or comprehensive clause. The subsequent reference to her child's part in the division of the personalty (already provided for) was inserted, in order to make it clear that he intended that the daughter should be treated with special favor, and that there should be no deduction from her child's share in the personalty when the division of it was made as before directed, on account of any advancement he had made to her. The latter part of the clause was not intended to limit the words of the first part, by confining the latter to personalty alone, but was inserted there for a very different purpose. He assigns the reason for thus favoring his daughter, which is that no real advancements had been made—

"as she had needed none, and had received nothing beyond that she deserved for her care of her parents and as a member of my [his] family."

There can be no doubt as to the true construction of Mr. Cameron's will, if there was room for it. Where the meaning is plain, or without any ambiguity, no construction is required; but we simply enforce the intention as it is clearly expressed, and, for this reason, further discussion would be useless, and we would end it here, but for the fact that this court has once passed upon this will some years ago, in construing another clause of it, and in the opinion of the court reference also was made to this residuary clause, which is pertinent to this case and deserves some attention from us. The court there said:

"It is a presumption of fact that every man that makes a will intends to dispose of all of his estate. Blue v. Ritter, 118 N. C. 580; Jones v. Perry, 38 N. C. 200. This presumption may be rebutted, but it stands until it is rebutted. It is therefore presumed that Mr. Cameron did not intend to die intestate as to this large body of land, amounting to some 800 acres. And, besides this presumption the law makes, we have other evidence in the will tending to show that he did not intend to die intestate as to any part of his estate. We find that in the sixteenth item of his will he says: 'And to provide for any omissions I name my daughter Mildred the residuary legatee.' But she is to have her full share, and not to account for anything she may receive under this residuary clause." Peebles v. Graham, 128 N. C. 222, 39 S. E. 25.

The sixteenth clause is the one now under consideration. It appears from the above excerpt from the opinion of the court in the case that our Brethren of that day regarded clause 16 as referring to both realty and personality. They were considering whether a tract of land containing about 800 acres had been sufficiently described to pass to the defendant under the will, but the court was unanimous in the opinion that Mr. Cameron did not die intestate as to any of his property, but that it all, realty and personality, had passed under specific devises and bequests, and, if not, then under the residuary clause. But we do not agree to the suggestion in that opinion that the reference at the close of the quotation referred "to anything she received under the residuary clause," but solely to money or property given to her in the testator's lifetime, which, but for his explicit direction in the residuary clause, might be taken, and charged against her, as advancements.

Our conclusion is that, upon the facts stated in the record, this property passed to Mildred Cameron by her father's will, and by her will it passed to the defendant, and that the latter is now the owner thereof, and can convey a good and indefeasible title thereto to the plaintiff by the deed which the court has required him to execute.

There is no error, and we affirm the judgment.

Affirmed.

COTTON v. FISHERIES PRODUCTS CO.
et al. (No. 286.)

1. Trial \S 252(20)—Instruction stating contention was unsupported by evidence did not submit such contention.

A charge mentioning contentions of plaintiff that he was entitled to certain special damages, but stating that no evidence had been offered to support this position, was not objectionable as calculated to create in the jurors' minds an impression that the court thought the evidence sufficient to submit the question to them.

2. Libel and slander \S 120(2)—Punitive damages held warranted.

Where defendant corporation's manager told plaintiff in the presence of listening observers that he had orders from the corporation's president not to allow plaintiff to remove household goods until searched for stolen goods, the accompanying acts, in causing plaintiff's goods to be opened publicly and searched in the presence of divers persons, gave such pronounced color and tone to the entire setting of the case as to warrant the jury in assessing exemplary damages.

3. Damages \S 87(1)—"Smart money," or "punitive damages," allowable for malicious, wanton, or reckless injury.

"Punitive damages," sometimes called "smart money," are allowed in cases where the injury is inflicted in a malicious, wanton, and reckless manner, where defendant's conduct is either actually malicious or wanton, displaying a spirit of mischief toward plaintiff, or of reckless and criminal indifference to his rights; such damages being awarded on the grounds of public policy, for example's sake, and not because plaintiff has a right thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Punitive Damages; Smart Money.]

4. Damages \S 208(8)—Punitive damages for jury.

In a proper case, both the awarding of punitive damages and the amount to be allowed, if any, rest in the sound discretion of the jury.

5. Libel and slander \S 32, 123(6)—Defendants not exonerated by ineffectiveness of slander.

That plaintiff's standing in the community had not been impaired by defendants' conduct, and that plaintiff could still show a good character, held not to exonerate defendants from their wrongful purpose, as this might tend to show a smaller injury actually sustained, but a greater damage really intended, and the malice, ill will, and spite of defendants were not per se reduced or mitigated by the meager results accomplished.

6. Libel and slander \S 113, 120(1)—Distinction between compensatory and punitive damages stated.

In a slander action, "compensatory damages" are based upon injuries suffered by plaintiff, while "punitive damages" are awarded upon wrongs intended by defendants; but the amount of punitive damages, while resting in the sound discretion of the jury, may not be excessively disproportionate to the circumstances of contumely and indignity present in each particular case.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Compensatory Damages.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Brunswick County; Daniels, Judge.

Civil action for slander, brought by J. K. Cotton against the Fisheries Products Company and Thomas H. Hayes and H. B. Therian, president and manager, respectively, of said corporation. Upon motion duly made, the court directed a verdict in favor of the defendant Thomas H. Hayes, and there was a verdict against the other two defendants for damages in the sum of $6,500. His honor reduced this award to $3,500, and entered judgment in favor of plaintiff for said amount. The defendant corporation and H. B. Therian excepted and appealed. No error.

Rountree & Carr, of Wilmington, and C. Ed. Taylor, of Southport, for appellants.

Robert W. Davis, of Southport, and John D. Bellamy & Sons, of Wilmington, for appellee.

STACY, J. This cause was before the court at a previous term and is reported in 177 N. C. 56, 97 S. E. 712. The first appeal was from a judgment overruling defendants' demurrer. This was affirmed, and the case is now before us upon exceptions noted on the trial. The material allegations, which, upon the hearing, were supported by evidence, and the principles of law arising thereon, are fully set out and considered in the former opinion of the court and need not be repeated here.¹ The case seems to have been tried in accordance with the opinion heretofore rendered and the same doctrine more recently announced in Vincent v. Pace, 178 N. C. 421, 100 S. E. 581. The only exceptions deserving special attention are those relating to the charge on the issue of damages.

[1] The plaintiff alleged and contended that he had suffered special damages, in that certain business negotiations, which he had on hand, were broken up as a result of the defendants' alleged wrongful acts. The court, in its charge to the jury, took occasion to mention these contentions of the plaintiff, but stated that no evidence had been offered to support this position, as there was no testimony tending to show that the matters and things complained of in this case had been brought to the attention of the parties with whom plaintiff was negotiating. Defendants excepted to this portion of the charge, on the grounds that the giving of a contention, not warranted by the evidence, was calculated to create in the minds of the jurors an impression that the court thought the evidence was sufficient to submit the question to them. We are unable to agree with this conclusion. The court's statement that the plaintiff was making a contention, unsupported by evidence, would hardly be considered hurtful or prejudicial to the defendants. This was tantamount to saying that the plaintiff's contentions, to this extent, were not well founded. The exception must be overruled.

[2] The defendants' eighth and last exception relates to the charge on punitive damages. The basis of this assignment is that there is no evidence from which the jury would be justified in awarding such damages, and that it was therefore error to instruct them upon the subject. We think his honor properly submitted this phase of the case to the jury for their consideration. Not only did the language of defendant's employees amount to a charge of larceny, actionable per se under our law, but the accompanying acts, in causing plaintiff's goods to be opened publicly and searched in the presence of divers persons, gave such pronounced color and tone to the entire setting of the case as to warrant the jury in assessing exemplary damages. Bowden v. Bailes, 101 N. C. 612, 8 S. E. 342.

[3, 4] Punitive damages, sometimes called smart money, are allowed in cases where the injury is inflicted in a malicious, wanton, and reckless manner. The defendants' conduct must have been actually malicious or wanton, displaying a spirit of mischief towards the plaintiff, or of reckless and criminal indifference to his rights. When these elements are present, damages commensurate with the injury may be allowed by way of punishment to the defendants. But these damages are awarded on the grounds of public policy, for example's sake, and not because the plaintiff has a right to the money, but it goes to him merely because it is assessed in his suit. In a proper case, like the one at bar, both the awarding of punitive damages, and the amount to be allowed, if any, rest in the sound discretion of the jury. Cobb v. Railroad, 175 N. C. 132, 95 S. E. 92; Fields v. Bynum, 156 N. C. 413, 72 S. E. 449; Hayes v. Railroad, 141 N. C. 199, 53 S. E. 847; Smithwick v. Ward, 52 N. C. 64, 75 Am. Dec. 453.

[5, 6] The fact that plaintiff's standing in the community has not been impaired by defendants' conduct, and that he can still show a good character, does not exonerate the defendants from their wrongful purpose. This might tend to show a smaller injury actually sustained, but a greater damage really intended. The malice, ill will, and spite of the defendants are not per se reduced or mitigated by the meager results accomplished. Compensatory damages are based upon injuries suffered by the plaintiff, while punitive damages are awarded upon wrongs intended by the defendants. However, the amount of punitive damages, while resting in the sound discretion of the jury, may not be excessively disproportionate to the circumstances of contumely and indignity present in each particular case. Gilreath v. Allen, 32 N. C. 67; Sloan v. Edwards, 61 Md. 100; Bernheimer v. Becker, 102 Md. 250, 62 Atl.

¹ The opinion in the former report (177 N. C. 56, 97 S. E. 712) says:

"The complaint, in effect, alleged that just prior to the slanderous utterance plaintiff had been the general manager of defendant company's oil and fertilizer business, and had done his duty honestly and faithfully; that, having left the employment of the company, he was in the act of having his household goods moved to the dock, with a purpose of being placed on the boat, when the bearers were stopped by direction of defendant Harry B. Therian, present manager, acting under orders of his codefendant, the president, the goods opened and searched, accompanied by the statement, in the hearing of divers persons, that plaintiff was suspected of having taken the property of defendant company, consisting of towels, bed sheets," etc.

526, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 221, 111 Am. St. Rep. 356.

We have carefully examined the record, the defendants' exceptions, and assignments of error, and find no sufficient reason for disturbing the results of the trial.

No error.

BURCH v. J. D. BUSH & CO. (No. 253.)

1. Contracts §309(2), 311—Executors and administrators §202½—Rule of survival of obligation of contract stated.

Contracts bind a party's executor or administrator, though not named therein, and death does not absolve a contractor from his engagement, an exception being that in contracts requiring the continued existence of a person or thing a condition is implied that the impossibility of fulfillment arising out of the death of the person or destruction of the thing shall excuse performance.

2. Contracts §311—Personal contracts die with contractor.

Contracts of a strictly personal nature, involving particular personal skill or taste, such as a contract of an author to write a book, an artist to paint a picture, etc., die with the person, and the obligation does not survive against his representative.

3. Contracts §311—Whether contract is one surviving a party one of intention.

Where the contract is of such a nature that it may have been intended either to survive or not to survive a party's death, the question of survival of obligation depends on the intention of the parties, and in every case is purely a question of their understanding and agreement.

4. Contracts §311—Executors and administrators §202½—Contractor to cut tract and manufacture lumber survives against contractor's administratrix.

Contract by plaintiff's intestate to cut a certain tract of standing timber and manufacture it into lumber as per specifications held such that its obligation survived the contractor's death as against plaintiff administratrix.

5. Executors and administrators §426—Personal representatives of deceased contractor who offered to perform entitled to recover on quantum meruit.

Where the personal representatives of a deceased contractor in good faith offered to complete his contract, and the other parties refused to accept it, and declined to permit the personal representatives to proceed, they are relieved from further performance, and entitled to an accounting and recovery as upon a quantum meruit.

6. Executors and administrators §202½—By abandonment surviving contractor forfeits right to call on representatives of other party.

The surviving party to a contract may abandon and thus forfeit his right to call upon the personal representatives of the other party to continue with the agreement, and in such case he cannot hold decedent's estate liable for damages occasioned by his own effort to fulfil the contract.

7. Executors and administrators §450—Evidence of overpayments by contractor with decedent admissible to show payments under mistake of fact.

In suit by the administratrix of a deceased contractor to recover a balance withheld, evidence of overpayments for which defendant counterclaimed was competent to show payments made under a misapprehension or mistake of fact.

Appeal from Superior Court, Franklin County; Kerr, Judge.

Action by Maggie E. Burch, administratrix, against J. D. Bush & Co. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. New trial.

Civil action brought to recover moneys alleged to have been withheld on a logging and sawmilling contract.

On December 16, 1915, plaintiff's intestate entered into a written contract with the defendant whereby he undertook to cut a certain tract of standing timber and manufacture the same into lumber as per specifications set out in the written agreement; the work to be completed within 18 months. It was stipulated in the contract that the cutting and sawing of said timber was to be paid for as the work progressed, settlements to be made every 2 weeks; and the defendant was given the right to reserve and hold back 10 per cent. of the amount due on the lumber delivered as a guaranty for the satisfactory fulfillment of the contract.

In August, 1916, plaintiff's intestate was accidentally killed at his sawmill while engaged in carrying out his contract with the defendant. Plaintiff alleges that at the time of the death of the intestate the defendant had in its hands the sum of $445.22 as moneys reserved on lumber manufactured and delivered up to that date. The defendant answered and alleged that upon a proper accounting between the parties, up to the date of the death of plaintiff's intestate, it would appear that the defendant had made overpayments to the amount of $282.19 and asked for an affirmative judgment against plaintiff for this sum. Later the defendant filed an amended answer and set up by way of further defense and counterclaim that the defendant had suffered damages in the sum of $1,126.77 as the difference between the contract price and what it cost the defendant over and above that price to have the remainder of the timber cut and manufactured into lumber.

His honor, being of opinion that the contract was personal to plaintiff's intestate, and that his death relieved his representatives from further fulfillment, and also being of opinion that the fortnightly settlements were binding between the parties, excluded evidence which the defendant proposed to offer on its counterclaims and directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. Defendant accepted and appealed.

Willis Smith, of Raleigh, for appellant.

Wm. H. & Thos. W. Ruffin, of Louisburg, for appellee.

STACY, J. We think his honor erred in holding, as a matter of law, that the contract in question was personal, and that further performance was not required after the death of plaintiff's intestate.

[1] The general rule is that contracts bind the executor or administrator, though not named therein, and that death does not absolve a man from his engagements. There is an exception, however, to this general rule, equally well established, that in contracts requiring the continued existence of a given person or thing a condition is implied that the impossibility of fulfillment arising out of the death of the person or destruction of the thing shall excuse the performance. Stagg v. Land Co., 171 N. C. 583, 89 S. E. 47; Yerrington v. Greene, 7 R. I. 589, 84 Am. Dec. 578; Mendenhall v. Davis, 52 Wash. 169, 100 Pac. 336, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.), 914, 17 Ann. Cas. 179, and note.

[2] The line of demarcation between a personal contract, which is terminated by death, and one which the personal representatives of the deceased are required to fulfill, is not very clearly defined. The reasons for this become obvious and apparent upon a moment's reflection. Two elements which enter into the making of a contract, namely, the intention and understanding of the parties, are not subject to any fixed standard of "weights and measures." They are invisible and intangible things, variable with time and place, and undeterminable by any constant or set formula. Hence no hard and fast rule can be established for their ascertainment. To be sure, in the broad outlines certain contracts are not difficult of classification. Those of a strictly personal nature, involving particular personal skill or taste—such as a contract of an author to write a book, an artist to paint a picture, a sculptor to carve a piece of statuary, a singer to give a concert, and a promise to marry—are personal contracts and die with the person. Death makes the performance of such contracts impossible, and, indeed, removes the main object and inducement for the agreement. Executors and administrators are unable to perform such contracts, and the estate of the deceased cannot be held liable in damages by reason of the failure to complete them. Ordinarily contracts not falling under this exception come under the general rule, and death does not excuse performance. 13 C. J. 643 et seq.

"The true question is whether the contract, properly construed, requires a continuance of the promised action beyond the lifetime of the promisor. It is the same question, and is to be answered in the same way, as if the promisor himself were alive for purposes of being sued, but dead for the purposes of performance." Drummond v. Crane, 159 Mass. 577, 35 N. E. 90, 23 L. R. A. 707, 38 Am. St. Rep. 460.

On the other hand, the parties, by express terms, may exclude substituted performance. But there is a twilight zone in which, by reason of the ambiguity of some contracts, the intention of the parties must become the determining factor. The facts and circumstances of each particular case should be taken into consideration in determining whether the contract is purely personal in its nature, and therefore terminated by death, or one which the personal representatives can complete as well as the deceased could have done, had he lived. As said in Siler v. Gray, 86 N. C. 566:

"The general rule unquestionably is that the personal representatives of a party are bound to perform all his contracts, whether specially named in them or not, or else make compensation for their nonperformance out of his estate. But to this there is the exception, as well established as the rule itself, of all such contracts as require something to be done by the party himself in person."

[3] Assuming such to be the law, whether a given case falls under the general rule, or the exception, must depend upon the intention of the parties; for, at last, it is in every case purely a question of their understanding and agreement. Steamboat Co. v. Transportation Co., 166 N. C. 582, 82 S. E. 954; Railroad v. Railroad, 147 N. C. 368, 61 S. E. 185, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 223, 125 Am. St. Rep. 550, 15 Ann. Cas. 363.

[4] Viewing the contract between the parties here presented in light of the foregoing principles, we see nothing which would take it out of the general rule. Its terms are clear and unambiguous. It may be performed by the administrator, or he may secure others to do it, as well as the deceased could have done had he not been killed. The parties have agreed unconditionally, and this is the law of contracts voluntarily assumed. Clancy v. Overman, 18 N. C. 402.

[5, 6] Of course, where the personal representatives of the deceased are able to do so and in good faith offer to complete the contract, and the other party refuses to accept such offer and declines to permit the personal representatives to proceed, such would relieve them from further performance. They would be entitled then to an accounting and to recover as upon a quantum meruit. Whitlock v. Lumber Co., 145 N. C. 120, 58 S. E.

909, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1214; Navigation Co. v. Wilcox, 52 N. C. 481, and Buffkin v. Baird, 73 N. C. 283. Again, the surviving party may abandon the contract and thus forfeit his right to call upon the personal representatives of the party to continue with the agreement. In such case, he could not hold the estate liable for damages occasioned by his own effort to fulfill the contract. Harwood v. Shoe, 141 N. C. 161, 53 S. E. 616; Harris v. Wright, 118 N. C. 422, 24 S. E. 751.

[7] The record discloses no evidence, as offered by the defendant, tending to support its first counterclaim relating to alleged overpayments. In the absence of any evidence to support an allegation, the court would be justified in giving a peremptory instruction. But such evidence, if any, we think, would be competent to show payments made under a misapprehension or mistake of fact, following the doctrine announced in Simms v. Vick, 151 N. C. 78, 65 S. E. 621, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 517, 18 Ann. Cas. 669, and Worth v. Stewart, 122 N. C. 258, 29 S. E. 579.

With the case going back for a new trial, we refrain from further comment, as we do not care to prejudge the rights of the parties prior to a development of all the evidence.
New trial.

CLARK v. BLAND et al. (No. 97.)

1. Corporations ⇨423—Liable for malicious torts of agents.

Corporations may be held liable for the malicious and willful as well as negligent torts of their agents and employees when committed in the course of and scope of their employment, and also for injuries inflicted in breach of some duty owing directly from the company to the injured person growing out of the conditions existent between them.

2. Trial ⇨165—Evidence of plaintiff accepted as true on motion to nonsuit.

On motion to nonsuit the evidence which makes in favor of plaintiff's claim must be accepted as true and construed in the light most favorable to him.

3. Carriers ⇨320(2)—Whether assaulted person was passenger held for jury.

In an action against a railroad for an assault and battery by employee in railroad office, whether plaintiff was, at the time of the assault, a passenger of defendant railway, held for the jury.

4. Carriers ⇨283(3)—Carrier liable to passenger for assault by servant.

A railroad was liable for assault by an employee upon a passenger at railroad station, though the assault was made because employee believed the passenger had told certain persons the employee had been peddling whisky on the streets.

5. Carriers ⇨247(2)—Person going to station to await arrival of train a "passenger."

One who goes to a railroad station to take the next train in a reasonable time before the time for the arrival of the train is a passenger, though he has not purchased a ticket, and the duties imposed by the relation of carrier and passenger are obligatory on the railroad.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Passenger.]

6. Carriers ⇨247(2)—Custom not to open ticket window until 15 minutes before train time not controlling on question whether person entering station prior thereto was passenger.

Custom not to open ticket window until 15 minutes before scheduled time for train, while evidential, was not controlling on question whether a person entering the station before such time and within a reasonable time before the departure of the train was a passenger in an action against the railroad for assault and battery.

7. Carriers ⇨319(2)—Punitive damages awarded for willful attack by employé on passenger.

When injuries are inflicted on a passenger by an employee of a railroad willfully and of malice or under circumstances of insult, rudeness, and oppression, punitive damages may be awarded in the discretion of the jury.

8. Carriers ⇨283(3)—Carrier liable for assault on passenger off premises.

If one is waiting for a train and is called off of the carrier's premises by an employee of the railroad to a point a short distance away and for the purpose of a personal difficulty, and is there assaulted and beaten, the same rules apply as would apply if the assault takes place on the premises of the railroad; the intending passenger having no knowledge or warning of the employee's wrongful purpose.

Appeal from Superior Court, Halifax County; W. A. Devin, Judge.

Action by H. N. Clark against H. G. Bland and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and certain defendants appeal. No error.

The action is to recover damages for an unlawful and wrongful assault and battery on plaintiff by defendant H. G. Bland, and in which plaintiff seeks to hold defendant company liable by reason of the fact that plaintiff was a passenger of defendant road, and that Bland was an employee of the company at the time, and that the assault was made and injuries inflicted under circumstances that rendered the company, etc., responsible for his wrongful conduct. There was denial of liability on the part of the company and Director General, who insisted that Bland, while an employee, was not on duty at the time and place of the occurrence, and that these defendants were in no way liable for his acts. On issues submitted the jury rendered the following verdict:

"(1) Did the defendant Bland unlawfully assault the plaintiff as alleged? Answer: Yes.

"(2) Did the defendants Atlantic Coast Line Railroad and Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, through their agent, unlawfully assault the plaintiff as alleged? Answer: Yes.

"(3) What damages, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover therefor? Answer: $2,250."

Judgment on verdict for plaintiff, and defendants other than Bland excepted and appealed.

F. S. Spruill, of Rocky Mount, R. C. Dunn, of Enfield, and F. E. Winslow, of Rocky Mount, for appellants.

J. Crawford Biggs, of Raleigh, D. M. Clark, of Greenville, and Daniel & Daniel, for appellee.

HOKE, J. [1] It is now fully recognized that corporations may be held liable for the malicious and willful as well as negligent torts of their agents and employees, when committed in the course of and scope of their employment, and also for injuries inflicted in breach of some duty owing directly from the company to the injured person growing out of the conditions existent between them; an instance of this last rule of liability being not infrequently presented from the relationship of carrier and passenger. Cotton v. Fisheries Product Co., 177 N. C. 56-59, 97 S. E. 712, citing Cooper v. Railroad, 170 N. C. 490, 87 S. E. 322; Seward v. Railroad, 159 N. C. 241, 75 S. E. 34; Sawyer v. Railroad, 142 N. C. 1, 54 S. E. 793, 115 Am. St. Rep. 716, 9 Ann. Cas. 440; Jackson v. Telegraph Co., 139 N. C. 347, 51 S. E. 1015, 70 L. R. A. 738; Hussey v. Railroad, 98 N. C. 34, 3 S. E. 923, 2 Am. St. Rep. 312; Bank v. Graham, 100 U. S. 699, 25 L. Ed. 750; Railroad v. Quigley, 62 U. S. (21 How.) 202, 16 L. Ed. 73; Palmer v. Railroad, 133 N. Y. 261, 30 N. E. 1001, 16 L. R. A. 136, 28 Am. St. Rep. 632; Maynard v. Fireman's Fund Insurance Co., 34 Cal. 48, 91 Am. Dec. 672.

It is on this ground that liability has been fixed on appellants in the case before us, and we find no good reason for disturbing the results of the trial. It is objected to the validity of plaintiff's recovery that the court refused defendants' motion of nonsuit, and this principally on the ground that there is no evidence of legal significance that the relationship of carrier and passenger existed between the parties at the time; second, that there was error in allowing the jury to consider the question of punitive damages. But in our opinion neither position can be maintained. On the motion to nonsuit, there was evidence on the part of plaintiff tending to show that on March 27, 1919, plaintiff went to the railroad station of defendant company at Norfleet, N. C., for the purpose of becoming a passenger on the next train of the company going towards Kelford, the next station on the road; that plaintiff went to the station, which was then open for reception of passengers, about an hour before schedule time, which was 10:20 a. m.; that defendant Bland and one O. W. Parker were in the regular railroad office at the time, apparently engaged in some official work; that plaintiff inquired for an express package he was expecting, and after and while waiting for the ticket window to open, which was usually done about 15 minutes before the arrival of trains, plaintiff stepped into station yard about five feet from office, and while there Bland and Parker came out and passed plaintiff going towards the store of Moses Moore, which abutted on the station premises; as they passed, Parker asked plaintiff to come on and have a drink; that soon Bland, while standing about 40 steps away in the direction of the store and in the station yard, called to plaintiff to "come over here, I would like to speak to you"; plaintiff went to him, when Bland asked plaintiff why he had told that Bland was selling whisky; plaintiff replied that he didn't recall having said anything about that; Bland said to plaintiff, "Didn't you tell Capt. Haley that I had been peddling whisky on the streets of Kelford?" Plaintiff replied, "No," when Bland called him a God damned liar and picked up a heavy stick three feet long and hit plaintiff several times with it over head, and shoulders, etc.; that plaintiff tried to make defense, but was too much stunned and crippled by the blows with the stick; that plaintiff went up on platform of the store to get something to protect himself, and Bland followed; they clinched and fell off the porch; that during the occurrence, Bland, who was at the time station agent of the company at Norfleet, continued to curse and abuse plaintiff and in the assault inflicted protracted and painful injuries upon him.

[2-4] Considering this statement under the rule which uniformly prevails in this jurisdiction that on motion to nonsuit the evidence which makes in favor of plaintiff's claim must be accepted as true, and construed in the light most favorable to him (Lamb v. Railroad, 179 N. C. 619, 103 S. E. 440, and authorities cited), the facts clearly permit the inference that plaintiff was a passenger of defendant company on this occasion, and that under the circumstances presented the company is liable for the misconduct of Bland, their agent and codefendant.

[5] There was evidence on the part of defendant tending to show that plaintiff had come to the station and made inquiry of its agent at or near 8 in the morning, more than two hours before the schedule time for the train, that plaintiff had said nothing of his purpose of becoming passenger, and that he knew of the custom not to open the ticket window till 15 minutes before schedule time for train. Defendant's evidence further tended to show that Bland was not the agent at Norfleet at this time, but had surrendered the keep and control of the station the afternoon before to O. W. Parker, the new man at Norfleet, and with view of becoming agent at Kelford the next station on the line, and that, if Bland was at or about the station on that occasion at all that day, he was there only for the purpose of assisting Parker, the new agent, to take up the work, and that he was otherwise without authority or duty at Norfleet, and further that the fight was not on the company's premises proper, but commenced on the platform of the store. On the motion to nonsuit this testimony coming from defendant could not properly be considered, and, as to plaintiff's being a passenger, the question on the conflicting testimony was submitted to the jury, with the instruction, among other things, that—

"If plaintiff, Clark, went to said railroad at Norfleet upon this occasion to take the next train for Kelford, and went to the station at Norfleet in a reasonable time before the time for the arrival of the train, though he had not purchased a ticket, he is in contemplation of law a passenger, and the duties imposed by the relation of carrier and passenger would be obligatory on the railroad," etc.

—a position that is fully supported by the decided cases with us and by the authorities generally on the subject. Thomas v. Railroad, 173 N. C. 494, 92 S. E. 321; Seawell v. Railroad, 132 N. C. 356-359, 44 S. E. 610; Tillett v. Railroad, 115 N. C. 665, 20 S. E. 480; Hansley v. Railroad, 115 N. C. 603, 20 S. E. 528, 32 L. R. A. 543, 44 Am. St. Rep. 474; Kidwell v. Chesapeake & Ohio R. R., 71 W. Va. 664, 77 S. E. 285, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 999; 4 Elliott on Railroads (2d Ed.) § 1579; 4 R. O. L. pp. 1029, 1030, title Carriers, § 489.

[6, 7] In a note to the Kidwell Case, reported also in 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) section IV, at page 999, it is said to be the general rule sustained by the great weight of authority that a person who goes to a railroad station with the intention of taking the next train is in contemplation of law a passenger, provided his coming is in a reasonable time before the departure of the train, citing numerous cases. And in 4 Elliott the author says:

"A person may become a passenger before he has entered the train or vehicle of the carrier. We think it safe to say that a person becomes a passenger when, intending to take passage, he enters a place provided for the reception of passengers, as a depot, waiting room, or the like, at a time when such place is open for the reception of persons intending to take passage on the train of the company."

The evidence as to a custom not to open the ticket window until 15 minutes before schedule time for trains, while evidential, is not at all controlling on the question whether the person enters the station "open for his reception, and within a reasonable time before the departure of his train." The jury under a correct charge having accepted the view that the relationship of carrier and passenger existed between plaintiff and defendant company, the authorities are very generally to the effect that the corporation is held to a high degree of care in protecting plaintiff from violence and insult, and may be held liable for injuries inflicted in breach of this duty on the part of their employees and of others also which it could have prevented in the reasonable and proper performance of their duty. Lanier v. Pullman Co., 180 N. C. 406, 105 S. E. 21; Williams v. Gill, 122 N. C. 967, 29 S. E. 879; Daniel v. Railroad Co., 117 N. C. 592, 23 S. E. 327, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 485; White v. Railroad Co., 115 N. C. 631, 20 S. E. 191, 44 Am. St. Rep. 489; Britton v. Railroad Co., 88 N. C. 536, 43 Am. Rep. 749; Birmingham, etc., v. Railroad Co., 130 Ala. 334, 30 South. 456, 54 L. R. A. 752, 89 Am. St. Rep. 43. And these and many other cases in this jurisdiction hold that, when such injuries are inflicted willfully and of malice or under circumstances of insult, rudeness, and oppression, punitive damages may be awarded in the discretion of the jury. Lanier v. Pullman Co., supra; Huffman v. Railroad, 163 N. C. 171, 79 S. E. 307; Williams v. Railroad, 144 N. C. 498, 57 S. E. 216, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 191, 12 Ann. Cas. 1000; Hutchinson v. Railroad, 140 N. C. 123, 52 S. E. 263, 6 Ann. Cas. 22; Strother v. Railroad, 123 N. C. 197, 31 S. E. 386.

[8] Appellants except further that, as to the exact point where the difficulty took place, the court instructed the jury in effect that—

"If plaintiff, being on the railroad premises and on business with the company as claimed, was called off by an employee of the railroad to a point a short distance away and for the purpose of a personal difficulty, and was there assaulted and beaten, the same rules would apply whether the point at which the assault took place was just on or off the premises of the company."

But we think this is undoubtedly a correct ruling. The evidence is clearly to the effect that either Bland was the company's agent at the station, or, being an employee of the company, he was there assisting the new agent in his duties. This last position seems to be recognized in the brief of counsel, and in such case he would be charged in part with extending to plaintiff the protection owing to him as a passenger, and under such circumstance, if he called plaintiff from the premises for the purpose of assaulting him and did assault him as claimed just beyond the line, the breach of duty might well be considered as commencing at the time of the call. Assuredly so if the plaintiff had no notice or warning of the agent's wrongful purpose, and in any event, on the facts presented, plaintiff would still be within the sphere of protection owing to him as the company's passenger at the time; for the principle by no means requires that the passenger should remain continuously in the company's vehicles nor on the immediate premises. Wallace v. Rail- road, 174 N. C. 174, 93 S. E. 731; Palmer v. Railroad, 131 N. C. 250, 42 S. E. 604. In this last case the present Chief Justice states the principle applicable as follows:

"If plaintiff had been a passenger, or his passage had not been fully terminated, or if, when he left his car at his destination, the employee had immediately followed the passenger up and assaulted him, the defendant concedes that there would be no question as to the liability of the company"—citing Daniel v. Railroad, 117 N. C. 592, 23 S. E. 327, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 485; Williams v. Gill, 122 N. C. 967, 29 S. E. 879; Strother v. Railroad, 123 N. C. 197, 31 S. E. 386.

We were referred by counsel to the case of Stewart v. Lumber Co., 146 N. C. 47, 59 S. E. 545, as an authority against the award of punitive damages in the present instance, but we do not so consider it. That was a case where a traveler along the highway sought to impose liability on the company by reason of the willful wrong of its engineer in blowing the engine whistle for the purpose of frightening plaintiff's mule, causing it to run away and injure plaintiff. It will be noted that plaintiff there was an outsider or third person, and the breach of an independent duty owing directly from the company to claimant was in no way presented or involved. The claim depended entirely on principles of agency or the relationship of master and servant alone. The distinction adverted to is pointed out in Sawyer's Case, 142 N. C. 1, 54 S. E. 793, 115 Am. St. Rep. 716, 9 Ann. Cas. 440, as follows:

"According to the varying facts of different cases, the question of fixing responsibility on corporations by reason of the tortious acts of their servants and agents is sometimes made to depend exclusively on their relationship as agents or employees of the company, and sometimes the facts present an additional element and involve some independent duty which the corporation may owe directly to * * * the injured or complaining party."

In our case this additional element is present, the suit being for a breach of duty growing out of the relationship of carrier and passenger, and by an agent of the company charged in part with performance of the duty of protection and care of plaintiff, and in such case the authorities in this jurisdiction uphold the award of punitive damages where, as stated, the wrong is done willfully and under circumstances of insult, rudeness, or oppression. Thus in Huffman v. Railroad, supra, it was held:

"That defendant R. R. Co. was liable in punitive damages for willful and malicious abuse of a female passenger, traveling on his train, occasioned by her not having purchased a ticket for a nine year old child traveling with her."

In Williams v. Railroad, 144 N. C. 498, 57 S. E. 216, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 191, 12 Ann. Cas. 1000:

"That defendant company is liable for punitive in addition to compensatory damages for willful refusal to stop a train at a flag station," etc.

And in Hutchinson v. Railroad:

That in a question of punitive damages the court "correctly instructed the jury that, if the conductor maliciously or with wanton recklessness carried [plaintiff] by her station, or if he maliciously or wantonly mistreated and humiliated her, [they] could assess punitive damages."

And so here it was proper to submit the question of punitive damages to the jury on evidence tending to show an unlawful and malicious assault on plaintiff, who was on the premises of defendant as a passenger, and by an agent or assistant agent of the company, who was charged in part with the duty of the protection due plaintiff from the company as its passenger.

We were also cited to Lake Shore, etc. R. v. Prentice, 147 U. S. 101, 13 Sup. Ct. 261, 37 L. Ed. 97, where it was held that a corporation is not liable to exemplary or punitive damages for a willful or malicious tort on the part of its employee or agent unless such tort was directly authorized or ratified by the company. It is recognized, however, in that opinion that in many of the states the liability of corporations for punitive damages is not so restricted, and on the facts of this record the rule is clearly otherwise in this jurisdiction.

On careful consideration, we find no error in the record, and are of opinion that the judgment for plaintiff establishing liability of defendant company should be affirmed.

No error.

JACKSON v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO. et al. (No. 291.)

1. Railroads ⇨346(5)—Presumption against contributory negligence.

Even in the absence of C. S. § 523, making contributory negligence an affirmative defense, the presumption is against contributory negligence, so that the burden is clearly on a railroad to prove that an automobile driver was contributorily negligent in attempting to cross the track.

2. Railroads ⇨350(18)—Failure to stop before crossing track not contributory negligence as matter of law.

The failure of an automobile driver to come to a complete stop before entering upon a railroad crossing is not contributory negligence as a matter of law, but is a circumstance to be considered by the jury in determining whether he exercised due care under the conditions.

3. Railroads ⇨330(3)—Driver with obstructed view may rely on hearing at crossing.

Where the view of an automobile driver approaching a railroad crossing is obstructed, he may rely on his sense of hearing, and if he listens, and is induced to enter upon the crossing because of the negligent failure of the company to give the ordinary signals, he can recover for injuries.

4. Railroads ⇨312(13)—Failure to give signals negligence.

The failure of a railroad engineer to blow his whistle or ring a bell at a reasonable distance from a highway crossing, to warn those approaching the crossing, from which his train was hidden, is negligence per se.

5. Railroads ⇨350(22)—Automobile driver's contributory negligence held question for jury.

Evidence that the driver of an automobile could not see along the track until he came within 11 feet of the rail, that he was proceeding at not more than 10 miles an hour, and that no crossing signal was sounded by the train which struck him, which was going 60 miles an hour, held to warrant submission to the jury of the issue of contributory negligence.

6. Trial ⇨178—In directing verdict for defendant, evidence must be considered most favorably to plaintiff.

In determining whether defendant was entitled to a directed verdict, the evidence must be taken in the aspect most favorable to the plaintiff, though there was evidence from which the jury could have reached a different conclusion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Robeson County; Gulon, Judge.

Action by S. M. Jackson, administrator of A. K. Jackson, against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, for the death of plaintiff's intestate. From a judgment for defendants, on a verdict finding, as directed by the court, that defendants were negligent, also finding from the evidence that plaintiff's intestate was contributorily negligent, and that plaintiff was not entitled to recover damages, both parties appeal. Error, and new trial granted.

The plaintiff's intestate was a farmer, who was killed at a railroad crossing about a quarter of a mile from his house as he was returning home in his automobile. He was struck by the defendant's north-bound express train at a point where the railroad track crosses the public road at 1½ miles north of the station at Bule's. In approaching this crossing for a distance of several hundred yards the railroad and the public road run nearly parallel, gradually converging into a "V," and at a point about 114 feet from the crossing the public road makes a sharp turn and approaches the railroad at a right angle and through a cut about 11 feet deep. The railroad approaches the crossing through a cut of about the same depth.

The uncontradicted evidence is that, after turning this curve, 114½ feet from the defendant's track, it was impossible to see the train running north until within 10 feet of the track. The evidence shows that, when the plaintiff's intestate turned the curve at that point and started through the cut, the train was 854 feet from the crossing. The railroad cut extended 250 yards in that direction. The evidence also shows that between the track and the public road there was a very heavy growth of young pine timber, bushes, shrubbery, and other undergrowth, and that this, together with the fact that the track is constructed through a cut 11 feet deep, obstructed the vision of the plaintiff's intestate in seeing the approach of the north-bound train, which was running late and at a high rate of speed, estimated at 60 miles an hour or more by the railroad employees and other witnesses.

Practically all the witnesses, including the defendant's section foreman and his helpers, testified that the engineer did not blow for the crossing, nor did he ring the bell or give any other signal. The section foreman who reported the collision indicated in his report to the company, made on the day the deceased was killed, that no signal was given. One witness, Patterson, testified that, when he saw the smoke from the defendant's engine, it was 854 feet from the crossing, according to measurements afterwards made, and at the same instant he saw plaintiff's intestate turn the curve and start through the cut to the crossing. He was traveling slowly, about 8 or 10 miles an hour. He was not seen again until after the train had passed, when he was found crushed and wounded, having been struck and thrown about 35 feet by the defendant's train. He died about 10 o'clock p. m. of the same day in a hospital in Fayetteville.

Russell & Weatherspoon, of Laurinburg, and McIntyre, Lawrence & Proctor and Johnson & Johnson, all of Lumberton, for plaintiff.

McLean, Varser, McLean & Stacy, of Lumberton, and G. B. Patterson, of Maxton, for defendants.

CLARK, C. J. The court submitted three issues, as follows: (1) Was plaintiff's intestate killed through the negligence of the defendant as alleged in the complaint? (2) If so, did plaintiff's intestate, by his own negligence, contribute to his injury and death? (3) What damages, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover?

The court instructed the jury that, if they believed all the evidence and found the facts to be as testified, they would answer the second issue "Yes," and the third issue "No," and they responded accordingly. The plaintiff excepted and appealed. The court also instructed the jury to answer the first issue "Yes," to which the defendant excepted and appealed.

[1] There was no evidence that the plaintiff's intestate did not look and listen. There was evidence from which the defendant contends the jury should so find. There is evidence from which the jury could find to the contrary. There is no presumption in favor of contributory negligence, and the burden was on the defendant to prove it. In Norton v. Railroad, 122 N. C. 928, 29 S. E. 892, it is said:

"Where there is no evidence of the fact, the presumption is against contributory negligence, even in the absence of any statute, like our own, making it a matter of affirmative defense. Railroad v. Gentry, 163 U. S. 353, 366; Railroad v. Griffith, 159 U. S. 603, 609."

[2] It cannot be declared, as a matter of law, that failure to come to a complete stop before entering upon a railroad crossing is contributory negligence. In Perry v. Railroad, 180 N. C. 290, 104 S. E. 673, the court said:

"Failure to stop before crossing a railroad track cannot be declared to be contributory negligence as a matter of law, but it should be considered by the jury in connection with the surrounding circumstances in determining whether the party was exercising the care of one of ordinary prudence."

[3] In Johnson v. Railroad, 163 N. C. 442, 79 S. E. 694, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 598, the court uses the following language:

"Defendant requested the court to enter a judgment of nonsuit upon the evidence, as plaintiff's intestate was guilty of such contributory negligence in driving upon the crossing, without looking or listening, as barred his recovery. The judge could not have done so without deciding an issue of fact, which he is forbidden to do, that being the function of the jury. Pell's Reversal, § 535, and cases cited in note. The evidence favorable to defendant's view of the case may be ever so strong and persuasive, but if there is a conflict of testimony it must be left to the jury, and they must find the facts."

In Shepard v. Railroad, 166 N. C. 544, 82 S. E. 874, the court through Mr. Justice Hoke, laid down the rule as follows:

"Where the view is obstructed, a traveler may ordinarily rely upon his sense of hearing, and if he does listen, and is induced to enter on a public crossing because of the negligent failure of the company to give the ordinary signals, this will usually be attributed to the failure of the company to warn the traveler of the danger, and not imputed to him for contributory negligence."

In Hinkle v. Railroad, 109 N. C. 472, 13 S. E. 884, 26 Am. St. Rep. 581, substantially the same rule is stated in the following language:

"Where the injured person would not have gone on the crossing, but for the negligence of the engineer in failing to give the proper signal, the railway company will be held liable for the damages resulting from a collision, although the party injured may have been careless in exposing himself."

[4] The uncontradicted evidence tended to show that the train which struck the plaintiff's intestate was running late and at a speed of about 60 miles an hour; that there was a whistle post about 250 to 300 yards south of the crossing, put there for the purpose of indicating to the engineer that the whistle should be blown for the crossing and the bell rung; that the defendant's foreman and a crew of men were standing near the whistle post at the time the train passed, having been forced to remove a hand car from the track to allow the train to pass; and that no signal whatsoever was given. About one-half dozen witnesses testified that they were in close proximity to the place where the train should have blown and carefully observed that no signal was given, some of these witnesses being farmers residing in the neighborhood and some of them employees of the railroad company.

In Jenkins v. Railroad, 155 N. C. 203, 71 S. E. 213, the court said:

"It is a railroad engineer's duty to blow his whistle or ring his bell at a reasonable distance from a crossing, to warn those approaching the crossing with a view of passing over the tracks."

In Hinkle v. Railroad, 109 N. C. 472, 13 S. E. 884, 26 Am. St. Rep. 581, it was also said:

"For a moving train to omit to give, in a reasonable time, some signal when approaching a highway from which a train is hidden by an embankment, cut, or curve, is negligence per se."

[5] The defendant put on no evidence. The jury could have found directly, or by inference from the evidence taken in its most favorable aspect to the plaintiff, the following state of facts: That the space between the county road and the railroad had so thickly grown up in trees, gum bushes, alder bushes, gum trees, pine bushes, and pine trees that the view of the deceased was completely obscured; that because of such obscurity, together with the screen afforded by the embankment on the defendant's right of way, the deceased could not see the approach of the train until within 11 feet of the T-iron at the crossing; that the deceased was carefully driving his automobile along the public highway, approaching the crossing at a speed of not more than 8 or 10 miles an hour; that the deceased knew of the crossing, and was driving slowly and carefully for the purpose of effecting a safe crossing, no other conclusion being reasonably assignable for the slow speed of his machine, and it being presumed that he was conducting himself as an ordinarily prudent man; that the deceased, while purposing to cross in safety, considered the danger and looked and listened for some warning or signal of the approach of the train, and hence reduced the speed of his automobile as additional precaution; that those in charge of defendant's train, which was running at not less than 60 miles an hour, failed and neglected to ring the bell or blow the whistle as a warning to the deceased of its approach to the said crossing; that the failure to give such warning lulled the deceased into the belief that no train was near, and that he could cross in safety, and that, so believing, he attempted to drive over the crossing, and while so doing was fatally injured; and the jury could find that the conduct of the deceased, under all the facts and circumstances, was as an ordinarily prudent man would have conducted himself under similar circumstances, and, being lulled into a state of security by the negligent conduct of the defendant, the deceased did not have the time or opportunity to save himself after passing within the danger zone.

[6] It is true there was evidence from which the jury could have reached a different conclusion upon some of the statements in this recital; but as the evidence must be taken in the most favorable aspect to the plaintiff in which the jury could have considered and found it, it was error to direct a verdict against the plaintiff on the second issue, especially as the burden was upon the defendant to prove the affirmative on that issue. C. S. § 523, and cases there cited. Among the most recent cases on the subject, directly in point are Penninger v. Railroad, 170 N. C. 473, 87 S. E. 249; Perry v. Railroad, 180 N. C. 290, 104 S. E. 673; Kimbrough v. Hines, 180 N. C. 274, 104 S. E. 684.

There being error as to the instructions on the second issue, it is unnecessary to continue the discussion, and the case will be sent back for a new trial on all the issues. Error.

WATTS v. LENOIR & BLOWING ROCK TURNPIKE CO. (No. 473.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 23, 1921.)

1. Statutes ~~§~~80(2), 97(2)—Statute amending law as to turnpike company maintaining tollgate held invalid as special legislation.

Pub. Loc. & Priv. Laws Ex. Sess. 1920, c. 144, amending Pub. Loc. Laws 1911, c. 62, by providing that the Lenoir & Blowing Rock Turnpike Company shall not maintain a tollgate nearer than eight miles from Lenoir, held invalid as special legislation, in view of Pub. Laws 1903, c. 474, and Const. art. 11, § 29, and article 8, § 1.

2. Constitutional law ~~§~~101—Turnpikes and toll roads ~~§~~3—Statute amending charter of turnpike company invalid as impairing vested rights.

Pub. Loc. & Priv. Laws Ex. Sess. 1920, c. 144, providing that the Lenoir & Blowing Rock Turnpike Company shall not maintain a tollgate nearer than eight miles from Lenoir, is invalid as impairing vested property rights in view of Pub. Laws 1903, c. 474, and Pub. Loc. Laws 1911, c. 62.

3. Statutes ~~§~~67—Amendment to Constitution held to withdraw from General Assembly power to create, extend, or amend charters by special enactment.

Except for purpose of absolute repeal, which is retained throughout as essential to the proper exercise and enforcement of the police powers of government, and except also in the instances expressly designated in the section of "corporations for charitable, educational, penal or reformatory purposes that are to be and remain under the patronage and control of the state," Const. art. 8, § 1, withdraws from the General Assembly any and all power by special enactments to create, extend, alter, or amend the charter of all private business corporations, and all quasi public corporations, such as railroads, incorporated turnpike or toll roads, bridge companies, and the like, and also those corporations which, while having at times and to some extent powers appertaining to government, are in fact and in truth business corporations for the purpose principally of promoting private interests.

Appeal from Superior Court, Caldwell County; Harding, Judge.

Action by J. W. Watts against the Lenoir & Blowing Rock Turnpike Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Civil action is instituted by plaintiff, a taxpayer, citizen, and resident of Caldwell county, living on the line of the defendant's road within the prescribed limits, and necessarily paying toll for travel thereon, in behalf of himself and all others in like case, and also a stockholder of defendant company, to compel defendant, an incorporated turnpike company, from maintaining tollgates, and enforcing the collection of toll on that portion of the road from Lenoir, N. C., eight miles out towards and beyond the town of Patterson, N. C.

On the pleadings, affidavits, and evidence offered the court found the facts and entered judgment denying relief in terms as follows:

"This cause coming on to be heard before me at chambers in Marion, N. C., by agreement of the parties plaintiff and defendant, and being heard upon the pleadings, exhibits, and affidavits offered as evidence in the case and admissions made by counsel at the argument, the court finds the following facts:

"(1) That in the year 1903 the General Assembly of North Carolina passed an act authorizing the board of county commissioners of Caldwell county to lease, or otherwise contract and dispose of, to any turnpike company or person, a stretch of road $6\frac{1}{2}$ to 7 miles in length, and leading from Lenoir to the ford of the Yadkin river at the old Baptist and Advent churches. Reference to said act is hereby had. See chapter 474 of Public Laws of 1903.

"(2) That on the 6th day of September, 1901, the board of county commissioners of Caldwell county, under and by virtue of authority contained in the act referred to, leased to the Lenoir & Blowing Rock Turnpike Company, a corporation which had been chartered and organized under the laws of North Carolina, the said stretch of road mentioned in finding of fact No. 1 for the term of 50 years. A certified copy of lease so made to said turnpike company is on file in the papers in this case, and reference to the same is hereby had as a part of this finding of fact.

"(3) That under said lease said turnpike company immediately took possession of said road, which was then in bad condition, and at once began to improve and repair it, such repairs consisting in laying down of macadam on and along the said road, cutting down the grade, and, where it became necessary, by changing the location of the road for a considerable distance, that is to say built on a new and better grade from the foot of Warrior's Gap on the south side of the foot of said gap to the north side a new road for some distance entailing the expenditure of a large sum of money extending over a period from the date of the lease up to the present time, which would not be less than from $40,000 to $50,000 so expended.

"(4) That, after said Lenoir & Blowing Rock Turnpike Company took over the said stretch of road, it maintained a tollgate over the same and has continued to do so up to the present time, collecting such tolls as it was authorized to collect from subjects of toll passing over said road.

"(5) That during the year 1911 the General Assembly of North Carolina amended the act of 1903 before referred to by permitting the said company to maintain one or more tollgates, and the right to declare dividends, repealing that portion of the act restricting the location of a tollgate and fixing the tolls over said road.

"(6) That on the 28th of January, 1911, the General Assembly of North Carolina passed an act ratifying, confirming, and approving the charter of the Lenoir & Blowing Rock Turnpike Company and all proceedings and acts thereunder, and in pursuance thereof made all such acts valid. Reference is hereby made to said act. Chapter 62, Public Local Laws 1911.

"(7) That the General Assembly of North Carolina at its special session in August, 1920, passed the following act:

"H. B. 466, S. B. 362. An act to amend chapter 62, Public Local Laws, Session one thousand nine hundred and eleven. The General Assembly of North Carolina do enact:

"Section 1. That chapter 62, Public Local Laws of North Carolina, session one thousand nine hundred and eleven, be amended by adding at the end of section three of said chapter, the following:

"The said company shall not be allowed to maintain any tollgates thereon nearer than eight miles from the corporate limits of the town of Lenoir, nor shall it increase its tolls over those charged at present.

"Sec. 2. That this act shall be in force from and after its ratification.

"In the General Assembly read three times and ratified this 26th August, 1920."

"Pub. Loc. & Priv. Laws 1920, c. 144.

"(8) That the charter of the Lenoir & Blowing Rock Turnpike Company provides, among other things, that the company has the right to maintain two or more tollgates at desirable points between Lenoir and Blowing Rock, N. C., and by the amendment before referred to, said act of 1903, one or more tollgates is allowed to be maintained by said company over the stretch of road from Lenoir to the ford of the Yadkin river at the Baptist and Advent churches.

"(9) That the amount of tolls which are taken in from subjects of toll passing over this stretch of road from Lenoir to the ford of the Yadkin river at the Baptist and Advent churches amounts, annually to a large sum, which, together with toll, defendant would be unable to collect on through travel from Lenoir to Blowing Rock, and from Blowing Rock to Lenoir, if its tollgate be moved as required by the act of August, 1920, would entail a loss upon the defendant in tolls of approximately $4,000 to $5,000 per annum.

"(10) And that to maintain and keep in good state of repair, said stretch of road, it will take several thousand dollars a year.

"(11) That the effect of the act of August, 1920, if any, upon the Lenoir & Blowing Rock Turnpike Company, would be to repeal by implication the right of said company to maintain a tollgate between Lenoir and the ford of the Yadkin river at the Baptist and Advent churches, and remove said tollgate about one mile up the mountain from Patterson, N. C., and that, if said company is denied the right to maintain said tollgates as at present located, and to collect tolls from subjects passing over and upon said road, it will entail a loss of several thousand dollars to said company, and said company would not have any revenue from this portion of the road with which to keep up and maintain the same, where travel on said portion originated thereon and went in the direction of Lenoir, N. C., or where the travel originated for points east and concluded before reaching the first gate.

"(12) That, owing to the expenditure of a large sum of money on the part of the Lenoir & Blowing Rock Turnpike Company upon said road, including the purchase of land for a new road bed at Warrior's Gap, making grades, and otherwise improving said road represents a large vested interest of said company.

"(13) That if said tollgate now maintained along the line of said road is required to be taken down, and the company denied the right to collect tolls, the effect of this will be to leave the company without any means derived from this portion of the road with which to keep it up, as set out in paragraph 11 above, but would still leave the company in a position of responsibility to keep up and maintain the same, and be responsible for any liabilities resulting from a failure of the performance of this public duty.

"(14) That, if said tollgate is removed, it will at once open up the road to a portion of the inhabitants of Caldwell county and others to use free this stretch of road, while other persons and subjects of toll living north of the tollgate between Patterson and Blowing Rock would be required to pay toll.

"Upon the foregoing finding of facts, the court is of the opinion that the act of the Legislature passed by the General Assembly of North Carolina, Special Session 1920, before herein referred to, is unconstitutional and void.

"It is therefore considered and adjudged that the relief sought by the plaintiff be, and the same is hereby, denied. It is further adjudged that the plaintiff pay the costs of this action to be taxed by the clerk. By consent this order was signed out of the district on October 27, 1920.

"Wm. F. Harding, Judge Presiding."

Plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Mark Squires and W. C. Newland, both of Lenoir, for appellant.

Council & Yount, of Hickory, Lawrence Wakefield, of Lenoir, and H. P. Grier, of Statesville, for appellee.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). It appears from the legislation and findings of fact pertinent to the inquiry and fully embodied in the judgment that defendant is a corporation having the right under the statutes applicable to construct and maintain a turnpike road from Lenoir, N. C., to Blowing Rock and beyond, to operate stage lines thereon, to charge and collect tolls of travelers using the same, and are allowed to establish two or more tollgates along the route at points considered desirable for the convenient and efficient collection of tolls; that for a part of this route from Lenoir for six miles or more to the ford of the Yadkin river near Patterson, N. C., the road is held by a lease of 50 years' duration from September 8, 1909, said lease being made by the county commissioners under legislative authority expressly conferred by statute, and that soon after taking said lease defendant company at great cost changed the grade and otherwise improved said road, and the tolls of persons living along this portion of the road when traveling to Lenoir and otherwise amounts to several thousand dollars per year; that one of the tollgates established under the laws applicable and necessary to the efficient collection of tolls is on this portion of the route and about four miles from Lenoir; that at the Special Session of 1920 the General Assembly passed a special act purporting to amend chapter 62, Public Local Laws of 1911, the same containing in effect the chartered rights of the company, and which provided that the statute referred to be amended by adding to the end of section 3 the following:

"The said company shall not be allowed to maintain any tollgate thereon nearer than eight miles from the corporate limits of the town of Lenoir, nor shall it increase its tolls over those charged at present."

[1, 2] It further appears that the force and effect of this statute, if the same is allowed to prevail, will be not only to deprive the company of its right to maintain its tollgates as the act of incorporation provided, but in its practical and necessary operation will disenable it from collecting any tolls of persons using only that portion of the road for eight miles out from Lenoir, and, this being true, we are of opinion that the act is void as contrary to certain recent amendments to our Constitution which inhibit any special legislation in amendment of charters of this kind, and that in any event such an amendment would be declared invalid as impairing and destroying vested property rights of the company contrary to the law of the land. In reference to the first proposition it will be recalled that, with the view of relieving the Legislature of the time and work not infrequently expended on local measures which could as well be accomplished under general laws, and allowing time for fuller deliberation on matters of public moment, the General Assembly of 1915 submitted several amendments to the Constitution which were ratified by vote of the people in 1916 and became effective as part of the organic law January 10, 1917. See Laws 1917, p. 7. Kornegay v. Goldsboro,

180 N. C. 441, 105 S. E. 187; Mills v. Commissioners, 175 N. C. 215, 95 S. E. 481; Reade v. Durham, 173 N. C. 668, 92 S. E. 712. In a large number of these designated subjects appearing principally in article 2, § 29, of the Constitution, among them measures which authorize the laying out, opening, altering, maintaining, or discontinuing highways, etc., the General Assembly is expressly prohibited from passing any "local, private or special act or resolution" except to repeal same, and the section provides further that "any local, private or special act or resolution passed in violation of this section shall be void."

In pursuance of the same purpose and policy and by amendment submitted, ratified, and becoming effective at the same time, section 1 of article 8 of the Constitution was stricken out and a new section substituted. This article 8 is entitled "corporations other than municipal," and the original and substituted sections are as follows:

Section 1 as it originally appeared:

"Corporations may be formed under general laws, but shall not be created by special act, except for municipal purposes, and in cases where, in the judgment of the Legislature, the object of the corporations cannot be attained under general laws. All general laws and special acts, passed pursuant to this section, may be altered from time to time, or repealed."

And the substituted section is as follows:

Section 1. Corporations Under General Laws. "No corporation shall be created, nor shall its charter be extended, altered, or amended by special act, except corporations for charitable, educational, penal or reformatory purposes that are to be and remain under the patronage and control of the state; but the General Assembly shall provide by general laws for the chartering and organization of all corporations and for amending, extending, and forfeiture of all charters, except those above permitted by special act. All such general laws and special acts may be altered from time to time or repealed; and the General Assembly may at any time by special act repeal the charter of any corporation."

[3] From a perusal and comparison of the two sections and a proper consideration of authoritative cases in which same have been interpreted and applied, it is clear in our opinion that, except for purposes of absolute repeal which is retained throughout as essential to the proper exercise and enforcement of the police powers of government, and except also in the instances expressly designated in the section of "corporations for charitable, educational, penal or reformatory purposes that are to be and remain under the patronage and control of the state," this section withdraws from the General Assembly any and all power by special enactments to create, extend, alter, or amend the charter of all private business corporations and all quasi public corporations, such as railroads, incorporated turnpike or toll roads, bridge companies and the like, and also those corporations which, while having at times and to some extent powers appertaining to government, are in fact and in truth business corporations for the purpose principally of promoting private interests, as in Southern Assembly v. Palmer, 166 N. C. 75, 82 S. E. 18; Commissioners v. Webb, 160 N. C. 594, 76 S. E. 552.

For reasons stated in the fully considered case of Kornegay v. Goldsboro, 180 N. C. 440, 105 S. E. 187, the inhibitory features and effect of these amendments do not apply or extend to municipal or quasi public corporations such as counties, cities, towns, and other recognized governmental agencies, other than changing the names of cities and towns, and creating or changing lines of townships and schools and districts. Apart from these, however, and as to corporations above stated, special legislation is now prohibited, and the act of 1920 upon which the plaintiff rests his claim for relief, coming directly within the constitutional provision, has been properly held invalid. Kornegay v. Goldsboro, supra; Mills v. Commissioners, 175 N. C. 215, 95 S. E. 481; Board of Education v. Board of Commissioners, 174 N. C. 47, 93 S. E. 383. And, though the attempted amendment in question here had been passed in accord with constitutional methods—that is, under the provisions of a general law—it could not be upheld for the reason that it destroys or impairs vested rights of property. True that, in order to relieve the state and its Legislature from the restrictions imposed by the principles of the Dartmouth College Case, and which were such as to threaten, and in their subsequent application at times interfere with, the efficient administration of well-ordered government, this article 8 in section 1 reserves to the General Assembly the power to amend or repeal all corporate charters, and, while the right of repeal is at all times absolutely with the Legislature, the power of amendment as contained in this reservation is by no means unlimited. In order to its proper exercise, the proposition must be germane or in some way promotive of the principal corporate purpose as contemplated by the charter or in reasonable regulation of its methods, and the decided cases are agreed in the position that an amendment which destroys or sensibly impairs the vested property rights of the company or which attempts to transfer them either to the public or otherwise except under the principles of eminent domain and upon compensation duly made must be held invalid. The principle as stated was fully recognized by this court in Railroad v. Commissioners, 108 N. C. 56, 12 S. E. 952, and is in general accord with the authorities on the subject. Shields v. Ohio, 95 U. S. 319, 24 L. Ed. 357; Commissioners v. Power Co., 104 Mass. 446, 6 Am. Rep. 247; Commonwealth v. Essex Co., 79 Mass. (13 Gray) 239; City of Detroit v. Howard Turnpike Road Co., 43 Mich. 140, 5 N. W. 275; Clark on Corporations, p. 212; 26 R. C. L. p. 1399; Turnpike and Toll Roads, § 5; 10 Cyc. p. 1087.

In Railroad v. Commissioners, supra, it was attempted under guise of an amendment and by a proposed popular vote to divert a municipal subscription made to a designated railroad route, after said subscription had been contracted to another and in part earned, and in disapproving the measure the court held:

"The provision in the Constitution (article 8, § 1) which reserves to the General Assembly the power to alter or repeal acts incorporating companies, does not authorize the enactment of a statute which, under the pretense of protecting a public interest, or exercising an acknowledged police power, appropriates the corporate property to the public use."

In Commonwealth v. Essex, Chief Justice Shaw states the principle as follows:

"The rule to be extracted is this: 'That where, under power in a charter, rights have been acquired and become vested, no amendment or alteration of the charter can take away the property or rights which have become vested under a legitimate exercise of the powers granted.'"

And, speaking generally to the position in Shields v. Ohio, supra, Associate Justice Swayne said:

"The power of alteration * * * is not without limit. The alterations must be reasonable; they must be made in good faith, and be consistent with the scope and object of the act of incorporation. Sheer oppression and wrong cannot be inflicted under the guise of amendment or alteration. Beyond the sphere of the reserved powers, the vested rights of * * * corporations in such cases are surrounded by the same sanction, and are as inviolable as in other cases."

Doubtless, as in other cases of quasi public corporations, who have dedicated their property to public use, the rates of toll through properly constituted agencies may be and are subject to reasonable regulation. It was so held in the last case cited of Shields v. Ohio, and the principle is fully established with us. But such a principle gives no sanction to the case presented here, where the proposed act in its practical operation takes from defendant company, and without compensation, eight miles of its road, in which they have a chartered right to collect tolls, and which they hold by a lease for 50 years under legislative authority, and on which they have done a large amount of costly work.

In any event, therefore, such an act is in clear conflict with the constitutional guarantees protecting vested rights of property, and the judgment of his honor declaring same invalid must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

(181 N. C. 158)

WALLACE et al. v. WALLACE et al.
(No. 113.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 30, 1921.)

1. Deeds ⇐128—Rule in Shelley's Case applies within state.

The rule in Shelley's Case, under which property conveyed for life with limitation to the heirs or the bodily heirs of the life tenant is construed as giving the life tenant a fee simple, and which operates as a rule of property regardless of a contrary intent, applies within the state.

2. Deeds ⇐128—Rule in Shelley's Case not applied where "heirs of the body" meant children.

The rule in Shelley's Case applies only where the words "heirs" or "heirs of the body" were used in the conveyance in their technical sense carrying the estate to the entire line of heirs, and, where there was an ultimate limitation to others after a limitation to the heirs of the body, the latter expression was evidently intended to mean children and the rule did not apply.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Heirs of the Body.]

3. Deeds ⇐129(4)—Conveyance held to give life estate with remainder to children or next of kin; "bodily heirs."

In a deed conveying the estate to grantor's son for life and after his death in fee simple to his bodily heirs if any, and if none to his next of kin, the words "bodily heirs" mean children, so that the son took only a life estate which he could not devise and in which his widow was entitled to no dower, since it was not an estate of inheritance.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Bodily Heirs.]

4. Deeds ⇐132—Remainder to "next of kin" does not permit representation.

In a deed giving a life estate with remainder to bodily heirs or, if none, to next of kin, the words "next of kin" mean those nearest in degree and do not recognize or permit the principle of representation, so that the property vests in the living brothers and sisters on the death of life tenant without issue, to the exclusion of the children of deceased brothers and sisters.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Next of Kin.]

5. Deeds 132—Wife not included in "next of kin."

In a deed conveying the remainder to the next of kin of the life tenant, the expression "next of kin" means nearest of blood kin, so that the wife of the life tenant is not entitled to a share of the remainder.

Appeal from Superior Court, Johnston County; Devin, Judge.

Special proceedings to sell land for partition by W. H. Wallace and others against Ashley Wallace and others and against Selina Wallace as the widow of C. A. Wallace, deceased. From a judgment declaring the defendants other than the widow to be the owners of the property as tenants in common, petitioners and the widow appeal. Affirmed.

Special proceedings to sell land for partition, transferred on answers filed to the superior court and heard on case agreed, before his honor, W. A. Devin, Judge, at September term, 1920, of the superior court of Johnston county. The facts pertinent to the inquiry and his honor's judgment thereon are set forth in the case on appeal as follows:

"It was agreed by all the parties thereto, Abell and Ward representing the petitioners, Wellons and Wellons representing the defendant Selina Wallace, and Parker & Martin representing the defendants other than Selina Wallace, that this case be heard upon the following agreed facts, to wit:

"(1) That C. A. Wallace died without birth of issue, and that Selina Wallace is the widow, and that the petitioners and other defendants, except Selina Wallace, are the brothers and sisters of the said C. A. Wallace, deceased, and the representatives of dead brothers and sisters.

"(2) That the defendants Ashley Wallace, Elisha Wallace, and R. I. Wallace are and were at the time of the death of the said C. A. Wallace his only surviving brothers or sisters; and that all of the petitioners are the representatives and children of deceased brothers and sisters of the said C. A. Wallace; and if the lands described in the petition descend to his heirs at law, then their respective interests are as set out in the petition.

"(3) That on February 25, 1889, Elisha Wallace and wife executed to their son, C. A. Wallace, deceased, a deed for the 62½ acres of land described in the petition, which deed is duly recorded in Book S, No. 5, at page 280 of the office of the register of deeds of Johnston county, a copy of which deed is hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit A,' and made a part thereto.

"(4) On June 27, 1919, the said C. A. Wallace made a last will and testament which was duly probated on August 23, 1919, and is recorded in Will Book No. 6 at page 529 of the office of the clerk of the superior court of Johnston county, a copy of which will is hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit B,' and made a part thereof.

"(5) The petitioners contend that they, together with the defendants, except the said Selina Wallace, widow, are the owners as tenants in common in the aforesaid lands under and by virtue of the aforesaid deed to C. A. Wallace.

"(6) That the defendants Ashley Wallace, Elisha Wallace, and R. I. Wallace, contend that they are the owners of said lands as the only surviving brothers and sisters, and being the next of kin of the said C. A. Wallace, deceased.

"(7) That the defendant Selina Wallace contends that she is the sole owner of said lands by virtue of said will of the said C. A. Wallace, deceased.

"(8) That this agreement of facts shall not interfere with the dower of the said Selina Wallace, provided, if in law she is entitled to the same."

The portion of the deed, Exhibit A, relevant to the inquiry, is as follows:

"This indenture made 25 day of February, 1889, between Elisha Wallace and wife, Penny Wallace, of the county of Johnston and state of North Carolina of the first part, and C. A. Wallace of the same county and state above written of the second part, witnesseth, that we, Elisha Wallace and wife, do, for and in consideration of the love and good will that we have for our son, C. A. Wallace, and for his better support, do by these presents loan and set over unto him, the above said C. A. Wallace, one tract or parcel of land to have and to hold during his natural lifetime, with the exception that we, the above said Elisha Wallace and wife, hold the above said land subject to our support and protection during our natural life. And then after the death of the above said C. A. Wallace, then said land to descend in fee simple to his bodily heirs if any, and if none, to go to his next of kin," etc.

In the will of said C. A. Wallace, Exhibit B, the land is devised to his widow, Selina H. Wallace, for life, and at her death to the children of R. I. Wallace. And upon these facts the court rendered judgment:

"This cause coming on to be heard before Hon. W. A. Devin, Judge Presiding, at the September term, 1920, of the superior court of Johnston county, N. C., and being heard upon the pleadings and an agreed statement of facts, Abell & Ward representing the petitioners, Wellons & Wellons representing the defendant Selina Wallace, Parker & Martin representing the defendants Ashley Wallace, Elisha Wallace, and R. I. Wallace, and S. S. Holt representing the defendant Elisha Wallace, upon the motion of Parker & Martin and S. S. Holt.

"It is considered, ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendants Ashley Wallace, Elisha Wallace, and R. I. Wallace are the sole owners in fee as tenants in common and are entitled to the immediate possession of the lands described in the petition in this cause."

From this judgment the petitioners, the nephews and nieces and the widow, Selina Wallace, appealed.

Ed. S. Abell and Ed. F. Ward, both of Smithfield, for appellants.

Parker & Martin and S. S. Holt, all of Smithfield, for appellees.

HOKE, J. [1] The deed of Elisha Wallace to his son, C. A. Wallace, conveys the land in question to said C. A. Wallace, "to have and to hold during his natural lifetime subject to a life support for the grantors and after the death of C. A. Wallace, the land is to descend in fee simple to his bodily heirs if any and if none to go to his next of kin." The grantee having devised the property to his widow, remainder to the children of R. I. Wallace in fee, it becomes necessary to determine what is the nature and extent of the estate conveyed; the widow insisting that her husband took a fee-simple estate under the rule in Shelley's Case. In numerous decisions of the court, many of them of recent date, this rule has been recognized as existent in this state, and it is held that when a limitation comes under this principle, it operates as a rule of property passing a fee simple both in deeds and wills, and regardless of a contrary intent on the part of the grantor. In Nobles v. Nobles, 177 N. C. 245, 98 S. E. 716, the principle referred to is stated as follows:

"So stated, the rule in question has always been recognized with us, and a perusal of these and other like cases will disclose that when the terms of the instrument by correct interpretation convey the estate in remainder to the heirs of the first taker as a class, 'to take in succession from generation to generation' to the same persons as those who would take as inheritors under our canons of descent and in the same quantity, the principle prevails as a rule of property both in deeds and wills and regardless of any particular intent to the contrary otherwise appearing in the instrument"—citing Crisp v. Biggs, 176 N. C. 1, 96 S. E. 662; Cohoon v. Upton, 174 N. C. 88, 93 S. E. 446; Ford v. McBrayer, 171 N. C. 421, 88 S. E. 736; Robeson v. Moore, 168 N. C. 389, 84 S. E. 351, L. R. A. 1915D, 496; Jones v. Whichard, 163 N. C. 241, 79 S. E. 503; Price v. Griffin, 150 N. C. 523, 64 S. E. 372, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 935; May v. Lewis, 132 N. C. 115, 43 S. E. 550; Nichols v. Gladden, 117 N. C. 497, 23 S. E. 459.

And the same position is approved and impressively illustrated in Leathers v. Gray, 101 N. C. 163, 7 S. E. 658, 9 Am. St. Rep. 30, overruling same case in 96 N. C. 548, 2 S. E. 455, and where the rule as understood and more frequently presented and applied in this jurisdiction is thus stated by Merrimon, Judge:

"That, whenever an ancestor by any gift or conveyance took an estate of freehold (an estate for life), and in the same gift or conveyance an estate is limited either mediately or immediately to 'his heirs,' or to the 'heirs of his body,' as a class, to take in succession as heirs to him, such words are words of limitation of the estate, and convey the inheritance (the whole property) to the ancestor, and they are not words of purchase."

of the rule in Shelley's Case (being contrary as it is to the expressed will of the grantor that the first taker should have a life estate only), the word "heirs" or "heirs of the body" must be taken in their technical sense carrying the estate to the entire line of heirs and at this time and in this jurisdiction to hold as inheritors under our canons of descent, and if it appears by correct construction that these words are not used in that sense, but only as words designating certain persons or confining the inheritance to a restricted class of heirs, the rule does not apply and the ancestor or first taker will be held to have acquired only a life estate according to the express words of the instrument.

Thus in the case of Puckett v. Morgan, 158 N. C. p. 344, 74 S. E. 15, a devise to "M. of certain lands, 'during her life, then to her bodily heirs, if any; but if she have none, back to her brothers and sisters,'" the court was of opinion that from a perusal of the entire devise, the words "heirs of the body if she have any" with an ultimate limitation to her brothers and sisters, showed clearly that the words "heirs of the body" were not used in their technical sense but were intended to mean children or issue, and the estate by correct interpretation was "to M. for life, remainder to her children in fee and in default of children, over to the brother and sister," citing numerous cases in support of the position. And in a subsequent case of Jones v. Whichard, a father conveyed to his son a tract of land, "to have and to hold the [same] to said Robert M. Jones and Martha F. Jones, his wife, during their natural life and then to their legal bodily heirs, provided they leave any, and if not to be equally divided among my nearest of kin," etc.

The case of Puckett v. Morgan was held to be controlling, and stating the principle applicable, the court said:

"In approval and illustration of the rule as stated, there are many decisions here and elsewhere to the effect that, in order to its proper application the word 'heirs' or heirs of the body (these last by reason of our statute, Revisal, § 1578) must be used in their technical sense, carrying the estate to such heirs as an entire class to take in succession from generation to generation, and they must have the effect to convey 'The same estate to the same persons, whether they take by descent or purchase,' and, whenever it appears from the context or from a perusal of the entire instrument that the words were not intended in their ordinary acceptance of words of inheritance, but simply as a descriptio personarum designating certain individuals of the class, or that the estate is thereby conveyed to 'any other person in any other manner or in any other quality than the canons of descent provide,' the rule in question does not apply, and interest of the first taker will be, as it is expressly described, an estate for life."

—citing also for the position Puckett v. Morgan, 158 N. C. 344, 74 S. E. 15; Smith v.

Proctor, 139 N. C. 314, 51 S. E. 889, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 172; Wool v. Fleetwood, 136 N. C. 460-470, 48 S. E. 785, 67 L. R. A. 444; May v. Lewis, 132 N. C. 115, 43 S. E. 550; Whitesides v. Cooper, 115 N. C. 570, 20 S. E. 295; Mills v. Thorne, 95 N. C. 382; Ward v. Jones, 40 N. C. 404.

The same principle was applied in the later case of Blackledge v. Simmons, 180 N. C. 535, 105 S. E. 202, the court being of opinion that on perusal of the entire instrument it appeared that the words "heirs of her body" were not intended to be words of general inheritance but were used in a more restricted sense.

[3] Considering the present deed in view of these authorities, the estate being conveyed to C. A. Wallace for life and after his death "to his bodily heirs in fee simple, if any, and if none to go to his next of kin," the limitation comes directly under the decisions of Jones v. Whichard, and Puckett v. Morgan, and that line of cases to the effect that the words "heirs of body" here are used in the sense of children or issue, and the estate conveyed is to C. A. Wallace for life, remainder to his children or issue if any and then over, and under May v. Lewis, 132 N. C. 115, 43 S. E. 550, the limitation over being to the next of kin of the grantee should be held as a limitation affecting his estate by confining the descent potentially to a restricted class of heirs, to wit, his "nearest of kin," and so preventing the application of the rule in Shelley's Case on that ground. This in our opinion being the true construction of the deed, C. A. Wallace, under the primary limitation having only a life estate, could not pass any interest by his will, and for the same reason his widow is not entitled to dower, the husband having never been seized of an estate of inheritance.

[4] And considering the facts further and the grantee C. A. Wallace having died without children or issue to take under the deed, the question recurs as to who are entitled under the ulterior limitation to "his next of kin"; the claimants being respectively his three surviving brothers, his widow, and the children of deceased brothers and sisters. On this question it has been held in this jurisdiction, in a long line of cases in which the question was directly considered, that these words mean "nearest of kin," and that in the construction of deeds and wills, unless there are terms in the instrument showing a contrary intent, the words "next of kin" without more do not recognize or permit the principle of representation. Redmond v. Burroughs, 63 N. C. 242; Harrison v. Ward, 58 N. C. 236; Davenport v. Hassel, 45 N. C. 29; Simmons v. Gooding, 40 N. C. 382; Peterson v. Webb, 39 N. C. 56; Henry v. Henry, 31 N. C. 278.

In Redmond v. Burroughs, supra, the suggestion was made that the term "next of kin" should receive its technical meaning that was usually given it in construing the statute of distribution, so including the principle of representation; but the court, in rejecting the suggestion, called attention to the fact that the principle of representation as it prevailed in the statute did not arise from the use of the term "next of kin," but by reason of further words appearing therein, to wit, "next of kin of equal degree and those who legally represent them." And to show how consistently the court has adhered to this ruling, as the correct principle of interpretation, in the closing portion of his opinion in Harrison v. Ward, supra, Manly, Judge, speaks to the question as follows:

"In the case of Simmons v. Gooding, supra, the court felt constrained by the weight of authority, and we now feel constrained by that, and the force of our own decision, to hold the words 'next of kin,' in the will in question, to mean the nearest in degree, and that the sister of the deceased brother, Benjamin, will take the slave property limited to him for life, to the exclusion of the nephew and niece.

"The able argument which has been addressed to us upon this point has caused us to consider it again more at large, than we might otherwise have done, and we are again brought to the same conclusion. We do not feel at liberty to depart from the construction heretofore adopted—a construction, it may be added, which has the sanction of the most eminent Judges, Thurlow, Eldon, Grant, Plumer, and others. Those who are desirous of examining the authorities upon this vexed question will find them referred to by Jarman, in his treatise on Wills (volume 2, p. 38).

"The construction which we thus put upon the will may disappoint the expectations of defendants' friends, and work a case of hardship, not foreseen, and not desired by the testator; but it cannot be otherwise without unsettling again the sense of words, which it has given the courts great trouble to fix, and which the public interest now requires should remain so."

[5] Again, in these and other decisions, on the subject, it is held uniformly so far as examined that the term, as the equivalent of "nearest of kin" signifies "nearest of blood kin" and that relationship by marriage is not within its proper meaning. Thus in Jones v. Oliver, 38 N. C. 369, the testator died leaving a will in which there was an ulterior limitation to the "next of kin of himself and of his wife." The widow having remarried and died, her husband made claim to a portion of the property as her next of kin, and it was held that the limitation was to the nearest of kin by blood, and the husband was excluded. And it was so directly held in Peterson v. Webb, 39 N. C. 56. The same rule prevailed in England as to the meaning of the words "next of kin," Elmesly v. Young, 2 Myl. K. 780; and courts of the highest authority in this country have also approved the position. Swasey v. Jaques, 144 Mass. 135, 10 N. E. 758, 59 Am. Rep. 65; Locke v. Locke et al., 45 N. J. Eq. 97, 16 Atl. 49. In an elementary work of recognized merit, it is said that the courts in this country have very generally held that "next of kin" when unexplained by the context means "next of kin according to the statute of distributions," but we doubt if the statement is justified as the rule of interpretation for deeds and wills. Thus, in one of the authorities sometimes referred to in illustration of such a statement, Blagge v. Balch, 162 U. S. 439, 16 Sup. Ct. 853, 40 L. Ed. 1032, the court in upholding a portion of the principle of representation was passing on the distribution of the French Spoliation claims dependent and determined on the construction of the act of Congress controlling in the matter, and in Seabright v. Seabright, 28 W. Va. 412, the court was construing a statute excluding the evidence of certain persons in suits against "next of kin," and it was held that the scope and purpose of the statute justified and required the interpretation that the term "next of kin" should include all of those who took and held a pecuniary interest under the statute of distributions; but both of these able courts recognized that in the interpretation of deeds and wills the principle of representation was ordinarily excluded in the use of the term "next of kin." But however this may be, it is beyond question the settled principle of construction in this state that, unless the instrument shows a contrary intent, the words "next of kin" mean "nearest of kin," and that the principle of representation is excluded.

There is nothing in May v. Lewis, 132 N. C. 115, 43 S. E. 550, that is in necessary conflict with this position. That was a case involving the question whether the grantee under the deed could convey a valid title, and dependent on whether the rule in Shelley's Case applied; the limitation being to the grantee for life and then to his heirs if any and if none to revert back to his next of kin. After holding that a good title could not be presently made as the term "next of kin" might serve to withdraw the limitation from our general canons of descent, the court in the opinion by our former associate, Mr. Justice Connor, and by way of illustration merely quoted 21 A. & E. Enc. to the effect "That it was very generally held in the United States that the term 'next of kin' meant 'next of kin' according to the statute of distributions," meaning no doubt that the term meant only "nearest of kin" as our cases construing the statute had uniformly held. And we are well assured that this able and learned judge who has ever evinced a wholesome regard for established precedent as affording a dependable base line for all intelligent and well ordered progress, had no intent in this casual reference to break down or set aside a long line of well-considered decisions so uniform and consistent as to establish the contrary principle as a rule of property on which many titles must depend.

In accord with these principles, we must affirm the judgment of the court below and hold that C. A. Wallace took only a life estate under the deed from his father, and that under the ulterior limitation to his next of kin, the property belongs to his surviving brothers and sisters to the exclusion of the widow and his nephews and nieces.

Judgment affirmed.

ROBERTS v. COLUMBIA RY. & NAV. CO.
(No. 10592.)

Master and servant §276(3)—Evidence insufficient to show defective appliances caused injury to workman on boat.

In an action for injuries to the employe of a railway and navigation company when he left the boat on which he was employed, which had broken loose, so that he was subjected to exposure, evidence held insufficient to show that plaintiff would have been injured if he had remained on the boat where he agreed to work, showing instead that he was taken off the boat and put in a place of safety by a government boat, and voluntarily left such place, an island, and walked into the water to leave it, getting wet, and so sustaining injury.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; W. N. Townsend, Judge.

Action by L. B. Roberts against the Columbia Railway & Navigation Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. Fraser Lyon and T. H. Moffatt, both of Columbia, for appellant.

James H. Hammond, of Columbia, for respondent.

FRASER, J. "I live in Richland county. During the month of January, 1915, I was employed by the Columbia Railway & Navigation Company, for the purpose of keeping the logs and rafts off the boat Ruth No. 2, which boat was owned by the said company. This was in the winter time, and the river was very high, and there was a snow storm. I was sent for one afternoon, and undertook the employment. One of the watchmen at the bank came for me. I went down to the bank, and Mr. Shannon met me with a shall boat and took me to the large boat; he and Mr. Parr were keeping logs and drifts off the large boat, the Ruth No. 2. I then went out in the Ruth No. 2, when they came to the bank and got me. They wanted me to keep the logs and rafts off which were coming down the river. The river was flooded, and when it floods the logs and that kind of matter drift down and must be kept away from the boat, else it might cause the boat to break loose. During that night I would keep the rafts and logs from accumulating by going down from the upper deck every time one would strike and taking a pole and punching it off. I punched some off that night. Nothing happened to the boat until about 12 that night. * * * About 12 o'clock on this night Parr, Shannon, and myself were on the upper deck eating peanuts and sitting by a heater when something struck the boat. We immediately went down, but before we could get there the boat had broken loose and was drifting down the river. These boats are each about 150 feet long and 25 or 30 feet wide. When the boat broke loose we all got frightened. The boat floated downstream about three-fourths of an hour, when we were rescued by a government boat and then taken by this boat to an island. After landing on this island we tried to wade to the main shore. They said, 'We are going.' I said, 'I will have to follow; I won't stay by myself.' I did not get wet until after I landed on this island and tried to wade to the mainland. I could not make it to shore, and had to climb a tree, and I stayed there until help came. I was in this tree until daylight, at about which time the government people sent a stove and blankets. The government boat did not overturn. I stayed in wet clothes until I got home, which was about 10 o'clock. Each of these boats was about 150 feet long and 25 or 30 feet wide. They were tied together. The Ruth No. 2 to a cottonwood tree about six inches in diameter. I was frightened going downstream. I saw an anchor and rope in this boat. The cabin which we were in was 14 feet or higher from the lower deck. There are no curves in the stream. That night it was so dark we could not see. I was in water and up a tree about eight or nine hours. I did not want to stay on this island by myself was the reason why I left. I did not go to bed on account of this experience for about two weeks, and during this two weeks I was cutting wood and staying around a woodyard; afterwards I did some light carpenter work."

Plaintiff brought suit for the injury and alleges:

"That the aforementioned injuries and damages suffered by the plaintiff are all directly resultant from the defendant's failure to provide a reasonably safe and sound place for him to work and in failing to provide appliances on the said boat that were sound, in that the defendant failed to lash the boat to a substantial tree or anchor on the land, and on the contrary had it tied to a small and insufficient tree that was unable to hold the boat, and also, in that the defendant used old, worn, and rusty and defective cables lashing the boat and the other boat to the side, all of which caused the plaintiff to drift down the stream. That had the defendant properly tied the boat at the bow, or had the cables used on the sides been good and serviceable, and not rotten and worthless cables, as they were, the said boat would never have broken away, and the damages to the plaintiff would have been averted."

It will thus be seen that the plaintiff alleges: (1) An unsafe place to work; and (2) defective appliances.

At the close of the plaintiff's testimony, the defendant moved for a nonsuit and at the close of all the testimony moved for a directed verdict. Both motions were refused, and the judgment was for the plaintiff, from which the defendant appealed. It was error to refuse the nonsuit, and again it was error to refuse to direct a verdict.

In order to recover for negligence, the negligence complained of must be the proximate cause of the injury. The evidence fails to show that the plaintiff would have been injured if he had remained on the boat where he agreed to work. It shows positively that the plaintiff was taken off the boat and put in a place of safety; that he voluntarily left the safe place on the island and walked into the water that wet him and caused his injury.

The plaintiff shows no cause of action, and inasmuch as the record not only fails to show a cause of action, but shows positively that the plaintiff has no cause of action, a verdict should have been directed.

The judgment is reversed.

LEE v. CITY TRANSFER & BAGGAGE CO. et al. (No. 10594.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 25, 1921.)

1. Carriers \S 137—Law of agency properly charged in action for loss of suit case.

In an action against a transfer and baggage company for loss of a suitcase, call for which was taken by the baggage company's agent, its codefendant, the trial court properly charged the law of agency, and explained how the relationship of principal and agent may be created; the evidence and issues making it necessary.

2. Appeal and error \S 215(1)—Attorneys under duty to call court's attention to error in misstating issues.

If the trial court committed an error in misstating the issues raised by the pleadings to the jury, it was the duty of the attorneys to call his attention to such error.

Appeal from Richland County Court; M. S. Whaley, County Judge.

Action by Mrs. C. M. Lee against the City Transfer & Baggage Company and another. From judgment for plaintiff, the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. Hughes Cooper and Alfred Wallace, Jr., both of Columbia, for appellant.

James H. Hammond, of Columbia, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This was an action by plaintiff against defendants for loss of suit case, the defendant Wise defaulted, and the City Transfer & Baggage Company answered and contested. The case was heard by Hon. M. S. Whaley, county judge and a jury, and a verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiff. Wise did not appear and testify. The issue raised by the other defendant was that Wise was not their agent, and that Wise took the notice of call from their desk without their knowledge, and answered the call without their knowledge or authority. After entry of judgment defendant appeals and takes four exceptions, but on the hearing of the case abandoned the fourth exception. All three of the exceptions complain of error in the judge's charge. No motion was made in the trial below for a nonsuit or directed verdict, so the only question to be determined was whether or not the judge erred in his charge.

[1] The first and second exceptions are overruled. His honor committed no error in charging the law of agency, and explaining how the relationship of principal and agent may be created; the evidence and issues made in the case made it necessary that his honor should elucidate this. The complaint alleged such facts that the inference could be drawn that Wise was the agent of the appellant, and from the evidence offered at trial that inference could be inferred and the real question in the case was, Was Wise the agent of appellant for the purpose of transporting the plaintiff to the depot? and not whether Wise was the general agent of the appellant, or how he was appointed.

[2] If his honor committed an error in misstating the issues raised by the pleadings to the jury it was the duty of attorneys to call his attention to such error. We see no merit in any of the exceptions as made. Under the undisputed facts of the case the plaintiff was clearly entitled to a verdict, and the appellants got a trial that was free from error on the part of the trial judge. All exceptions are overruled, and judgment affirmed.

GARY, C. J., and FRASER and COTHRAN, JJ., concur.

COTHRAN, J. I concur in the result upon this ground: The complaint was plainly demurrable; it did not allege that the defendant received the baggage for transfer; it did not allege that the defendant Wise who actually received it was the agent of the transfer company; it did not allege that the transfer company by its negligence permitted Wise to represent himself as the agent of the transfer company; it simply alleged that the transfer company had agreed to transfer the baggage, and that Wise had called for it, representing himself as the agent of the transfer company, and that in the movement Wise had lost the baggage.

The defendant not having demurred to the complaint, not having made a motion to require the complaint to be made more definite, and not having objected to testimony along both lines (that Wise was the agent of the transfer company, and that the latter was negligent in allowing him to represent himself as their agent), is not in a position now to object to the testimony or charge of the court upon either theory. Both of these issues were fairly presented to the jury in the circuit judge's charge, without objection on the part of the defendant, and with the finding of the jury we are not concerned.

SON v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. (No. 10595.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 29, 1921.)

Commerce §28—Message between points within state transmitted through another state held interstate message.

A telegraph message between two points in the state, unnecessarily transmitted through another state, is an interstate message, and not subject to state law permitting damages for delay of death message, preventing receiver from attending relative's funeral.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Aiken County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Action by S. Son against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Francis R. Stark, of New York City, and Nelson & Gettys, of Columbia, for appellant. Julian B. Salley, of Aiken, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. This is an action for damages, alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff, through the wrongful acts of the defendant, in failing to deliver the following telegram:

"Batesburg, S. C.

"Mary Napper, Graniteville, S. C. Mother is dead be buried at Leesville eleven o'clock to-morrow.
S. Son."

The message was delivered to the defendant for transmission, at 11:30 o'clock on Sunday morning, but was not delivered at Graniteville until 7:30 o'clock Monday morning, when it was too late for the plaintiff to attend the funeral of her mother. The plaintiff also received the message by telephone at 9 o'clock on Monday morning, and the telegram, likewise, by mail from Augusta, Ga., on Tuesday morning. The defendant has three direct wires leading from Batesburg to Graniteville, both places being in this state, and 38 miles apart. It also works in conjunction with the Southern Bell Telephone Company, and sometimes sends messages over the telephone wires.

The defendant offered in evidence an agreed statement of what J. B. Breland would testify, if present, which is as follows:

"On March 31, 1918, I was joint operator for the Southern Railway and the Western Union Telegraph Company, at Batesburg, S. C. The attached message was filed with me at 11:50 a. m. March 31, 1918, and was sent by me to Charlotte, N. C., for relay, at 5:25 p. m."

R. O. Johnson, telegraph operator for the defendant at Graniteville, testified that the telegram was received by him as No. 1, from Charlotte, N. C., on the morning of April 1, 1918. This was delivered to the plaintiff before she received either the telephone message from Batesburg, or the letter containing the telegram from Augusta, Ga.

The crucial point in the case is whether this was an interstate or an intrastate message. In the case of Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Speight, 254 U. S. 17, 41 Sup. Ct. 11, 65 L. Ed. —, the facts were very similar to these in the present case. The jury found that the message was sent out of North Carolina into Virginia, for the purpose of fraudulently evading liability under the law of North Carolina, and gave the plaintiff a verdict. The presiding judge then set the verdict aside "as a matter of law," and ordered a nonsuit. But on appeal the Supreme Court of the state set aside the nonsuit, and directed that a judgment be entered on the verdict. Mr. Justice Holmes, who delivered the opinion of the court, said:

"We are of opinion that the judge presiding at the trial was right, and that the Supreme Court was wrong. Even if there had been any duty on the part of the telegraph company to confine the transmission to North Carolina, it did not do so. The transmission of a message through two states is interstate commerce as a matter of fact. * * * The fact must be tested by the actual transaction. * * * The court below did not rely primarily upon the finding of the jury as to the purpose of the arrangement, but held that when, as here, the termini were in the same state, the business was intrastate unless it was necessary to cross the territory of another state in order to reach the final point. This, as we have said, is not the law. It did, however, lay down that the burden was on the company to show that what was done 'was not done to evade the jurisdiction of the state.' If the motive were material, as to which we express no opinion, this again is a mistake. The burden was on the plaintiff to make out her case. Moreover, the motive would not have made the business intrastate. If the mode of transmission adopted had been unreasonable as against the plaintiff, a different question would arise; but in that case the liability, if it existed, would not be a liability for an intrastate transaction that never took place but for the unwarranted conduct and the resulting loss." (Italics added.)

Reversed.

TOWN OF GORDONSVILLE v. ZINN.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 17, 1921.)

1. Waters and water courses §39—"Riparian land" must be on watershed of portion of stream in question.

Land, to be "riparian" to a particular portion of a stream, must, as an essential condition, be located on the watershed of that portion of the stream.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Riparian.]

2. Waters and water courses §39—Land opposite point below plaintiff's land not riparian to portion of stream above.

Where defendant's land touched a stream both above and below plaintiff's land, but the dwelling house was opposite a point in the stream below plaintiff's land, and any surplus water from the dwelling house would return to the bed of the stream below plaintiff's land, the dwelling house land is not riparian to the portion of the stream above plaintiff's land.

3. Waters and water courses §47 — Water rights incident to riparian lands cannot be used on adjoining nonriparian lands.

Where defendant owned lands on which was a dwelling house, lying back of plaintiff's riparian lands and touching the stream below plaintiff's lands, and also owned a strip connecting such lands with the stream above plaintiff's lands, she could not use the water rights incident to such riparian strip on the dwelling house lands, by diverting water from the stream above plaintiff's land for use at the dwelling house; the dwelling house lands being nonriparian as to the portion of the stream at the point of diversion.

4. Waters and water courses §85—Diversion will be restrained only to extent that it causes substantial injury.

A riparian owner's right to the use of water, to the extent that it exists, will be protected by injunction from substantial injury, actual or threatened, by the wrongful continuous diversion of the water by an upper riparian owner, but beyond this the court will not go, whatever may be the lack of abstract right in the upper riparian owner to divert the water.

5. Waters and water courses ¶47 — Town cannot divert water to nonriparian premises.

A town owning one acre of riparian land, on which it has constructed reservoirs, is limited to the use of the water on such land, and has no right to divert it to the town, a nonriparian locality.

6. Waters and water courses ¶156(6)—Conveyance to town held to convey only right to use water on land conveyed.

A riparian owner's conveyance of one acre of land to a town, on which it constructed reservoirs, with all water and water rights and privileges appurtenant thereto, gave the town no right to use any more of the water than was incident to its ownership of the land conveyed.

7. Waters and water courses ¶158(2) — Agreement held not to divest riparian rights.

An agreement between a town owning riparian land, on which it constructed reservoirs, and an upper riparian proprietor having constructed a reservoir for his own use, whereby the town was given a continuing right to enter on his land and make changes and improvements in his reservoir for the purpose of keeping the water clean and pure, held not to divest him and his heirs of any riparian rights which they would otherwise have possessed.

8. Waters and water courses ¶129—Right to divert water as against upper owners not obtainable by prescription.

A lower riparian owner's diversion of water can confer no right thereto by prescription as against upper owners, as no cause of action ever arises in favor of upper owners so as to commence the running of the prescriptive period.

9. Waters and water courses ¶152(3)—Town having prescriptive right to divert water may enjoin diversion by upper owner.

A town owning but one acre of riparian land, but which, by its adverse collection, dominion, and control of all the water of a stream, has acquired, as against lower owners, a prescriptive right to divert the water to its exclusive use, may enjoin an upper owner from diverting the water to nonriparian lands in such quantity as will in any degree diminish the quantity; it appearing that it would be substantially damaged in times of drought, and that its exclusive right would eventually be barred pro tanto by prescription, if such diversion was permitted.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Orange County.

Suit by the Town of Gordonsville against Mrs. Flora M. Zinn. From a decree dismissing the bill, the complainant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

This is a suit for injunction, instituted by the appellant, the town of Gordonsville, a municipal corporation, against the appellee, Mrs. Flora M. Zinn, the object of which is to perpetually enjoin the latter from withdrawing any water whatsoever from the flow of a small nonnavigable stream from a locality on such stream which is above the reservoirs of the town located on the stream, from which reservoirs the town draws its municipal water supply.

There was a demurrer to the bill by the appellee. The court below sustained the demurrer and dismissed the bill; and the questions presented for decision on the appeal arise on the demurrer to the bill.

The material issues and facts, as they appear from the allegations of the bill, are, in substance, as follows:

The town claims, as a lower riparian landowner, to be entitled (under a certain conveyance in 1889 from one B. F. Weaver; also under a certain contract in writing, in 1889, with one Alexander Cameron, the adjacent upstream owner of the land on both sides of the stream, including the spring, which is the source of such stream; and by prescription) to all of the water which flows from such spring and would in its natural course flow in said stream from the said Cameron land through the reservoirs of the town, except so much of the water as the said Cameron in his lifetime, and those claiming under him at the time of the institution of this suit, were entitled to use as upper riparian landowners with respect to the said stream and spring.

Prior to 1889, and to the construction of its reservoirs by the town, the said Weaver owned a large tract of land on both sides of said stream adjacent to the said Cameron land and immediately below it on such stream. In that year (1889) Weaver from his said larger tract conveyed to the town the parcel of land owned by it located as aforesaid on and so as to embrace both sides of said stream, consisting of one acre, in shape a parallelogram, 249 feet in length along the Cameron line and 175 feet in width. This deed also conveyed to the town "all the water and water rights and * * * all the privileges appurtenant to said lot of land." This deed was duly recorded in 1889.

The conveyance just mentioned left still belonging to Weaver a considerable tract of land which lay to the south of the Cameron land and the parcel acquired by the town as just stated; the remaining Weaver land being bounded on the west by a portion of the eastern boundary line of the Cameron land for some distance, thence by northern, eastern, and southern boundary lines of the town lot, and thence by the eastern boundary line of the Cameron land again.

In June, 1889, the aforesaid contract in writing between the town and the said Cameron was entered into, which, omitting the formal parts, is as follows:

"Whereas the said town of Gordonsville is desirous of constructing suitable works and reservoirs for the purpose of securing an abundant supply of pure water, and for this purpose hath purchased of B. F. Weaver an acre of land bounded on the west side of the lands of the said Cameron near his spring and reservoir, the water from which spring in its natural flow passes through the said acre of land; and

"Whereas, the said town is about to construct upon the said acre of land a suitable reservoir for the purpose of supplying water, and in order that said water may at all times be pure and clear, it is necessary that some changes and improvements should be made in the reservoir of the said Cameron, which lies between his spring and the reservoir intended to be built by the said town; and

"Whereas, the said Cameron is willing that the said town may make such changes and improvements in his reservoir as shall be necessary to secure the water in a clear and pure condition, provided his legal right to use and control the water from his spring and reservoir is not in any degree lessened:

"Now, therefore, and in consideration of the premises and the further consideration of $1 in hand paid to the said Cameron by the said town, he, the said Cameron, doth give and grant unto the said town of Gordonsville the right to enter upon his land immediately in the vicinity of the said spring and reservoir on his farm near Gordonsville, in the county of Orange, and to make such changes and improvements in the said reservoir, by clearing it up, lining, paving, and coating the same and by elevating the water not higher than the present elevation of the discharge pipe from the spring into the reservoir and to inclose the same with a suitable and slightly fence so as to prevent all persons and animals having access to said spring and reservoir except the said Cameron, his representatives, servants, agents, and assigns, and the proper officers of the said town of Gordonsville.

"But it is expressly agreed that neither party shall wash or bathe or permit to be washed or bathed human bodies or other things in said spring and reservoir, which would tend to pollute the waters therein.

"The rights herein granted the said town are to continue as long as the waterworks are kept in proper condition and the water needed for supplying said town as aforesaid.

"And the said town on its part covenants to and with the said Cameron that it will make improvements aforesaid, and in making them it will do no injury to his spring, reservoir, and lands adjacent thereto. That all surplus dirt taken from his reservoir not utilized in their works shall be removed and deposited in some place not injurious to the lands and grass of the said Cameron.

"That in the improvements of his reservoir it will put in at proper place or places one or more discharge pipes for the use of said Cameron and of sufficient size to afford to said Cameron the use of the water from said spring to the same extent that he is entitled under the law to said water at this time. It being the intention of the parties to this deed that no restraints nor limitations shall by this deed be placed upon the legal rights of the said Cameron, his representatives, and assigns as they now exist, to and over the water and the use thereof for any and all purposes for which he may now lawfully use the same, and to secure to said town the right to cleanse and purify and keep clean and pure the water that will naturally flow into its reservoir.

"The exclusive use and control of the said discharge pipes shall at all times be and remain in said Cameron, his representatives, and assigns, so as to afford to them the right to use the water to the same extent as now exists. The failure of the town of Gordonsville to make in a reasonable time the improvements herein mentioned and to construct and keep in proper repair its waterworks shall operate as a revocation of the rights of entry herein granted by the said Cameron to the said town of Gordonsville."

Under the Weaver deed aforesaid, and under and in accordance in all respects with said contract between it and the said Cameron, the town (according to the allegations of the bill), "continuously from the 25th day of June, 1889, and before," collected in reservoirs, on its said one-acre parcel of land, all the water which flowed from said Cameron spring, except such as was used on the said Cameron land in supplying the dwelling house and outbuildings of the said Cameron located on said Cameron land with the water there used, drawn from the discharge pipe places provided by the town in accordance with said contract, and the water collected in said reservoirs as aforesaid has been taken by the town and conducted in pipes from said reservoirs for some distance to the town of Gordonsville, and thus diverted from the natural channel of the stream, and has been used for municipal purposes and in supplying the inhabitants of the town with water. That this use of such water by the town has been a necessary use, the water thus taken by the town being all needed for its aforesaid purposes, and that during such period of approximately 30 years before the institution of this suit the said diversion by the town of such quantity of water, collected as aforesaid in its reservoirs, "has been absolute and unrestricted, * * * without restriction, hindrance, or objection, under a valid claim of right, without interruption (and) adversely"; and that "in dry seasons there has been no overflow from the reservoirs of the town, the needs of the town having required every drop of water available from said spring."

The following also appears from the allegations of the bill:

Subsequent to the occurrences above narrated the said Alexander Cameron acquired title to 58 acres of the said residue of the Weaver land and added it to his holding of the original Cameron land aforesaid. This 58 acres lay adjacent to the original Cameron land, extending in a southwesterly direction from the southern end of the town lot, along the eastern line of the original Cameron land in that locality. This 58 acres also extended in an easterly direction along the whole of the southern end of the town lot and thence along its eastern side to the said stream and to the east of such lot, so as to constitute a portion, at least, of such 58-acre parcel, lower riparian land with respect to the town lot and said stream.

The said Cameron did not in his lifetime make any use on said 58-acre parcel of land, for any purpose, of any water taken from said stream above the town lot.

The said Cameron died in 1915, and in 1916, in the partition of his lands among his heirs, the said 58-acre parcel of land became the property of Mrs. Zinn, one of his heirs, and the said original Cameron land became the property of other heirs of said Cameron.

Thereafter the appellee built a handsome residence on the 58-acre parcel of land, located (as admitted in argument in the case) 350 to 400 feet east of the dividing line between such parcel and the original Cameron land. And thereupon a controversy arose between the town and the appellee as to her right to withdraw water from said stream above the town lot for use on said 58-acre tract (presumably for domestic purposes, in connection with her dwelling house aforesaid). After such controversy arose, the appellee, by deed dated in May, 1917, acquired from the other Cameron heirs aforesaid title to a strip of the original Cameron land, 25 feet in width, containing forty-two one-hundredths of an acre, extending from the center of the natural location of the channel of the stream, just above the town lot, thence southwardly along the original eastern line of the Cameron land first above mentioned, with the line of the town lot so far as that extends in that direction, thence with the line of the 58-acre tract aforesaid where that tract lies adjacent to the original Cameron tract aforesaid. And at the time of the filing of the bill the appellee claimed the right, and notified the town that, as upper riparian owner of the 25-acre strip of land above mentioned, she intended as a matter of right to withdraw from the stream, where such strip of land borders upon it and embraces a portion of it, sufficient water for such purposes as she saw fit," as alleged in the bill, but presumably, from the positions taken in the petition and in argument, for her natural uses in and about her dwelling house on said 58-acre tract, by means of pipes laid from the stream, thence, over the 25-foot strip of land and adjacent 58-acre parcel, to the dwelling house.

The town denies that the appellee has any right to do this, claiming that this would be a diversion, pro tanto, of the water of the stream to the exclusive use of which the town is entitled, as it alleges as aforesaid, which would operate such an irreparable injury to the rights of the town, as alleged, that, in equity, as the town claims, the injunction prayed for should be awarded.

Other material matters are referred to in the opinion of the court.

Shackelford & Robertson, of Orange, for appellant.

McGuire, Riely & Eggleston, of Richmond, for appellee.

SIMS, J. (after stating the facts as above). The questions raised by the assignments of error will be disposed of in their order as stated below:

1. Is the land owned by appellee, where her dwelling house is located, riparian land, having reference to that portion of the stream which is immediately above the town lot, from which the appellee claims the right to withdraw water?

This question must be answered in the negative.

In the note to 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1062, this is said:

"According to the weight of authority, riparian land is, in any event, limited in its extent by the watershed of the stream; in other words, lands beyond the watershed cannot be regarded as riparian, though part of a single tract, held in a common ownership, which borders upon the stream."

The following cases are cited by the learned annotator to sustain this note, namely: Chauvet v. Hill, 93 Cal. 407, 28 Pac. 1066; Southern California Invest. Co. v. Wilshire, 144 Cal. 68, 77 Pac. 767; Bathgate v. Irving, 126 Cal. 135, 58 Pac. 442, 77 Am. St. Rep. 158; Watkins Land Co. v. Clements, 98 Tex. 578, 86 S. W. 733, 70 L. R. A. 964, 107 Am. St. Rep. 653; Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674; Boehmer v. Big Rock Irr. District, 117 Cal. 19, 48 Pac. 908; Crawford Co. v. Hathaway, 67 Neb. 325, 93 N. W. 781, 60 L. R. A. 889, 108 Am. St. Rep. 647. An examination of these authorities discloses that they sustain the text of the note above quoted. See, also, the principal case to which said note is in annotation, namely, Anaheim Union Water Co. v. Fuller, 150 Cal. 327, 88 Pac. 978, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1062, and 2 Farnham on Waters and Water Rights, pp. 1571-1573, which also sustain the text of such note.

In Anaheim Union Water Co. v. Fuller, just cited, this is said:

"The principal reasons for the rule confining riparian rights to that part of lands bordering on the stream which are within the watershed are that, where the water is used on such land, it will, after such use, return to the stream, so far as it is not consumed, and that, as the rainfall on such land feeds the stream, the land is, in consequence, entitled, so to speak, to the use of the waters."

In 2 Farnham on Waters and Water Rights, § 463a, pp. 1571, 1572, this is said:

"What is riparian land? It being established that the right to use the water of the stream is dependent solely upon the ownership of land which is in contact with the stream, it becomes necessary to determine what, in fact, is riparian land. This question is not entirely free from difficulty. There are several things upon which the answer to the question might be made to turn. The first and most important is the natural configuration of the country through which the stream flows, so that all land within the watershed which lies in such a manner that the drainage from it finds its way into the stream might be regarded as riparian land. But a rule which would recognize such a vast extent of territory as riparian land would be almost as destructive of the right of the riparian owner as a rule which would permit any one who could gain access to the water to make use of it. Such a rule not only would permit the consumption of the water near its source of supply, but it would result in conflicts between landowners as to rights of way and the construction of the necessary apparatus to make the water available. Another criterion for determining what is riparian land might be the land which is in possession of one person whose holdings actually extend so as to come in contact with the water. This test, in some cases, might be too broad, because part of the land might lie out of the natural watershed of the stream, and therefore be outside of the boundaries established by nature for riparian ownership. The criterion which more nearly meets the necessities of the case is the rule that all land must be regarded as riparian which is within the natural watershed of the stream, the title to which is in one owner and the boundaries of which have been established in accordance with the requirements of the conditions which will best serve the interests of individual landowners. * * * The watershed should certainly form a limit beyond which the riparian rights cannot be claimed; but there is a question whether or not that limit is not too wide. Much may depend upon the character of the stream. A river of large volume might appropriately supply the needs of the population living within its watershed, while a small stream could be used only by those living on its immediate bank. The most satisfactory rule is that the parcels of land should be regarded as riparian so far as their location with reference to the stream has indicated where their boundary should be fixed, so that all that parcel which is regarded as one tract should be regarded as riparian, leaving the question of the extent of the use which may be made of the water to the rules regulating the relative rights of owners on the stream. Under this rule the boundary of riparian land is restricted to land the title to which is acquired by one transaction."

In the case of Anaheim Union Water Co. v. Fuller, supra, 150 Cal. 327, 88 Pac. 978, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1062, it is said that—

"Where two streams unite, * * * the correct rule to be applied, in regard to the riparian rights therein, is that each is to be considered as a separate stream, with regard to lands abutting thereon above the junction, and that land lying within the watershed of one stream above that point is not to be considered as riparian to the other stream."

In case of Miller v. Baker, 68 Wash. 10, 122 Pac. 604 (a suit for injunction), the locations of the lands of the plaintiffs and defendants with respect to the stream and each other were practically the same as the locations with respect to those particulars of the town lot and appellee's 58-acre tract in the case before us. In that case the land of the defendants abutted on the stream below the land of the plaintiffs, and thence extended along adjacent to and on above the plaintiffs' land, but away from the stream after defendants' land reached the plaintiffs' land. And in the opinion of the court this is said:

"We find it unnecessary to decide at this time whether the defendants' lands are all riparian to this stream. For the purposes of this case it may be conceded that they are riparian. But it is clear that, if the whole tract owned by the defendants is riparian land, this is so because the stream crosses the tract at a point in the extreme southeast corner thereof [below the plaintiffs' land]. The stream does not touch the defendants' lands at any other point. The tract is, therefore, riparian to the stream at that point only. The mere fact that a tract of land touches a stream at one point does not make such land riparian at other points on the stream or to the whole of the stream. The riparian right of such land, or the owners thereof [the court having reference to the right of withdrawing water from the stream], is confined to the points where the land abuts upon the stream."

There are, therefore, under the above-mentioned authorities, two limitations upon the extent away from the borders of a stream to which land held by one ownership can be considered as riparian; one, the broader limitation, that the land in question in a particular case, to be riparian, must, as one essential condition of fact, be located on the watershed of that portion of the stream which is in question; the other (which is a limitation upon such broader limitation) that the land is restricted to that to which the title was acquired by one transaction. As appears also from such authorities, according to their holding, the latter limitation is itself still further curtailed by the further limitation that the land cannot be considered as riparian in any event beyond the extent of the bounds of the grant from the commonwealth. So that, as said in Anaheim Union Water Co. v. Fuller, supra, 150 Cal. 327, 88 Pac. 978, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1062:

"If the owner of a tract abutting on a stream conveys to another a part of the land not contiguous to the stream, he thereby cuts off the part so conveyed from all participation in the use of the stream and from riparian rights therein, unless the conveyance declares the contrary. Land thus conveyed and severed from the stream can never regain the riparian right, although it may thereafter be reconveyed to the person who owns the part abutting on the stream, so that the two tracts are again held in one ownership."

The position is taken in argument for appellee that—

"All of the cases cited, in which riparian rights were restricted to land acquired by a single entry, involved land acquired by original government grant; and the cases arose in Western states, where the common-law doctrine as to property in natural streams was held to be inapplicable, and it is insisted that such have no force in Virginia, where the common-law rules have never been questioned."

In this connection it should be said that it appears from the decisions of the states referred to that the holding in question was based; in part at least, on the common-law doctrine referred to, which is expressly held to be in force in those states. See Lux v. Haggin, Crawford Co. v. Hathaway, and Watkins Land Co. v. Clements, supra, for the holding that such common-law doctrine is in force in the Western states in question. But it is true that these decisions in the particular just mentioned are largely influenced, as appears therefrom, by the consideration of the policy of the federal and such Western state governments with respect to confining the grants of land to any one individual to a limited quantity of land.

However, in view of the location of the dwelling house of the appellee with respect to the watershed of that portion of the stream in question in the case before us, at which dwelling the appellee claims the right to use the water, it is unnecessary for us to consider the question whether the land on which the dwelling house is located is or is not riparian land, because of the fact that it was not acquired by one and the same transaction by which the title to the Cameron land was originally acquired. For, as we have seen, if such land is not on the watershed of that portion of the stream which is above the town lot, and if the residue of such tract of the appellee's land abuts on the stream only at a location below the town lot, it can, at most, be regarded only as lower riparian land as compared with the town lot, and cannot be held to be riparian at the aforesaid location above the town lot, regardless of whether the title to it and the other land of the appellee was or was not acquired in one transaction within the meaning of the decisions on that subject aforesaid. As we shall presently set out in more detail, the dwelling house land of the appellee is not on the watershed just mentioned, and can therefore, at most, be regarded only as lower riparian land as compared with the town lot aforesaid.

[1] Hence we do not wish to be construed as approving or disapproving in this opinion of the doctrine embodied in the limitations above mentioned other than the aforesaid broader limitation. We, however, do approve of the doctrine of the last-named limitation (to wit, that the land in question in a particular case, to be riparian, must, as one essential condition of fact, be located on the watershed of that portion of the stream which is in question), and it is decisive against the appellee of the question of whether her dwelling house land is riparian at the location on the stream, above the town lot, at which the appellee claims the right to withdraw the water.

[2] As a matter of fact, as appears before us as aforesaid, the dwelling house land is located 350 to 400 feet east of the original Cameron land's eastern boundary line, whereas the town lot extends in width only 175 feet east of such Cameron land line where that line crosses the stream. The dwelling house land therefore is opposite a point on the stream 175 to 225 feet below the town lot and reservoirs, and hence, as determined by its natural location, the dwelling house land of appellee is normally not upon the watershed of the stream above the town lot, but upon the watershed below such lot. That this normal situation conforms to the fact appears from the position taken for the town in the petition for appeal, that any surplus of water not used at said dwelling house will return to the bed of the stream below the town lot, which is not controverted in argument for the appellee.

There seems to be but one reported decision not in accord with the above-mentioned authorities, and that is the case of Jones v. Conn, 39 Or. 30, 64 Pac. 855, 65 Pac. 1068, 87 Am. St. Rep. 634, 54 L. R. A. 630, which is approved in Clark v. Allaman, 71 Kan. 206, 80 Pac. 571, 70 L. R. A. 971, 988, and cited in 40 Cyc. 558, 559, where the doctrine of that case is stated. See the comment on the Jones v. Conn Case in note to 2 Farnham on Waters and Water Rights, p. 1573.

Since the dwelling house land of appellee cannot be regarded as riparian with respect to the portion of the stream above the town lot, from which location appellee claims the right to withdraw the water, this brings us to the next question for our decision and that is this:

[3] 2. Has the appellee the right to use, on her nonriparian dwelling house land, water rights incident to the 25-foot strip of Cameron land, which is riparian to the portion of the stream above the town lot, from which location appellee claims the right to withdraw the water?

This question must be answered in the negative.

The English doctrine on the subject is unquestionably to this effect. See note to 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 383 et seq., and especially the cases there cited of Swindon Waterworks Co. v. Wilts & B. Canal Nav. Co., L. R. 7 H. L.

705, and McCartney v. Londenderry, etc., R. Co. (1904) A. C. 301.

The English doctrine, as usually stated, is that the upper riparian owner cannot rightfully divert to nonriparian land water which he had the right to use on the upper riparian land, but which he does not so use.

To the same effect is the holding of the American cases of Williams v. Wadsworth, 51 Conn. 277, Crawford v. Hathaway, supra, 67 Neb. 325, 93 N. W. 781, 60 L. R. A. 889, 108 Am. St. Rep. 647, and Gould v. Eaton, 117 Cal. 539, 49 Pac. 577, 38 L. R. A. 181.

As said in the last-cited case:

"The superior proprietor cannot, however, divert to nonriparian lands the water which he would have a right to use * * * but which he does not in fact use. * * * If he does not in fact use any of the water himself, the inferior proprietor has a right to the flow of the entire stream."

In 2 Farnham on Waters and Water Rights, this is said:

*"Diversion for Use of Nonriparian Land.—*As was seen during the discussion of the question of the right to use the waters from the stream, there is no right to use it on nonriparian land. This rule makes the diversion of water for use there illegal. * * * There are some exceptions to the rule thus broadly stated. * * * To give the lower owner a ground of complaint the quantity taken to the nonriparian land must be sufficient to inflict a perceptible injury on him," citing both English and American cases.

The English case of Earl of Sandwich v. Great Northern Ry. Co., L. R. 10, Ch. Div. 707, cited and relied on for appellee, was expressly disapproved in the later case of McCartney v. Londenderry, etc., R. Co., supra (1904) A. C. 301.

In regard to the case of Stonegap Colliery Co. v. Hamilton, 119 Va. 271, 89 S. E. 305, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 60, cited and relied on for appellee to sustain the position that this court has held that the owner of two contiguous tracts of land may recover damages to both tracts due to the destruction of a spring on one of the tracts, this should be said: The opinion in the case does not, nor does the declaration, disclose the fact now to be mentioned; but as appears from the brief for plaintiff, which is not controverted in this particular, the spring, for the destruction of which damages were allowed, flowed in its natural channel from the one tract to the other, both tracts being riparian. Hence the case is not in point in the case now before us.

There is more seeming divergence in the holding of the American cases on the subject under consideration than there is among the English decisions, as appears from the following American cases cited and relied on for appellee, namely: Elliot v. Fitzburg R. R. Co., 10 Cush. (Mass.) 191, 57 Am. Dec.

85; Stratton v. Mt. Harmon School, supra, 216 Mass. 83, 103 N. E. 87, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 57, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 768; Harris v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 153 N. C. 542, 69 S. E. 623, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 543, 138 Am. St. Rep. 686; Atchison, etc., Ry. Co. v. Shriver, 101 Kan. 257, 103 Pac. 519; and Jones v. Conn, supra, 39 Or. 30, 64 Pac. 855, 65 Pac. 1068, 87 Am. St. Rep. 634, 54 L. R. A. 630, in which Gillis v. Chase, 67 N. H. 161, 31 Atl. 18, 68 Am. St. Rep. 645, is cited and quoted from. See, also, Jones v. Acqueduct, 62 N. H. 488. But this divergence is, we think, more seeming than real.

These American cases hold, or are based upon the principle, that while, accurately speaking, the English doctrine referred to above is correct, still in an action for damages or suit for injunction by a lower against an upper riparian landowner for wrongful diversion of water by the latter, either upon the upper riparian land or therefrom to nonriparian land, the plaintiff, in order to prevail, must show some substantial actual damage occasioned by the diminution of the quantity of the water which the plaintiff has the right to use, or (in cases of suits for injunction) threatened damages, by the claim of right of the defendant and his conduct in asserting same being of such character as to set in motion the running of the prescriptive period against the right of the plaintiff, so that in time such right would be barred by prescription unless the injunction is awarded. This, of course, is a proper qualification of the English doctrine as stated above, for, as pointed out by Chief Justice Shaw in the opinion of the court in Elliot v. Fitzburg R. R. Co., supra, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 191, 57 Am. Dec. 85, and as is said in Stratton v. Mt. Harmon School, supra, 216 Mass. at page 88, 103 N. E. at page 89, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) at page 61, Ann. Cas. 1915A, at page 771:

"Any other conclusion * * * would lead to the absurd result that every riparian proprietor from near the source of a river or any of its confluents to the sea could maintain an action and recover nominal damage for an abstraction and diversion so trifling as to be beyond the possibility of ever causing actual injury."

But the English doctrine does not, in truth, differ from the holding of the American cases above referred to with respect to the qualification just mentioned. That qualification is recognized by the English cases aforesaid. See Swindon Waterworks Co. v. Wilts, etc., Co., supra, L. R. 7 H. L. at p. 705; also Norbury v. Kitchin, 9 Jur. N. S. 132, cited for appellee, in which latter case the flow of the stream was 60,000 gallons and only 6,000 gallons were diverted by the upper riparian proprietor to nonriparian land, leaving the plaintiff, the lower riparian owner, an ample supply of water in quantity for the uses of it to which he was entitled.

It would seem, therefore, that there is, in truth, no distinctly English or American doctrine on the subject under consideration, and that the doctrine is one and the same in both jurisdictions, being subject in both to the qualification aforesaid.

Further: It is plain that the qualification mentioned does not confer upon an upper riparian owner the right to use, on nonriparian land, water rights incident to the ownership of upper riparian land; such qualification being primarily concerned with and directly affecting merely the extent of the relief to which a lower riparian owner is entitled, who complains of the threatened or actual diversion by an upper riparian owner of water for use on nonriparian land.

This brings us to the next and sole remaining question for our consideration, namely:

3. What is the extent of the relief to which the town is entitled in the case before us?

As we have seen above, the threatened unrestricted diversion of water by the appellee must be regarded as wrongful. But:

[4] As appears from the authorities above referred to (and especially from the American cases), and as results from the application of the principles involved, the extent of the relief to which the town, as plaintiff, in such a case as that before us, is entitled, is measured by the extent of the right the plaintiff has to the use of the water. Relief by injunction being sought by the town, that right of use of the water, to the extent that it exists, should be protected from all substantial injury, whether actual or threatened, by the wrongful continuous diversion of the water by the upper riparian owner. Beyond this the court will not go to the relief of the plaintiff, whatever may be the lack of abstract right in the upper riparian owner to divert the water.

Now the case before us, as made by the allegations of the bill, is not one in which the plaintiff, the town, will suffer no actual damage and will not have the running of the prescriptive period set in motion and running against it, if the appellee is allowed to locate and insert her pipes and proceed to withdraw at all times the water she demands under the claim of right aforesaid. If this were a case in which, notwithstanding such action of the appellee, there would be still left flowing in the stream a sufficient quantity of water (the quality not being drawn in question in the case) to supply the town at all times with all the water it has acquired the right to use, the court below might properly have declined to decide the issue of right raised between the parties to the suit and might have properly refused to award the injunction. But such is not the case made by the bill.

[5-8] It is true that the right of the town, as a riparian owner, to the use of the water of the stream, is, under the authorities above mentioned, limited to uses on its one-acre lot, and, as an original proposition, it had no more right to divert any water not used on this riparian lot to the town itself (a nonriparian locality) than the appellee has to divert to her dwelling house land water not used on her riparian Cameron land. It is also true, as we think, that the Weaver deed to the town did not confer upon it the right to the use of any more water from the stream than was incident to the ownership of the one-acre lot. It is also true that the contract of the town with the said Alexander Cameron did not divest or deprive him, or the appellee, as his heir or as grantee of the 25-foot strip of the land from his other heirs, of the riparian right claimed by appellee, if the said Cameron or the appellee would otherwise have possessed it. It is also further true, as urged in argument for appellee, that the adverse uses of the water by the town as lower riparian owner has not conferred upon the town any right thereto by prescription, as against upper riparian owners. As said in 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 365:

"A lower riparian owner cannot, by prescription, acquire, as against an upper riparian owner, the right to divert the water course, as the upper owner cannot be injured by such diversion and therefore has no legal ground to object thereto."

No cause of action ever arises in such case in favor of the upper against the lower riparian owner, so as to commence the running of the prescriptive period.

[9] But, upon the facts alleged in the bill, the town by its adverse collection, dominion, and control of all the water of the stream which flowed down to its said lot, and its adverse diversion and use of all the water it has been diverting under claim of right for much longer than the prescriptive period before this suit was instituted, has acquired by prescription a substantial right against all lower riparian landowners (and hence a vested right) to the exclusive use of the water to that extent, which right would be interfered with by the unlimited exercise of the right claimed by the appellee aforesaid. So that, if all injunctive relief to the town were denied the town would sustain substantial damage, as appears from the allegations of the bill, in times of drought, from the aforesaid threatened action of the appellee; and, besides, such action, if not restrained to some extent, would set in motion the running of the prescriptive period against the town, which would in time bar, pro tanto, its exclusive right to the use of the water to the extent that it has by prescription acquired the right to use it.

The case of Williams v. Wadsworth, supra, 51 Conn. 277, in which the plaintiff was held to be entitled to an injunction, is, in essential particulars, on all fours with the case before us. We do not mean by this citation that we approve of all that is said in the opinion in the case, but its holding in result seems to us to conform to correct principles. In that case the plaintiff, on land acquired for that purpose, built and maintained a dam across a small stream, and, for a longer period than what was held in that case to be the prescriptive period, diverted as much water as would run through a two-inch pipe to his farm, about half a mile distant, no part of which was riparian, for use on such farm and also for sale to other persons. The stream in winter seasons was of considerable size, containing a volume of water largely in excess of that which plaintiff had acquired the prescriptive right to divert, but in summer it was reduced in quantity in times of drought, and when a drought was severe the flow of the stream was reduced to less than what would run through plaintiff's two-inch pipe. In the report of the case it is said:

"In the winter season, and in times of heavy rains, [the] diversion * * * caused no injury or damage to the plaintiff; but at times in the summer he has sustained injury by reason thereof."

That suit was instituted shortly after the diversion by the defendant commenced. The court held that—

"The defendant should be enjoined against such use of the water upon land not riparian as will prevent the supply of the plaintiff's two-inch pipe."

So in the case before us we are of opinion that the court below erred in dismissing the bill and in refusing all injunctive relief; that the bill should be retained; and that upon the coming in of the proof the appellee should be perpetually enjoined and restrained from withdrawing the water from the location aforesaid, or any other above the reservoirs of the town, in such quantity at any time as will in any degree diminish the quantity of water which the proof may show that the town has by prescription acquired the right to divert for its daily supply.

The decree under review will be reversed and annulled, and the cause will be remanded for further proceedings not in conflict with the views expressed in the above opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

NOTE.

RICHMOND CEDAR WORKS et al. v. HARPER et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 17, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error \S 41—Appeal does not lie unless jurisdiction to entertain is conferred by Constitution or statute.

An appeal from the decision of an inferior court or from a special tribunal organized for a special purpose does not lie unless jurisdiction to entertain such appeal is conferred by Constitution or statute.

2. Master and servant \S 417(4½)—Compensation case not reviewable after time limit.

Under Workmen's Compensation Act, \S 61, there can be no appeal from a decision of the Commission after the 30 days allowed therefor have expired.

3. Master and servant \S 416½, New, vol. 11A Key-No. Series—Enforcement of compensation award provided for by act.

Workmen's Compensation Act, \S 62, was enacted to provide a means not only of enforcing an award which had been affirmed on appeal, but also all the final awards of the Commission from which there has been no appeal, as well as all agreements between the parties approved by the Commission.

4. Master and servant —417(1)—Supreme Court of Appeal without jurisdiction of appeal from Industrial Commission.

The Supreme Court of Appeals is without jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from the Industrial Commission's award, unless possibly under Const. 1902, § 88, where a constitutional question is raised, or there is an attempt to exceed jurisdiction justifying exercise of original jurisdiction to issue the writ of prohibition; the Workmen's Compensation Act, §§ 61 and 62, providing exclusive remedies for review, notwithstanding the general provisions in Code 1919, § 6336, for appeals.

Error to Circuit Court, Norfolk County.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Mary Lucy Harper and others against the Richmond Cedar Works, employer, and the Liberty Mutual Insurance Company, insurance carrier, to recover compensation for the death of Leroy Harper, employee. Compensation was adjudged, and employer and insurance carrier bring error. On motion to dismiss writ of error. Dismissed for lack of jurisdiction.

Venable, Miller, Pilcher & Parsons, of Norfolk, and Varney S. Ward, of Richmond, for plaintiffs in error.

J. W. Willcox, of Norfolk, for defendants in error.

PRENTIS, J. The defendants in error, the widow and children of Leroy Harper, deceased, who lost his life while working as an employee of the Richmond Cedar Works, were adjudged compensation under the Virginia Workmen's Compensation Act (Acts 1918, p. 637). They have moved to dismiss the writ of error which has been allowed in this case, among other reasons, upon the ground that this court has no jurisdiction to review the judgment.

[1] We get little assistance from the numerous cases which have arisen in other jurisdictions, because of the differing methods of procedure and varying constitutional and statutory provisions regulating the right of appeal. The general rules appear to be well settled, and it is generally agreed that an appeal from the decision of an inferior court or from a special tribunal organized for a specific purpose does not lie, unless jurisdiction to entertain such appeal is conferred by Constitution or statute. Generally, however, provision is made for appeals or writs of error to review such final decisions under specified restrictions and limitations.

In Fitt v. Central Illinois Public Service Co., 273 Ill. 617, 113 N. E. 155, it is held that under section 19 of the Illinois Workmen's Compensation Act (Laws 1913, p. 347), as amended in 1915 (Laws 1915, p. 408), the circuit court, upon the application for judgment on the award of the Industrial Board, has no jurisdiction to inquire into the question whether the Industrial Board has acted legally in making the award, but is only authorized to enter judgment on the award, because the statute provides other methods by which the action of such Board may be reviewed.

Bernstein v. Brothman, 275 Ill. 290, 114 N. E. 120, also holds that the methods of review provided by the Illinois act are exclusive, and that the circuit court, on an application for a judgment on such award, cannot inquire into the legality of the action of the Board.

In the Matter of State Industrial Commission, 224 N. Y. 13, 119 N. E. 1027, it is held that the Court of Appeals of New York had no jurisdiction to answer a legal question certified to it by the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, and it is interesting to note that the court held that such a question must arise in a case actually pending before the Industrial Commission, and could not be asked merely for the purpose of securing an advisory opinion.

In Thaxter v. Finn, 178 Cal. 270, 173 Pac. 163, it is held that even though an award in favor of an employee of a subcontractor against the principal contractor would have been annulled by the Supreme Court for want of power in the Industrial Accident Commission to make it, if the proceedings to review the award had been instituted within the time fixed by the statute, still, where no proceeding of review has been inaugurated within the time thus limited, the judgment is not a nullity, but the award is conclusively presumed to be lawful and binding as against any kind of attack, collateral or otherwise. This, it is observed, is a case where, if the statute authorizing the review had been followed, the award would have been annulled because the Commission exceeded its jurisdiction.

In Harriss-Irby Cotton Co. v. State, 81 Okl. 603, 122 Pac. 163, it is said that the Supreme Court of Oklahoma, although it has jurisdiction to review some of the orders of the State Corporation Commission, has no such jurisdiction to review an order requiring a cotton gin to be operated by its owner for the accommodation of the public at a fixed price, because the statute under which the Commission acted did not provide for an appeal.

In Southern Ry. Co. v. Glenn, 102 Va. 533, 46 S. E. 776, this is said:

"The benefit of appeal is a purely statutory right. When parties come to this court to have reviewed the action of a lower court, their only warrant for doing so is the statute, and its terms must be strictly complied with. Section 3454 of the Code of 1887 declares that any person who is a party to any case in chancery, wherein there is a decree or order adjudicating the principles of the cause, who thinks himself aggrieved thereby, may present a petition for an appeal from such decree or order. The person referred to in this statute has been decided to be such person as was a party to the suit in the court below, and who was aggrieved by the decree therein rendered; and to make him a proper party to an appeal these two circumstances must concur."

In Tyson v. Scott, 116 Va. 243, 81 S. E. 57, the principle is stated thus in the syllabus:

"The jurisdiction of this court rests wholly upon the written law, and can be exercised only in obedience to the Constitution and laws passed in pursuance thereof. Statutes of limitation are deemed statutes of repose, and this conception of such statutes applies with peculiar force to limitations upon the right of appeal. Where the Legislature has prescribed the method for the exercise of the right of appeal, or supervision, such method is exclusive, and neither court nor judge can modify these rules without express statutory authority, and then only to the extent specified."

The right of appeal, then, is clearly not a vested right, but is subject to legislative control, and only exists if conferred by Constitution or statute. Sullivan v. Haug, 82 Mich. 548, 46 N. W. 795, 10 L. R. A. 263.

Many pertinent cases from other jurisdictions may be found cited in 3 Corpus Juris, p. 274.

For the plaintiffs in error it is claimed that the statutory authority which is thus shown to be necessary exists, and that it is found in that portion of the Code of 1919, § 6336,¹ which enumerates the classes of cases in which this court has jurisdiction, and concludes by authorizing any person thinking himself aggrieved by a final judgment, decree, or order, in any civil case, to present a petition, if the case be in chancery, for an appeal from the decree or order, and if not in chancery for a writ of error and supersedeas to the judgment or order complained of; whereas, for the claimants it is urged that this statute does not apply to such a proceeding as this, and that the remedies expressly provided by the Virginia Workmen's Compensation Act are exclusive.

The sections of the act immediately involved are sections 61 and 62, which are as follows:

Sec. 61. Appeals.—"The award of the Commission, as provided in section fifty-nine, if not reviewed in due time, or an award of the Commission upon such review, as provided in section sixty, shall be conclusive and binding as to all questions of fact; but either party to the dispute may within thirty days from the date of such award or within thirty days after receipt of notice to be sent by registered mail, of such award but not thereafter, appeal from the decision of such Commission to the circuit court of the county or corporation court of the city in which the alleged accident happened or in which the employer resides or has his principal office; or if the cause be in the city of Richmond, then to the circuit or law and equity court of said city; the form and manner of said appeal shall be prescribed by the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia within thirty days after this act takes effect. The judge shall hear and determine the case within thirty days after the granting of the appeal if court be in session, and if court be not in session the judge granting such appeal shall hear and determine the case within thirty days after the beginning of the ensuing term. The Commission, of its own motion, may certify questions of law to the Supreme Court of Appeals for decision and determination by the said court. In case of an appeal from the decision of the Commission, or of a certification by said Commission of questions of law, to the Supreme Court of Appeals, said appeal or certification shall operate as a supersedeas, and no employer shall be required to make payment of the award involved in said appeal or certification until the questions at issue therein shall have been fully determined in accordance with the provisions of this act."

Sec. 62. Judgment May be Filed.—"Any party in interest may file in the circuit or corporation court of the county or city in which the injury occurred, or if it be in the city of Richmond, then in the circuit or law and equity court of said city, a certified copy of a memorandum of agreement approved by the Commission, or of an order or decision of the Commission, or of an award of the Commission unappealed from, or of an award of the Commission affirmed upon appeal, whereupon said court shall render judgment in accordance therewith and notify the parties. Such judgment shall have the same effect, and all proceedings in re-taxation and assessing taxes thereon, or any person who is a party to any case in chancery wherein there is a decree or order dissolving an injunction, or requiring money to be paid, or the possession or title of property to be changed, or adjudicating the principles of a cause, or any person thinking himself aggrieved by the order of a judge or court refusing a writ of quo warranto, or by the final judgment on said writ, or by a final judgment, decree, or order in any civil case, may present a petition, if the case be in chancery, for an appeal from the decree or order; and if not in chancery, for a writ of error or supersedeas to the judgment or order, except as provided in the following section; provided, however, that the commonwealth may take an appeal from the action of the State Corporation Commission in all cases, irrespective of the amount involved."

lation thereto shall thereafter be the same, as though said judgment had been rendered in a suit duly heard and determined by said court."

The question thus presented requires a careful consideration of the purpose of the act as well as of its provisions. Its general purpose is, of course, well known. It was adopted in response to a public sentiment, which is said by the Industrial Commission of Virginia to have developed thus rapidly:

"The first workmen's compensation law was enacted by Germany in 1884. Since that time compensation acts have been adopted by over 50 countries, comprising all the great industrial nations of the world.

"In the United States, the first general workmen's compensation act to stand the test of constitutionality was the New Jersey Law of 1911. Similar laws have now been adopted by 38 states and 3 territories. Congress, in 1916, passed a compensation act covering all civil employees in the service of the federal government.

"The widespread favor with which these laws have been received is due to the fact that they are the outgrowth of natural conditions, and are based upon principles which men and women have come to regard as just."

The Virginia act has features which are common to nearly if not quite all such laws, and has for its humane purpose the providing for all workmen coming within its provisions who are injured during the course of their employment of compensation therefor which is certain in amount without deduction. The doctrines of contributory negligence, assumed risk, and all of those defenses which have so frequently defeated recoveries, occupied the time of courts, and crowded their dockets are abolished. Some of these advantages are thus summarized by the Virginia Commission:

"The compensation system has many advantages over the common and statutory liability laws. These advantages accrue to no one class, but are shared alike by employee, employer, and society at large.

"1. The injured employee receives definite and timely relief without the uncertainty and expense of a lawsuit. Under the older system only a small percentage of accidents were compensated, and in many of these cases the compensation was totally inadequate.

"2. The employer knows that the sums paid by him, or by his insurer, go directly and in full to his injured workmen. The elimination of waste in the litigation of claims will have a material effect in keeping the cost of compensation within reasonable limits.

"Moreover, the certainty that compensation will be paid is conducive to the contentment of the worker, and the removal of friction promotes harmony and productive efficiency.

"3. Society itself benefits through the elimination, in a large measure, of the expense of negligence cases, estimated to consume from one-fifth to one-third of the time and expense of the courts, and through the reduction of poverty and destitution."

Minor's Workmen's Compensation Laws, p. 583.

Bearing in mind the objects in view, it is helpful to consider certain specific provisions of the statute.

Section 12 provides that the rights and remedies granted by the act to an employee coming within its provisions "shall exclude all other rights or remedies of such employee, his personal representative, parents, dependents or next of kin, at common law or otherwise, on account of such injury, loss of service or death." Section 52 creates a Commission to be appointed by the Governor, requires each member thereof to devote his entire time to the duties of his office, and forbids his holding any position of trust or profit, or engaging in any occupation or business interfering or inconsistent with his duties as such member. Section 55 (a) provides, among other things, that "Processes and procedure under this act shall be as summary and simple as reasonably may be." Section 58 requires that immediately after application shall be made for compensation the Commission shall set a date for the hearing, which shall be held as soon as practicable, and in the city or county wherein the injury occurred, unless otherwise agreed to by the parties and authorized by the Commission. Section 59 requires the Commission to hear the parties at issue and their representatives and witnesses, and to "determine the dispute in a summary manner." Section 61, which has been heretofore quoted, shows that the award of the Commission, if not reviewed in due time, as provided in the statute, or an award of the Commission after said review, shall be conclusive and binding as to all questions of fact, but permits an appeal within 30 days, but not thereafter, to the circuit court of the county, or corporation court of the city, in which the alleged accident happened, or in which the employer resides or has his principal office, or, if in Richmond, to the circuit court or the law and equity court of the city.

[2] Under this section (61), it is certain that there can be no appeal from the decision of the Commission after the 30 days has expired. As a further indication of the intention of the Legislature to eliminate the expense and delay of litigation which heretofore have so embarrassed claimants injured in such accidents, the judge of the court, within 30 days after granting the appeal, is directed to hear and determine it, and, if the court be not in session, to determine it within 30 days after the beginning of the ensuing term. This repeated insistence upon promptness in procedure would be unavailing if, in addition to the appeal which the act provides, there is also under the general statute (section 6336) another appeal to this court. The advantages of economy and prompt relief which it is the purpose of the act to afford such claimants would be denied if such additional appeal lies.

Before the act the plaintiff in an action for personal injury had his case tried in the circuit or corporation court, with an appeal to this court if the jurisdictional amount was involved. If, notwithstanding the act, an appeal to this court still lies, then such a claimant may be subjected to the expense and delay of the initial trial before the Industrial Commission, followed by two appeals, one to the local court followed by another to this court. Experience teaches that civil rights are best protected by one appeal in every case, both because it induces greater care in the tribunal of original jurisdiction, and prevents the arbitrary exercise of power, as well as because it gives to the appellate court the opportunity for more careful investigation and maturer consideration for the correction of those errors which are inevitable in every human endeavor. These reasons, as a general rule, however, do not justify more than one appeal, because the evils of the consequential delay and expense far outweigh the possible advantages of such additional appeal. The unavoidable delays of the law are many, and for this reason all unnecessary delay in the administration of justice should be avoided, for delay has always constituted one of the greatest evils of the law.

It may be difficult for those of us who are accustomed to the Virginia practice readily to accede to the view that this court has no jurisdiction in such cases, but we think that this chiefly grows out of that conservatism which constrains many lawyers and judges to adhere too tenaciously to their previous habits of thought and conduct. That the Legislature intended to enact a complete statute, designed to supply an adequate remedy in every case which might arise under it, is manifested by its 79 sections, with their multitudinous and detailed provisions. The act creates new rights and provides new remedies whereby they may be asserted and maintained.

The last clause of section 61 is itself most significant. It provides that no employer shall be required to make payment of the award until the questions at issue shall have been fully determined "in accordance with the provisions of this act." As it seems to us, this makes it apparent that in the act itself we should seek and find the safeguard of every right thereby created. That the Legislature intended this to be true is not only indicated by the clause of section 61 just quoted, but also by section 66, which reads:

"All questions arising under this act, if not settled by agreement of the parties interested therein, with the approval of the Commission, shall be determined by the Commission, except as otherwise herein provided."

Here again the Legislature has manifested its intention to limit the rights and remedies of those interested to the provisions of the act itself, and thus to exclude the application of the general statute with reference to appeals and writs of error. The Legislature also, apparently anticipating that there might be contrariety of decision between the various corporation and circuit courts, has expressly authorized the Commission to propound questions of law to this court, and this provision is sufficient to insure uniformity of construction, and thus to avoid the uncertainty of which otherwise there would be danger.

[3] It is said, however, that a consideration of section 62 affects the question. It is observed that the Commission has no power to enforce its own judgments, and section 61 does not expressly give the circuit or corporation courts any power to enforce its own judgments on appeal. Section 62 was clearly enacted for the purpose of providing a means not only of enforcing an award which had been affirmed on such appeal, but also all other final awards of the Commission from which there had been no appeal, as well as all agreements between the parties approved by the Commission. When this section is invoked, however, the rights of the claimants have already been established. The proceeding then resembles a motion under our statute for execution upon a forthcoming or delivery bond. There is neither necessity nor reason for the procedure under section 62, unless the defendants fail to pay the amounts awarded the claimants. At that time, all of the rights of the parties having been previously litigated and determined, the court is required to render judgment in accordance either with (a) the agreement of the parties, which has been approved by the Commission, (b) an award of the Commission which has not been appealed from, or (c) an award of the Commission which has been previously affirmed upon appeal. At this stage of the proceeding the court is vested with no discretion; the statute is mandatory, and the refusal to render such judgment as that section requires could be compelled by mandamus. It seems hardly necessary to say that action which can certainly be compelled by mandamus cannot be appealed from. The order of the court, under section 62, in rendering judgment so that execution may be had, is the exercise of a ministerial function, and the mere method provided by the Legislature for enforcing the collection by legal process of the amount already legally ascertained to be due, that is, by execution of fieri facias, or any other appropriate process for enforcing a judgment.

[4] Our judgment therefore is to sustain the motion to dismiss the writ because this court is without jurisdiction to entertain appeals either from the Industrial Commission or from the circuit or corporation courts in cases arising under the Virginia Workmen's Compensation Act, unless possibly under section 88 of the Constitution some constitutional question has been raised in the proceeding, or there be some attempt to exceed the jurisdiction conferred, which would justify the exercise of the original jurisdiction of this court to issue the writ of prohibition.

This conclusion makes it unnecessary for us to consider the other interesting questions discussed in the briefs.

Dismissed for lack of jurisdiction.

SMITH v. CITY OF NEWPORT NEWS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 17, 1921.)

Error to Corporation Court of Newport News.

Proceedings by one Smith against City of Newport News. Judgment was rendered by the corporation court of the City of Newport News upon appeal from a finding of the State Industrial Commission, and plaintiff brings error. Dismissed.

A. C. Garrett, of Newport News, for plaintiff in error.

Lett & Massie, of Newport News, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. This is a writ of error to a judgment of the corporation court of the city of Newport News rendered by that court upon an appeal from a finding of the Industrial Commission of Virginia. Upon the authority of the opinion of this court handed down to-day in the case of Richmond Cedar Works & Harper, 106 S. ROBERTSON'S EX'R v. ATLANTIC COAST REALTY CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.

1. Witnesses \S 183½, New, vol. 9 Key-No. Series—Agent of plaintiff corporation held not "adverse or interested party" under statute in action against executor.

In an action by a realty company for breach of a parol contract whereby it was to have the exclusive sales privilege of land owned by defendant's decedent, plaintiff's agent held not an "adverse or interested party" within Code 1919, § 6209, so as to require corroboration of his testimony, he being competent at common law, and not rendered incompetent by the statute, notwithstanding he was plaintiff's contracting agent in making the contract sued upon.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Adverse Party.]

2. Witnesses \S 164(1)—Decedent's memoranda and bill to perpetuate testimony held inadmissible in action against executor.

In a realty corporation's action against an executor for breach of an oral contract of agency with decedent, a memorandum, made by decedent before his death, containing a full statement of the matter in controversy, and a bill to perpetuate testimony, held inadmissible under Code 1919, § 6209, providing that if an adverse party testifies, all entries, memoranda, and declarations by the party incapable of testifying, made while capable, are admissible; no adverse party having testified.

3. Appeal and error \S 971(1)—Examination of witnesses chiefly in discretion of court.

The subject of examination of witnesses lies chiefly in the discretion of the court in which the case is tried, and its exercise is rarely, if ever, controlled by the appellate court.

4. Trial \S 62(2)—Refusal to allow recall of witness for defendant after plaintiff had rested held error.

In a realty corporation's action on an oral contract of agency made with decedent in his lifetime, it was error to refuse to allow decedent's widow to be recalled, after plaintiff had rested, to testify as to whether a complete and unconditional contract had been entered into, or whether a mere proposition had been made.

5. Appeal and error \S 499(3), 500(3)—Objections must be incorporated by bill or certificate of exceptions.

Where objections to reception of evidence and rulings thereon are relied on, they must be made parts of the record by proper bills of exception, or certificates of exception, otherwise they will be deemed to have been waived.

6. Witnesses \S 318—Reputation for truth inadmissible, where veracity not assailed.

In a realty company's action for breach of an alleged oral agency contract with defendant's decedent, originally brought against decedent, it was not error to exclude evidence as to decedent's reputation for truth and veracity, where decedent had not testified, and his reputation for truth and veracity had not been assailed.

7. Brokers \S 11—Evidence as to local real estate market after breach of exclusive agency contract held inadmissible in suit for breach.

In a realty company's action for breach of an exclusive agency to sell decedent's realty, entered into before his death, where it appeared that decedent, after the execution of the contract, had himself sold the land to another, it was not error to exclude evidence as to the condition of the real estate market in the vicinity shortly after the alleged breach.

8. Trial ¶191(3)—Instruction assuming facts testified to by impeached witness held erroneous.

In a realty company's action against an executor for breach of an exclusive agency contract made with decedent, it was error for the court to instruct on an assumption that the employment was for 12 months, where a witness testifying to that point was claimed by defendant to be impeached.

9. Brokers ¶11—Plaintiff, suing for breach of exclusive agency contract, may base loss of profits on sale to another.

In a realty company's action for breach of an exclusive agency contract for sale of realty, based on a sale by the owner himself after the contract had been entered into, plaintiff could elect to base its loss of profits on the sale actually made by the owner.

Errors to Hustings Court of Petersburg.

Assumpsit by the Atlantic Coast Realty Company against Robertson's Executor. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Mann & Townsend, of Petersburg, and C. V. Meredith, of Richmond, for plaintiff in error.

Lassiter & Drewry, of Petersburg, and James Mann, of Norfolk, for defendant in error.

BURKS, J. This is an action of assumpsit brought by the Atlantic Coast Realty Company, a North Carolina corporation doing business in Virginia, against the executor of Wirt Robertson, to recover damages for the breach of an alleged parol contract, whereby the plaintiff was to have the exclusive privilege of selling a tract of 418 acres of land of Robertson for a stipulated compensation. Action was first brought in the United States District Court at Richmond, against Robertson in his lifetime. There was a demurrer to the declaration, which was sustained, but on appeal to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals the judgment was reversed, and the cause remanded for a trial on the merits. 240 Fed. 372, 153 C. C. A. 298. There the plaintiff asked leave to amend its declaration, but the application was refused, whereupon the plaintiff suffered a nonsuit, and brought the present action in the hustings court of the city of Petersburg, Robertson having died in the meantime. The defendant demurred to the declaration, and the demurrer was sustained. On a writ of error from this court, the judgment of the hustings court sustaining the demurrer was reversed, and the case remanded. Atlantic Coast Realty Co. v. Townsend, 124 Va. 490, 98 S. E. 684. At the trial on the merits, the plaintiff demurred to the defendant's evidence, and the hustings court rendered judgment thereon in favor of the plaintiff, and to that judgment the writ of error in this case was awarded.

The alleged contract and the negotiations leading up thereto were made and conducted solely by W. E. Burke as contracting agent on behalf of the Atlantic Coast Realty Company, which was engaged in the real estate brokerage business, and Wirt Robertson. No one else was present when the negotiations were conducted, or when the verbal contract is alleged to have been made.

Shortly after the controversy arose, Robertson, being conscious that he was in poor health and would probably live but a short time, at the suggestion of his counsel made a full statement in writing of the whole matter now in controversy, and at a later date filed a bill, sworn to, in the District Court of the United States at Richmond, to perpetuate his testimony, but died before his testimony could be taken.

The plaintiff introduced but one witness, the said W. E. Burke. After he had testified and the plaintiff's counsel announced that they had no further evidence to offer, counsel for the defendant moved to strike out his testimony because it was not corroborated, but the motion was overruled. The defendant's counsel then offered in evidence the written statement aforesaid of Robertson, and also a duly certified copy of the bill to perpetuate his testimony aforesaid, but upon objection by the plaintiff both were excluded. Exceptions were duly taken to the ruling of the trial court in each instance. The motion to strike and also the offer in evidence of the statement and the bill were founded on section 6209 of the Code, which defendant's counsel claimed was applicable to the case. At the time the contract is alleged to have been made Burke owned 10 shares of the stock of the plaintiff company, but at the time he testified he owned no stock in the company, was not an officer thereof, and had no pecuniary interest in the subject of litigation, though he was still an agent of the company.

The above adverse rulings of the trial court constitute the first and second assignments of error, but they will be considered together.

Section 6209 is as follows:

"In an action or a suit by or against a person who, from any cause, is incapable of testifying, or by or against the committee, trustee, executor, administrator, heir or other representative of the person so incapable of testifying, no judgment or decree shall be rendered in favor of an adverse or interested party founded on his uncorroborated testimony; and in any such action or suit, if such adverse party testifies, all entries, memoranda, and declarations by the party so incapable of testifying made while he was capable, relevant to the matter in issue, may be received as evidence."

The revisors' note to this section is in part as follows:

"This section is new; and sections 3346, 3347, 3348 and 3349 of the Code of 1887 have been omitted and thereby repealed. The present Code makes material changes in the law governing the competency of witnesses to testify. The following excerpt is taken from the Report of the Revisors made to the General Assembly at its session of 1918:

"The subject of the competency of witnesses to testify was one that received very careful consideration by the revisors. Nearly all of the difficulties that have arisen in practice have grown out of the exceptions to the rule that interest should not disqualify a witness. In the draft submitted the revisors have removed practically all disqualifications except to protect confidential communications, especially between husband and wife. In order to meet the difficulties that may arise in consequence of a removal of disqualifications, the revisors have added a new section declaring." (See section 6209 above.) "It was believed that this section, together with the great safeguard of cross-examination, would be ample protection for the estates of persons laboring under disability or who are incapable of testifying. In the business affairs of life all evidence bearing upon the question at issue is received and considered by the business world, and it seemed proper that the same rule should obtain in courts of justice which are enforcing rights arising out of such business transactions."

"Section 3345 of the Code of 1887 (section 6206 of this Code unchanged) removed common-law disqualifications on account of interest or because a party. The exceptions referred to in the above excerpt were imposed by section 3346 of the Code of 1887, for the most part, which exceptions were in turn qualified by sections 3347, 3348 and 3349 of that Code. The principal exception and the one which was most fruitful of litigation was that pertaining to the survivor of a transaction. Most of the states still retain this exception, but in at least two states other than Virginia it has been abolished. (New Mexico and Connecticut.) The objections to the principle of the survivor of a transaction rule cannot be set forth in a note of this character, but they will be found well and ably discussed by Mr. Wigmore, a distinguished authority, in his work on Evidence (1 Wig. Ev. § 578). The objections to the rule in actual operation are best illustrated by the numerous cases which arose under the former law, some of which were of such a character as to call for amendment of the sections by which they were governed."

The statute of New Mexico (Code 1915, § 2175) on this subject had been in force for some years prior to the adoption of our statute, and is as follows:

"In a suit by or against the heirs, executors, administrators or assigns of a deceased person, an opposite or interested party to the suit shall not obtain a verdict, judgment or decision therein, on his own evidence, in respect of any matter occurring before the death of a deceased person, unless such evidence is corroborated by some other material evidence."

The similarity of the two statutes, taken in connection with the note of the revisors, indicates that the Virginia statute was taken from that of New Mexico, though the Virginia statute is much more comprehensive, as it applies to the representative of any person who, from any cause, is incapable of testifying, while the statute of New Mexico is limited to the representative of a "deceased person." There are also other differences in the language of the two statutes; for example, the New Mexico statute requires corroboration of "an opposite or interested party to the suit," while the Virginia statute requires it of "an adverse or interested party." The statutes also differ in their use of the words "evidence" and "testimony."

Prior to the adoption of the Code of 1919, there had been several decisions of the territorial court of New Mexico on the subject of the sufficiency of the corroboration when necessary (Byerts v. Robinson, 9 N. M. 427, 54 Pac. 932; Gillett v. Charez, 12 N. M. 353, 78 Pac. 63), but none on the subject of the circumstances under which corroboration was necessary, nor have we been cited to any case since the territory became a state, except National Rubber Co. v. Oleson, 20 N. M. 624, 151 Pac. 695, decided July 8, 1915, reheard September 8, 1915. In that case suit was brought by a corporation on a contract made through its agent for the sale of bicycle tires. The agent offered to prove the terms of the contract was an officer of the corporation and its representative in making the contract sued on, and it was conceded by counsel for the corporation that he needed corroboration. The court decided nothing on the subject of the necessity for corroboration, but, acting on the concession, held that the corroboration was not sufficient.

In Union Land & Grazing Co. v. Arce, 21 N. M. 115, 152 Pac. 1143 (decided November 1, 1915), it was plain, and in fact undisputed, that corroboration was necessary, and the only question before the court was the sufficiency of the corroboration.

Neither of these cases can be accepted as an interpretation of the New Mexico statute as to when corroboration is necessary, and when we look to the original notes of the revisors and the minutes of their proceedings on file with the clerk of the House of Delegates, we find that section 6209 of the Code, in its present form, was adopted by them in December, 1913, and it is not probable that they had seen either of the foregoing decisions at the time of its adoption and they make no reference to any such cases either in their report to the Legislature or in their notes aforesaid.

Citizens' Nat. Bank of Rosewell v. Bean (N. M.) 190 Pac. 1016, decided in 1920, 2 years after the adoption of the Code, gives the court's interpretation of the holding in the former case of Nat. Rubber Co. v. Oleson, supra; but this is only persuasive authority. We find nothing in these cases to bind us, and feel free to put our own interpretation on section 6209.

[1] The common-law disqualification of interest was abolished in this state in 1866 (Acts 1865-66, pp. 87-88), but the act contained many qualifications and exceptions.¹ From time to time, as decisions were made, it was found that the act was defective or worked hardships, and it was amended by the Legislature. There were qualifications of the section abolishing the disqualification of interest, and exceptions to the qualifications. Serious questions had arisen as to what was the "transaction * * * which was the subject of investigation," and nice distinctions made between the "original party to the transaction" and the "party to the original transaction," and also as to the extent to which disqualification applied. The revisors, for the reasons stated by them, deemed it wise to remove practically all disqualifications. They recognized, however, that in making such removal, and especially in the case of a survivor of a transaction which had been adopted in only a few states, there should be some compensating advantages. Hence they said that in order to meet the difficulties that might arise in consequence of the removal of the disqualifications which they had effected by the repeal of various sections of the then existing statutes, they added section 6209. They required corroboration only of those witnesses whom they had rendered competent to testify by the repeals aforesaid, and not of witnesses already competent. The purpose of the revisors was to remove disqualifications, not to create them in any case, nor to impose burdens on witnesses already competent. Section 3348 of the Code of 1887 provided that if a contract or transaction was personally and solely made or had with an agent of one of the parties, and the agent was dead or incapable of testifying, the other party should not be allowed to testify in his own behalf, except in a few cases mentioned in the statute, but the statute was silent as to the effect of the death of a party, the agent surviving. Under that statute, if the agent died, the other party could not testify, but as far back as 1897, it was held in a most convincing opinion by Judge Riley that if the other party died, the agent could testify because he was competent at common law, even though he was interested in the contract to the extent of his commissions, and the statutes did not create any disabilities. Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Oliver, 95 Va. 445, 28 S. E. 594. The revisors repealed section 3348, with the result that, if the agent dies in such case, the other party is a competent witness, thereby enlarging the capacity of the survivor to testify, but they left untouched the common-law competency of the agent where the other party to the transaction dies. That stands to-day just where it stood in 1897 when the Oliver Case was decided. The parties to this litigation are the Atlantic Coast Realty Company, on the one side, and Robertson's executor, on the other. Burke, the agent of the plaintiff, is not a party to the action, is not an officer of the plaintiff, and has no manner of pecuniary interest in the results of the litigation. As between him and the defendant in the action, he is not "an adverse or interested party." He is simply the plaintiff's agent, competent at common law, and not rendered incompetent by the statute. It is true that he was the plaintiff's contracting agent in making the contract in litigation, and might well have been embraced in the class of witnesses requiring corroboration, but the language of the statute does not cover his situation, and the court cannot extend its provision beyond what the language justifies. If it had been intended to extend the requirement of corroboration to contracting agents, the statute should have said so, but it has not, and the court cannot read that provision into it. The first branch of the statute does not deal with the competency of witnesses, but with the weight to be given to their testimony. It provides that—

"No judgment * * * shall be rendered in favor of an adverse or interested party founded on his uncorroborated testimony."

In order to require corroboration, there must be a witness who testifies in the cause, and he must be seeking a judgment or decree in his favor, and thus be "an adverse or interested party." He must in some way be beneficially interested in the judgment or decree which is sought to be obtained on his testimony against a party who is incapable of testifying, or some representative of such a party. The witness Burke does not come within this category.

[2] What has been said on this branch of the statute necessarily excludes the admissibility in evidence of the memorandum and copy of the bill offered by the defendant. The "entries, memoranda, and declarations" mentioned in the section are only admissible "if such adverse party testifies," but as no such party has testified they are not admissible.

It has been suggested that the construction we have given to the statute gives to corporations, who can contract only through agents, great advantage over private persons, and denies to the latter the equal protection of the law. The agent of a private person stands on the same footing, as to competency, as the agent of a corporation. The right of an agent to testify existed at common law, and he required no more corroboration than any other witness; and, while it might have been well to have required corroboration of a sole contracting agent where the other party to the contract is dead or for any reason incapable of testifying, it is not at all a constitutional necessity. The decision in Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Oliver, supra, has stood for over 20 years without any change by the Legislature, and the revisors made none. If section 3348 of the Code of 1887 were in force to-day, and also section 6209 of the Code of 1919, the result would be the same as that above announced, so that it is not the repeal of that section or of any other statute that affects the plaintiff in error. It is simply that section 6209 might or should have been extended to contracting agents, but was not.

At the trial, one of the main points of controversy was whether a complete and unconditional parol contract had been entered into between the plaintiff, acting through W. E. Burke, its agent, and Wirt Robertson, and, if there was such a contract, the terms thereof, or did what transpired between the parties on the night of September 9, 1915, amount only to a proposition which was left open and had not been accepted on Monday, September 13, 1915, when Robertson sold the property to another party? The plaintiff examined only one witness, its agent Burke, and rested its case. The defendant examined on the point above mentioned Mrs. Robertson, the widow of Wirt Robertson, on Thursday, February 12, 1920. On the next day, counsel for the defendant asked leave to recall Mrs. Robertson to ask her one or two questions. Counsel for the plaintiff objected, but the court overruled the objection, saying:

"I will allow it, but upon intimation of counsel that counsel for the plaintiff want to put Mr. Burke back on the stand, and as he cannot be had at this time, the case will be adjourned over until to-morrow" —and the court was accordingly so adjourned. On the next morning (Saturday), Burke being in court, the court heard, in the absence of the jury, the question proposed to be asked Mrs. Robertson and the answer expected, and refused to allow her to be recalled for the purpose aforesaid, and the defendant excepted. The plaintiff then demurred to the evidence, and the court compelled the defendant to join therein. The trial court sustained the demurrer. But before passing on the correctness of that decision, it is proper that we should first pass upon the correctness of the ruling refusing to permit Mrs. Robertson to be recalled for the purpose aforesaid.

The question of the right to recall a witness who has been previously examined has been so often passed upon by this court that we deem it unnecessary to go outside of our own jurisdiction for authority.

[3] The cases in this jurisdiction state the general rule on the subject with great unanimity, namely, that the subject of the examination of witnesses lies chiefly in the discretion of the court in which the case is tried, and its exercise is rarely, if ever, controlled by the appellate court. This is undoubtedly the general rule. The exceptions to it have been stated with some variation of language, such as that the appellate court will not interfere with the action of a trial court unless it appears that palpable error has been committed, or that the ends of justice require it, or that its abuse was to the prejudice of the other party, or that good cause has been shown why the discretion should have been differently exercised, and the like. Carter v. Edmonds, 80 Va. 63; Atwood v. Shenandoah R. Co., 85 Va. 976, 9 S. E. 748; Burke v. Shaver, 92 Va. 352, 23 S. E. 749; Brooks v. Wilcox, 11 Grat. (52 Va.) 417; Fant v. Miller, 17 Grat. (58 Va.) 219; Tate v. Bank, 96 Va. 765, 32 S. E. 476; Leonard v. St. John, 101 Va. 758, 45 S. E. 474; Sutherland v. Gent, 116 Va. 783, 82 S. E. 713; Wickham v. Leftwich's Adm'x, 112 Va. 225, 70 S. E. 508; Livingston's Case, 7 Grat. (48 Va.) 658, 661. In all of the cases cited, the witness was permitted to be recalled, and the language of the court must be construed in that light, for it is exceptional where injury would be done if the evidence had been received. In only a few cases has the question come up where the trial court excluded the witness. In Wilson v. Wooldridge, 118 Va. 209, 214, 86 S. E. 872, 873, the court refused to allow the witness to be recalled, and stated its reason thus:

"This witness had been fully examined. They had made the statement in chief as to their opinion of the genuineness of Wooldridge's signature, and it was not proposed to examine them upon any new or omitted fact not covered by their original testimony, but merely to ask them whether their opinion had been changed by the testimony of Wooldridge that his supposed signature was a forgery."

It was held that the exclusion was not error.

Nowhere, perhaps, has the rule and the exceptions thereto been more clearly stated than in McDowell's Ex'r v. Crawford, 11 Grat. (52 Va.) 377, 408, where it is said:

"Although the practice of our courts has been liberal in allowing parties, after their evidence is closed, to recall witnesses for the purpose of supplying facts omitted from inadvertence, and, although I think such permission should be given wherever there is no ground to suspect improper practice, the object being to elicit truth and secure the attainment of justice, yet I am aware that the judge, before whom a case is tried, must necessarily have large room for discretion on this subject, and I think an appellate court should seldom interfere with its exercise."

In that case it was held that the discretion of the trial court had been improperly exercised, and that therefore it had committed error.

In Livingston's Case, 7 Gr. (48 Va.) 658, 661, the commonwealth was allowed to recall a witness who had been examined the day before, in order to prove the ownership of property. This examination was permitted after the case was argued and submitted to the jury, and the court held that there was no error in allowing it to be done, saying:

"Whilst we have no hesitation in saying that, as a general rule, after a cause has been submitted to a jury, it is improper to introduce new testimony or examine new witnesses, there can be no doubt of the propriety for good cause shown of admitting new testimony, or the examination of new witnesses. But in allowing this to be done, the court must exercise a sound discretion."

See, also, Armstead's Case, 7 Gr. (48 Va.) 599. From this and other cases it clearly appears that the discretion which is vested in the trial court is not an arbitrary discretion, but a sound judicial discretion, and that an erroneous exercise of it will be corrected.

The right to recall a witness and the right to introduce new testimony are generally treated together, and the right of the court to regulate the order of introduction is practically the same in both.

In Fant v. Miller, supra, which was a chancery case, Judge Moncure quotes from 2 Daniell's Chy. Pr. p. 1150, § 9, as follows:

"But notwithstanding this unwillingness to allow a second examination of the same witness, there are cases in which, if justice requires that a second examination of the same witnesses shall take place, an order will be made to permit it."

And the judge adds:

"In the ninth section, before referred to, are collected many cases, in which a re-examination of a witness was ordered in that country."

Carter v. Edmonds, supra, was also a chancery suit, in which it was said that, when the circumstances of the case and justice require it, an order for the second examination of the same witness will be made, and in the course of the opinion Judge Lewis said:

"In the present case the re-examination was confined to a single point to which, by the inadvertence of her counsel, as recited in the order, the attention of the witness had not been previously called."

In Wilkie v. Richmond Traction Co., 105 Va. 290, 54 S. E. 43, the objection was to introducing new testimony, and not merely recalling the same witness. It was held that no error was committed in excluding the testimony, as

"no reason is shown for not having introduced the witnesses to testify in chief. It is not said that they were absent, or sick, nor that there was any surprise, accident, or mistake, nor any reason whatever given why their introduction as witnesses was delayed." (Italics supplied.)

In Virginia Ry. & P. Co. v. Gorsuch, 120 Va. 655, 91 S. E. 632, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 838, Prentiss, J., says:

"One of the errors assigned is that, after the evidence had been concluded, the defendant company had demurred to the evidence because it had not been proved that the street car was the property of the Virginia Railway & Power Company, although the plaintiff, Mrs. Gorsuch, had rested and concluded her case, after the statement of the grounds of demurrer, the court allowed her to reopen the evidence and prove the ownership of the street car.

"There is no merit in this assignment. At that stage of the proceedings they were in the control of the trial court, and it was the duty of the judge to permit the plaintiff to prove a fact which had been inadvertently omitted, but about which there was no doubt whatever. Had the court refused to do so, it would have been reversible error. Matters of this sort are within the discretion of the trial court, and will not be reviewed unless such discretion is exercised in an arbitrary or obviously improper manner."

It seems plain from the foregoing cases that, while a very wide discretion is vested in the trial court in matters of this kind, and that this discretion will be rarely interfered with, still it is a judicial discretion, subject to review by the appellate court, and will be controlled by said court, whenever the facts and circumstances are such as make it proper to do so.

The parol contract sought to be enforced in this case is said to have been entered into on Thursday night, September 9, 1915. The witness, Burke, by whom the plaintiff proved its case, had a further interview with Wirt Robertson, the owner of the land, on Monday night, September 13, at which he states that Robertson informed him that he had sold the land to another party. On the Tuesday following he states that he made a full memorandum in writing of all the facts and circumstances relating to the case, which he delivered to his counsel, and which was typewritten at counsel's office and read and corrected by him on the Wednesday following, and which was introduced in evidence by the plaintiff on the trial of the instant case. When the case was tried in the United States District Court, Burke testified at length for the plaintiff, and on the present trial he was the only witness examined for the plaintiff. So that he detailed the transaction at least three times; once in the written statement to his counsel, next before the United States District court, and finally in the present case. It is claimed by counsel for the defendant that there were sundry variations and contradictions in his testimony. These criticisms we will not at present investigate.

The statement to his counsel, taken in connection with the testimony in the instant case, has an important bearing on the ruling of the trial court in excluding the re-examination of Mrs. Robertson. The plaintiff was claiming that there was a complete unconditional parol contract between the parties; the defendant that there was simply a proposition made to Robertson by Burke which had not been accepted by Robertson. Burke, in his testimony in this cause, proved a complete unconditional parol contract between the plaintiff, through him as agent, and Robertson for the exclusive agency and selling rights for the tract of land in controversy. He gives the details of the proposition which he said was made to him by Robertson, and which he said he accepted. He states that when the proposition was made to him by Robertson he wished to be clear on it, as the proposition was coming from Robertson. He did not want to enter into it until he was absolutely certain of the full purpose of the proposition, and he asked Robertson to repeat it; that Robertson repeated a portion of it, and he explained in his own language how it looked to him, and that Robertson said, "Yes, that is right," and he told Robertson that he would accept the contract on these terms. He states that he accepted Robertson's proposition, and that they shook hands on the trade; that he had blank contracts, and offered to draw up a contract, but Robertson said, "No," he preferred to have his lawyer, Mr. Townsend, to draw up the contract, and he told Robertson that that was perfectly satisfactory. But to make it absolutely clear that there was no misunderstanding, and that they both thoroughly understood the contract, he went over it again, and Robertson said, "Yes; that is right." He further testified that the trade was complete, and that there was nothing left to be done. Burke further testified that afterwards he was called up over the phone at the Stratford hotel by Robertson, and that Robertson said he was not altogether satisfied as to whether it was best to sell the property as a whole or otherwise, and that he (Burke), not wishing to discuss the matter at a public phone, or over a phone at all, asked Robertson when he could see him, and made an engagement with him for Monday night. When asked as to the time when this conversation over the phone took place, he stated, "My recollection places the telephone conversation as being on Saturday night, and not Sunday night." Burke further testified that in company with J. W. Ferrell, the president of the plaintiff company, he went to see Robertson on Monday night to get the contract that had been drawn up by his attorney; that when asked if he had the contract ready, he said "No;" that he had sold the property; that he had received an offer that was so good that he did not feel like turning it down, or words to that effect. In response to inquiries, he said that he had sold the property to Mr. Barrow, a gentleman from Brunswick county, and that the price was a secret; that he had promised not to tell it.

At this juncture, it is proper to state the testimony of Mrs. Robertson. She testified that she did not hear any of the conversation between her husband and Burke on Thursday night, but that on Sunday night her husband called the Stratford hotel, and said he wanted to speak to Mr. Burke; that she supposed Mr. Burke came to the phone, and she heard her husband say, "Mr. Burke, I just wanted to tell you that I have decided not to accept your proposition," and, further, "Yes; I have decided not to accept your proposition." He repeated that twice over the phone Sunday night, and of this she was absolutely positive. When asked if her husband called Burke on Saturday night, she said, "Not that I know of; he did not call him on Saturday night," and that she was at home Saturday night, and that she knew that he did call him on Sunday night. It will be recalled that Burke was not positive as to the date of the call over the phone, though he admits that the conversation related to the dealings of the parties on Thursday night. His statement is, "My recollection places the telephone conversation as being on Saturday night, and not on Sunday night." If we turn now to the written statement made by Burke to his counsel while the matter was fresh in his mind, we will see his version of what Robertson said. In this statement we find the following:

"Then he [referring to Robertson] went off into this statement, 'I looked for Mr. Burke Friday all day, and you [Mr. Ferrell] were expected to be back here Friday evening or Saturday, and I was unable to find you.' Then Mr. Ferrell said to him, 'Did you have the contract ready to sign?' His reply was, 'No; I did not.' Mr. Ferrell said: 'What did you want with us?' Then he said that he had not been able to get me until Saturday night. And then Mr. Ferrell again asked him, 'Well, what did you want, Mr. Robertson; were you ready to sign the contract?' He did not reply to that. Then Mr. Ferrell said, 'Well, Mr. Robertson, you and Mr. Burke had a clear understanding as to this contract, didn't you?' And he said, 'Yes. * * * I feel that I have got a right to back out of this trade.' Mr. Ferrell said, 'Why?' He said, 'Because I could not find you nor Mr. Burke either Friday or Saturday. I then said, 'Mr. Robertson, did you think that we wanted to back out of this trade?' Mr. Robertson replied, 'I did not know what you wanted to do.' During this conversation Mr. Robertson repeated that he had not been able to find us on Friday night or Saturday, and Mr. Ferrell said, "Well, what did you want to see us about, Mr. Robertson?" to which he replied that he wanted to call off this deal."

The statement attributed to Robertson in the foregoing written statement by Burke would have, at least, a tendency to indicate that Robertson did not think that he had made any binding contract, and that the parties were to have some further interview on the subject, and that he had made unsuccessful efforts to obtain from Burke or Ferrell such an interview "either Friday or Saturday." This written statement of Burke's also has a tendency to confirm Mrs. Robertson's statement that the conversation over the phone took place on Sunday night, and not on Saturday night. Burke makes Robertson say, "I could not find you nor Ferrell either Friday or Saturday." In view of the statement attributed to Robertson, and of the testimony of Mrs. Robertson, it was an important fact to be proved, if true, that on Thursday night previously Mrs. Robertson had heard her husband say to Burke as he left the house, "I will consider your proposition and let you hear from me."

[4] Mrs. Robertson had twice testified in the case, and it was easy for her to have stated on either occasion, if she desired to concoct a story, that she had overheard the conversation of Thursday night, but she distinctly stated otherwise. The court had no reason to suppose that Mrs. Robertson would testify to anything that was untrue if she were permitted to be recalled; and the character of the counsel engaged in the case forbids the idea of any suggestion of any impropriety on their part. It seems plain that the object of the inquiry was simply "to elicit the truth and secure the attainment of justice." While we cannot say that counsel was as diligent and as circumspect as they should have been, we are satisfied that the omission to elicit the answer expected to be given by Mrs. Robertson was the result of accident, mistake, or oversight on their part, and it could certainly have done the plaintiff no serious harm to have allowed her to be recalled. Robertson himself was dead. His version of what had taken place between him and Burke, both in his written statement and his verified bill, had been excluded by the court, and his estate was endangered if Burke should swear to anything that was untrue. It was a case in which, under all the circumstances, the court should have been circumspect to see that the fullest opportunity was afforded for a full and complete investigation of all the facts, even though it might disturb the usual order of the introduction of testimony and delay the trial of the case. Burke was in court, and if Mrs. Robertson made any false statement, it was in his power to contradict her and leave it to the jury to decide between them as to who was telling the truth. Recent legislation has greatly liberalized the rules of evidence, and much is now admissible which a few years ago was not. Under all the circumstances of the case, we are of opinion that this is an instance in which the trial court should have permitted the witness to be recalled, that the trial court erred in not allowing such recall, and that this is a proper case for this court to supervise and control the discretion vested in said court.

[5] Counsel for the defendant in error devote considerable space in their brief to a discussion of the ruling of the trial court in admitting in evidence, over their alleged objection, the testimony of Mrs. Robertson as to what she heard her husband say over the telephone, but the objection, the ruling of the trial court thereon, and the exceptions thereto are not parts of the record before us. They are not made parts of the record by any bill or certificate of exception filed in the cause. The demurrer to the evidence states that the plaintiff produced to the jury, to maintain the issues on its part, the following evidence, and that the defendant to maintain the issue on his part produced the following evidence. All through the stenographer's report of the evidence there are interspersed remarks of counsel and of the court, and various exceptions to rulings of the court. For instance, at one place the record shows the following:

"Mr. James Mann: We except to the statement that was made by the court, and especially to the form of it." "Mr. Bernard Mann: And we except to it on the ground that it is not full enough."

And that is the last ever heard of either exception. These things are not parts of the demurrer to the evidence or of the record. This court cannot be burdened with a search through a stenographer's report to ascertain what objections have been made to the reception of evidence and the rulings of the trial court thereon. If they are relied on, they must be made parts of the record by proper bills of exception, or certificates of exception. Otherwise, they will be deemed to have been waived. No proper exception to the ruling complained of appearing in the record, the propriety of the ruling is not open for investigation.

[6] The defendant tendered certain witnesses solely to prove the reputation of Wirt Robertson for truth and veracity; but the trial court refused to permit them to testify on the ground that Robertson had not testified in the cause, and that his reputation for truth and veracity had not been assailed. This ruling is assigned as error. There was no error in the ruling of the trial court. The testimony was properly rejected. It appears from the stenographic report of the evidence that when these witnesses were tendered and the court was stating its reasons aforesaid for their exclusion, counsel for the defendant suggested that the witnesses were tendered, "not only on those respects, but also as to fair dealing," to which the court replied, "Yes." But this does not appear in the bill of exception, and hence is no part of the record, and cannot be considered by us. Upon that feature of the admissibility, we express no opinion.

[7] Under the facts and circumstances of this case, the trial court did not err in excluding testimony tendered by the defendant as to the conditions of the real estate market near Hopewell shortly after the alleged breach of contract set forth in the plaintiff's declaration.

[8] When the case was previously before us, it was upon a demurrer to the declaration. We held that the declaration stated a case which, if proved, entitled the plaintiff to recover, and that the profits sought to be recovered were not speculative. The declaration stated the terms of the contract, and that the plaintiff had, under the terms thereof, 12 months within which to fulfill it, and the witness Burke testified as to that time in the trial of the present case. It was claimed by the defendant that the testimony of Burke was impeached by the written statement aforesaid of Burke to his counsel, and also by his testimony in the federal court. This was a question of fact to be decided by jury, and the measure of damages was not the same where the employment was at will and where it had a definite duration. It was error, therefore, for the court to assume that the employment was for 12 months, and instruct the jury that—

If they believed that Wirt Robertson, the defendant's intestate, "sold the property described in the evidence known as the Baker tract to Charles S. Barrow for the sum of $80,000, * * * and that the purchase money had been paid in full, they must assess the plaintiff's damages at $20,000.00."

But when the court decided, on the demurrer to the evidence, that the plaintiff did have 12 months within which to fulfill the contract, the error became harmless, provided the court had fixed the right measure of damages. On the latter question, the trial court simply followed the opinion of this court on the former hearing. It was there said that—

"Robertson himself demonstrated the existence of a market by selling the property himself at an enormous profit over what he was to have as a minimum in his contract with the realty company, and he cannot be heard now to say that the company could not have done at least as well."

And again:

"A principal cannot, after having made a valid contract with an agent for the exclusive right to sell, render performance on the part of the agent impossible by making the sale himself, and then successfully defend an action for breach of the contract by claiming that the agent might not have made the sale. Sparks v. Reliable Dayton Motor Car Co., 85 Kan. 29, 116 Pac. 363, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1251; Schiffman v. Peerless Motor Car Co., 13 Cal. App. 600, 110 Pac. 460, 462; Green v. Cole, 127 Mo. 587, 30 S. W. 135; 2 Mechem on Agency (2d Ed.) § 2445."

We have no disposition to recede from what was then said. If the contract and the breach thereof alleged in the declaration was proved, the realty company lost by such breach the benefits of the contract which it would have received if it had been fulfilled, and defendant cannot complain if the plaintiff elects to take a less sum. In addition to the cases already cited on the measure of damages in a case of this kind, see Howard v. Stillwell & Bierce Mfg. Co., 139 U. S. 199, 11 Sup. Ct. 500, 35 L. Ed. 147; U. S. v. Beham, 110 U. S. 338, 4 Sup. Ct. 81, 28 L. Ed. 168; Durkes v. Gunn, 41 Kan. 496, 21 Pac. 637, 13 Am. St. Rep. 300; Trigg v. Clay, 88 Va. 330, 13 S. E. 434, 29 Am. St. Rep. 723.

[9] The plaintiff had the right to elect to base its profits on the sale to Barrow, and such election was not to the detriment of the defendant.

For the error in refusing to permit Mrs. Robertson to be recalled as a witness, the judgment of the trial court must be reversed, the verdict of the jury assessing the damages will be set aside, and the case remanded to the trial court for a new trial to be had therein not in conflict with the views hereinbefore expressed.

Reversed.

VIRGINIA RY. & POWER CO. v. CITY OF RICHMOND.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.

1. Street railroads §32—Operation evidence of construction of ordinance by parties.

The operation by a traction company of its street cars over the tracks of another company under the terms of a city ordinance for so long as the two companies were separate corporations and for several years thereafter, with the consent of the city authorities, if not sufficient to establish estoppel to deny that the ordinance authorized such operation, is at least of weight as a construction by the parties that the ordinance authorized such operation.

2. Street railroads §32—Ordinance held to authorize operation over competitor's tracks.

The Richmond ordinance of December 7, 1900, enacted at the urgent solicitation of a traction company, which, after reciting the provision of a competitor's franchise permitting the council to authorize the use of its tracks by the traction company, gave the traction company the right to operate its cars along the lines thereafter specified, specified certain tracks which the company was authorized to lay and connections it was to make, and required the cars operated thereunder to be operated according to the provisions of the traction company's franchise, clearly authorized the traction company to operate its cars over the competitor's tracks, though the subsections specifying the particular lines made no mention of the operation of cars.

3. Street railroads ⇨18—Rule of strict construction of franchise not to be used to defeat public rights.

The rule that a street railroad franchise is to be strictly construed so as not to convey any rights by implication which are not expressly granted is for the protection of the public, and is not to be used to defeat the public right to have the required service over the lines covered by the franchise.

4. Street railroads ⇨18—Strict construction of franchise does not mean strained or unnatural construction.

While a franchise is to be construed strictly against the company and in favor of the public, that does not mean that it is to be given a strained or unnatural construction which will defeat the manifest purpose of the grant.

5. Street railroads ⇨18—Right necessarily implied from whole ordinance is sufficiently expressed.

Where the right of a street railroad company to operate cars over the lines specified in a city ordinance is necessarily implied from the whole ordinance, though not specifically mentioned in the provisions designating the lines to be constructed, the right is sufficiently expressed in the ordinance within the rule that a franchise gives only the rights expressed therein, and not those given only by implication.

6. Street railroads ⇨70—Ordinance held to require operation of cars over named route.

The Richmond ordinance of December 7th, 1900, granting to a traction company authority to connect with the tracks of a competitor and to operate its cars over such tracks, which also provided that the cars should be operated by the traction company in accordance with its franchise, requires the company to maintain over the route therein specified the service it was required to maintain by its franchise over the other routes.

7. Street railroads ⇨66—Acceptance of ordinance creates contract which city can enforce.

The acceptance by a traction company of an ordinance authorizing and requiring it to operate cars over the tracks of its competitor creates a contract for the operation of such cars which the city can enforce.

8. Evidence ⇨20(2)—No judicial notice of effect of operation of cars.

On writ of error to a judgment imposing a fine on a street railroad company for discontinuing service on a certain route, the court cannot take judicial notice that the maintenance of service on that route would be unnecessary and would result in congestion of the traffic.

9. Street railroads ⇨70—Reasons for repealing service ordinance cannot be considered by court.

On writ of error to a judgment fining a street railroad company for discontinuing service on a route, the fact that such service was of no benefit to the public, and that the operation of the cars thereon increased the congestion of the traffic, presents a good reason for the repeal of the ordinance requiring the service by the city council, but does not authorize the court to permit such discontinuance.

Error to Hastings Court of Richmond.

The Virginia Railway & Power Company was fined for discontinuing service on one of its routes in the City of Richmond without consent of the city council, and it brings error. Affirmed.

El. R. Williams, A. B. Guigon, and T. Justin Moore, all of Richmond, for plaintiff in error.

H. R. Pollard, of Richmond, for defendant in error.

BURKS, J. The Virginia Railway & Power Company is the successor in title of the franchise of the street railways in the city of Richmond of the Richmond Traction Company, the Richmond Passenger & Power Company, and the Virginia Passenger & Power Company. It was fined $100 for discontinuing service on one of its routes in the city without the consent of the city council, and to the judgment imposing such fine the writ of error in this cause was awarded. The proceeding is quasi criminal, but in substance it is a civil proceeding to determine the rights and duties of the respective parties under certain ordinances of the city. This involves a construction of said ordinances.

In 1900 there were two principal street car companies in the city operating under different franchises and occupying different territory. Of these the Richmond Traction Company, whose original franchise was granted in August, 1895, operated on Broad street practically its then entire length, extending from the city limits near Oakwood Cemetery westward along Broad street to First street, and out First street and along that and other streets to Hollywood Cemetery, but had no line on Main street. This line was first known as the Oakwood to Hollywood line, afterwards as the Oakwood-Broad line, and all the cars were designated by the latter name as required by ordinance. The operation of this line was commanded and compelled by the ordinance granting the franchise and the amendments thereof. The Richmond Passenger & Power Company, whose original franchise was granted in December, 1899, operated on Main street practically from one end of it to the other, but had no line on Broad street, except the Laurel street line, which ran on Broad street a distance of 17 blocks. But the traction company's lines consisted chiefly of the Broad street lines, and the Passenger & Power Company's lines consisted chiefly of the Main street lines. In each of these franchises the city reserved the right to permit either company to run cars on the line of the other under certain terms and conditions.

Shortly before December 7, 1900, the traction company, which was a competitor of the Passenger & Power Company, made earnest efforts before the council of the city of Richmond, under the power which the council had reserved to itself, to secure authority to operate certain of its cars on Main street between First and Eighteenth over and along the tracks of the Passenger & Power Company; the two lines then crossing each other at First and Main. In response to this earnest request, the city council adopted the ordinance of December 7, 1900, "to authorize the Richmond Traction Company to extend its lines, and also to operate its cars upon certain tracks of the Richmond Passenger & Power Company" (see title of ordinance), and it is the construction of this ordinance, in the light of the surrounding circumstances, which constitutes the chief matter in controversy between the parties.

Soon after the adoption of the ordinance, the two lines were connected where they crossed at First and Main streets. The line authorized by the ordinance was constructed along Eighteenth street, and the two lines connected at Eighteenth and Main, and the Richmond Traction Company, with the acquiescence of the Richmond Passenger & Power Company and of the city, began to operate a second line of cars between Oakwood Cemetery and Hollywood Cemetery, traversing Main street from First to Eighteenth, which became known as the "Oakwood and Main line." The two lines were identical at each end—that is, from Eighteenth to Oakwood and from First to Hollywood—and were parallel from First to Eighteenth; one of said parallel lines being on Broad and the other on Main. The two companies continued to be competitors from early in 1901 till June, 1902, when the Virginia Passenger & Power Company became the owner of the majority of the stock of both companies. As stated in the petition:

"From June, 1902, until November, 1917, the operation of the Oakwood and Broad and Oakwood and Main lines continued under unified control. Both lines were always operated as Richmond Traction Company lines—from June, 1902, to July, 1904, by the Virginia Passenger & Power Company, which owned the controlling interest in both the companies; from July, 1904, to July, 1909, by the receivers of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia in charge of and operating the lines of all three companies in receivership proceedings against said companies; and from July, 1909, to November, 1917, by the present company, the Virginia Railway & Power Company, which acquired the properties of all the foregoing companies through foreclosure proceedings in the receivership suits against the above-mentioned companies."

By an ordinance adopted in 1915 the plaintiff in error, then the owner and operator of all the lines aforesaid, was authorized to make "a temporary change in the routing of its * * * Broad and Main line and its Oakwood-Broad line." Under this ordinance the plaintiff in error was permitted to, and did, divert its Oakwood-Broad line from Broad street at Eighteenth street, and followed the latter street to Main, and thence down Main to Ninth and up Ninth to Broad. This diversion made the two lines (Oakwood-Broad and Oakwood-Main) identical from Oakwood cemetery to Hollywood except between Ninth and First streets. Both lines continued thereafter to be operated along the routes indicated until November 1917 when the plaintiff in error discontinued the Oakwood-Main line, without asking or obtaining the consent of the city. The plaintiff in error contends: (1) That the ordinance of December 7, 1900, does not by its terms authorize or require the operation of the cars of the traction company on the Main street line of the Passenger & Power Company between any specific points, and that such requirement cannot be made by implication; (2) that the right, if it exists at all, is merely permissive; and (3) that the intention of the ordinance of 1915, below was to consolidate the two lines, and not to duplicate the service over the route.

An ordinance to authorize the Richmond Traction Company to extend its lines, and also to operate its cars upon certain tracks of the Richmond Passenger & Power Company. Approved December 7, 1900.

Whereas, in the ordinance entitled, "An ordinance to authorize the construction and operation of a street railway within the limits of the city of Richmond by the Richmond Traction Company," approved August 28, 1896, section 7 provides for the use, in whole or in part, of the lines of the Richmond Traction Company by any other company, when authorized by the city council, subject to the terms and conditions of said section.

Whereas, under an ordinance entitled, "An ordinance to authorize the construction and operation of a street railway within the limits of the city of Richmond by the Richmond Passenger & Power Company," approved December 23, 1899, it is provided that the said Richmond Passenger & Power Company shall have the right to operate its cars upon certain tracks on Broad street of the Richmond Traction Company, under the right reserved in the above-mentioned ordinance of August 28, 1895, and whereas, in the said ordinance of December 23, 1899, the council reserved the power to allow any other company, when authorized by the council, to use, in whole or in part, the tracks of the Richmond Passenger & Power Company:

Now, therefore, be it ordained by the council of the city of Richmond:

(1) That the Richmond Traction Company be, and the same is hereby, authorized to operate its cars upon and along certain of the lines and tracks of the Richmond Passenger & Power Company, and to extend its own tracks at Eighth and Broad streets and Eighteenth and Broad streets, as hereinafter stated, subject to the conditions and provisions hereinafter set forth or referred to.

(a) The Richmond Traction Company is hereby authorized to connect its eastern track on First street with the southern track of the Richmond Passenger & Power Company on Main northern track of the Richmond Passenger & Power Company on Main street.

(b) To construct and operate a double track on Eighth street, between Broad and Main streets, connecting at the corner of Broad street with the tracks of the Richmond Traction Company west of Eighth street, and at the corner of Main and Eighth streets with the tracks of the Richmond Passenger & Power Company; the western track on Eighth street to connect with the southern track of the Richmond Passenger & Power Company, and the eastern track on Eighth street with the northern track of the Richmond Passenger & Power Company on Main street.

(c) And is also authorized to extend its tracks on Eighteenth street southwardly from Broad street to Main street, connecting the said extension at Eighteenth street and Broad street with the tracks of the Richmond Traction Company on Broad street east of Eighteenth street, and connecting the eastern track at Eighteenth street and Main street with the southern track of the Richmond Passenger & Power Company on Main street, and the western track at Eighteenth and Main streets with the northern track of the Richmond Passenger & Power Company on Main street, with the right to the Richmond Passenger & Power Company to use said tracks on Eighteenth street from Grace to Main streets, without paying any compensation to said traction company for the expenses of construction, and only to pay fair compensation for the use of the same, to be determined in the same manner as shall be determined the compensation it shall pay for the use of the tracks of the Richmond Traction Company on Broad street. But if the said Richmond Passenger & Power Company shall prefer to construct its own track from Eighteenth and Grace streets to Eighteenth and Main streets, then the said Richmond Traction Company shall not build or continue from Eighteenth and Grace to Eighteenth and Main streets one of the above-mentioned tracks running from Eighteenth and Broad streets, but may connect the said track at Eighteenth and Grace streets with the said track of the Richmond Passenger & Power Company at that point, and use the same upon compensation to the Richmond Passenger & Power Company, to be determined as provided in section 2 of this ordinance.

(2) The use of the above-named tracks of the Richmond Passenger & Power Company by the Richmond Traction Company shall be upon such fair and reasonable terms as may be agreed upon between the parties, or, in the event that said companies cannot agree upon the terms, the same shall be settled by arbitration, as provided in section 11 of an ordinance approved December 23, 1899, entitled, "An ordinance to authorize the construction and operation of a street railway within the limits of the city of Richmond by the Richmond Passenger & Power Company."

(3) The privileges herein granted shall continue until the 1st day of January, 1926, unless sooner forfeited, and shall be exercised in accordance with the terms and conditions imposed upon the Richmond Traction Company for the construction and operation of its lines, as provided in an ordinance approved August 28, 1895, entitled, "An ordinance to authorize the construction and operation of a street railway within the limits of the city of Richmond by the Richmond Traction Company," and all lawful amendments thereto, so far as the same may be applicable and not inconsistent herewith. As to the furnishing of service, the committee on streets shall have the same power to require quicker service as it now has over the Broad street route of the traction company by section 3 of the ordinance of that company, approved August 28, 1895. It is further provided that, before the Richmond Traction Company shall exercise any of the rights and privileges granted it by this ordinance, said Richmond Traction Company shall agree, in writing, evidenced by its acceptance of this ordinance, as hereinafter provided, that the city of Richmond shall have the right to put further conditions, restrictions, and regulations as to the use of electricity and requirements as to the manner or system by which electricity may be used by the said Richmond Traction Company, upon any or all of its lines.

(4) The said Richmond Traction Company shall run all of their cars, which operate by virtue of the powers herein granted, upon a schedule of not less than five minutes, under the provisions of their present franchise, and during the hours therein mentioned, and shall also run all of their cars, which operate by virtue of the powers herein granted, continuously from Oakwood to Hollywood and return, and continuously from the reservoir to Chimborazo and return.

(5) The privileges herein granted are given upon the condition that, by accepting this ordinance, the Richmond Traction Company shall concede and agree that its rolling stock shall be taxed by the city of Richmond, whether located in the city or not; but if such rolling stock be also taxed by the county of Henrico, under the ruling of the board of public works, then the amount of the taxes imposed by the city shall be reduced by the amount which the company shall have to pay to said county.

(6) The said Richmond Traction Company shall, within sixty days after said approval of this ordinance, accept, in writing, each and every provision of the same; and, if at the expiration of the said period of sixty days after said approval of this ordinance the said Richmond Traction Company shall have failed so to accept, in writing, each and every provision thereof, then this ordinance shall be null and void and of no effect.

(7) It is further provided that the privileges herein granted are given upon the condition that the work necessary to be done to make the connections herein authorized for the use of the tracks of the Richmond Passenger & Power Company from First and Main street to Eighteenth and Main street, and from Eighth and Main street to Eighteenth and Main street, and from the other work necessary for the operation of the cars of the Richmond Traction Company over said tracks and the tracks to be constructed on Eighth street and on Eighteenth street, shall be begun within four months from the passage of this ordinance, and shall be completed within six months from said passage.

(8) This ordinance shall be in force from its passage.

[1] Aside from the language of the ordinance, to be presently noticed, the action of the parties affected was a contemporaneous practical construction of the ordinance by them. The fact that the Passenger & Power Company, a competing line with the traction company, permitted the latter, acting under the ordinance, to occupy its lines along Main street from First to Eighteenth and share its business, and that the traction company agreed to pay for the use of said tracks in the manner provided by the franchisees, plainly shows that both companies construed the ordinance as authorizing such use of said tracks. The city also, by its full acquiescence in the conduct of the two companies, manifested a like interpretation of the ordinance and in view of the fact that the ordinance was adopted at the earnest solicitation of the traction company and for the purpose of authorizing the very arrangement which was put into effect by the companies it may well be doubted if the city would not be estopped to deny that interpretation of the ordinance. In section 1242 of Dillon on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) it is said:

"If a municipality has the power to grant such right or franchise, and a corporation, believing and assuming that it has the consent or grant of the municipality, has, with the knowledge of the proper municipal authorities, proceeded to exercise the right of franchise, and has constructed, maintained, and operated its works and appliances in the city streets, the municipality will, in a proper case, be estopped by the acts and conduct of its officers and representatives in knowingly permitting and acquiescing in the use and occupation of the streets from asserting the invalidity of the grant of the franchise, so far, at least, as concerns its own failure to pass an ordinance or take the steps necessary to effectuate the grant. But the principle of estoppel in such case must be very cautiously applied and restricted to cases where justice manifestly requires its application."

Both routes have been operated by the plaintiff in error and its predecessors in title from the time the Oakwood-Main line was installed in 1901 till November, 1917, when the latter was discontinued, subject to the change made in pursuance of the rerouting ordinance aforesaid of 1915. This practical construction put upon the ordinance by all parties in interest not only at the time of its adoption, but continued through a long series of years, both while the interests of the parties were antagonistic and afterwards when they had become harmonious, is certainly entitled to great weight, even if it does not amount to an estoppel. Henry v. Mason City, etc., R. Co., 140 Iowa, 201, 118 N. W. 310.

[2] Let us return now to the ordinance itself and see if it does not require as well as authorize the operation of the Oakwood-Main line. It must be borne in mind that the traction company was before the city council earnestly beseeching it for authority to operate certain of its cars over and along the tracks of the Passenger & Power Company, a competing company, on Main street between First and Eighteenth streets, and that to accomplish this result it would be necessary to build a line along Eighteenth street from Broad to Main. In response to this request, and intending to comply therewith, the city council adopted the ordinance of December 7, 1900, which is set out in full in the statement preceding this opinion. Only such parts of it will be repeated as are deemed necessary, and italics will be used where desired for purposes of emphasis, though not used in the ordinance.

The title of the ordinance is as follows:

"To authorize the Richmond Traction Company to extend its lines and also to operate its cars upon certain tracks of the Richmond Passenger & Power Company."

Manifestly this title was sufficient to cover what was asked by the traction company and what the city proposed to grant it, to wit, the right to operate its cars upon certain tracks of the Passenger & Power Company. The ordinance then contains two "whereas" clauses. The first recites that the traction company franchise "provides for the use of its tracks by any other company authorized by the council." The second recites that the franchise of the Passenger & Power Company gave to the council power to allow any other company to use its tracks. After the recitals, the ordinance proceeds, "Now, therefore, be it ordained"; that is to say, in consideration of the recitals and for the purpose of carrying out the object expressed in the title, the council ordained, first, "that the Richmond Traction Company be and the same is hereby authorized to operate its cars upon and along certain lines and tracks of the Richmond Passenger & Power Company." This was an unqualified grant of authority of the traction company to operate its cars upon and along the tracks of the Passenger & Power Company, and it only remained to designate the tracks referred to. In order to accomplish this result the ordinance then adds subsections (a), (b), (c) to section 1. Subsections (a) and (c) designate specifically how the lines of the two companies are to be connected. The two lines cross each other at First street, and subsection (a) provides that the connection at that street shall be made by connecting the eastern track of the traction company on First street with the southern track of the Passenger & Power Company on Main street, and to connect its western track on First street with the northern track of the Passenger & Power Company on Main street. Subsection (b) relates to the construction and operation of a double track on Eighth street and the connections to be made therefrom. Subsection (c) provides for the construction of tracks on Eighteenth street from Broad to Main so as to connect the two lines, and provides that the connection at Eighteenth and Main streets shall be made by connecting the eastern track of the traction company with the southern track of the Passenger & Power Company and the western track of the traction company with the northern track of the Passenger & Power Company. The connection thus authorized was absolutely necessary, in view of the way such cars are operated, for the operation of the traction cars on the tracks of the Passenger & Power Company, and could not admit of any use of said tracks except those on Main street between First and Eighteenth. It is true, as argued for the plaintiff in error, that neither one of these subsections in terms provides for the operation by the traction company of its cars over the lines of the Passenger & Power Company, but, the first paragraph of section 1 having provided for the operation of said cars, the subsections referred to were enacted in order to carry out the provisions of said first paragraph and simply provide how the connections were to be made, which connections, when made, would necessarily refer to the operation of the cars on Main street between First and Eighteenth; the subsections, in effect, more particularly designating the certain lines and tracks of the Passenger & Power Company which were to be traversed by the cars of the traction company. Section 2 of the ordinance then declares that "the use of the above-named tracks shall be upon fair and reasonable terms," and, if agreement is impossible, provides a method of compulsory arbitration. "The above-named tracks" mentioned in section 2 could only refer to the tracks which had been designated as hereinbefore indicated in paragraph 1. Subsections (a) and (c) of paragraph 1 expressly state that these connections are the northern and southern tracks of the Passenger & Power Company at First and Main and at Eighteenth and Main. Section 3 of the ordinance then provides that the privileges therein granted shall continue until the 1st of January, 1926. The plain purpose of the ordinance, as admitted in the petition, was to give the traction company the right to use the tracks of the Passenger & Power Company on Main street between First and Eighteenth, so that it would seem manifest that the "privileges herein granted" refer to the privileges which, as has been pointed out, were conferred by section 1. Section 3 also declares that the privileges herein granted "shall be exercised in accordance with the terms and conditions imposed upon the traction company for the construction and operation of its lines as provided in an ordinance approved August 28, 1895, and all lawful amendments thereto." Referring to the latter ordinance, we find that it was there expressly provided that fair service should be rendered to the public upon the routes given the company, and that the company between the hours of 6 a. m. and 12 p. m. "shall not at any time within the said hours cease to do so without the consent of the council by ordinance." That ordinance allowed and provided for a five-minute schedule and that the company should run through cars from Hollywood to the eastern limits of the city. Not only did section 3 subject the traction company to the ordinance of 1895 and all lawful amendments thereto, but the ordinance of 1900 in section 4 expressly provides:

"(4) The said traction company shall run all of their cars which operate by virtue of the powers herein granted, upon a schedule of not less than five minutes under the provisions of their present franchise during the hours herein mentioned, and shall also run all of their cars which operate by virtue of the powers herein granted continuously from Oakwood to Hollywood and return."

The only cars that could be operated continuously from Oakwood to Hollywood and return under the ordinance of 1900 was the Oakwood and Main line, for the Oakwood and Broad line was not operated by virtue of powers granted by the ordinance of 1900, but under the ordinance of 1896. The provisions of sections 3 and 4 are mandatory and clearly establish the duty of the traction company to operate such cars, just as the preceding section of the ordinance gave them the right and privilege to do so. Reading the ordinance as a whole, it cannot be doubted that it was the object and intention of the traction company, as well as of the city, that the new line should be established between Oakwood and Hollywood, which was in fact established, and was called and known as the Oakwood-Main line. The seventh section of the ordinance of 1900 declares:

"The privileges herein granted are given upon the condition that the work necessary to be done to make the connections herein authorized for the use of the tracks of the Richmond Passenger & Power Company from First and Main streets to Eighteenth and Main streets * * * and the other work necessary for the operation of the cars of the Richmond Traction Company over said tracks * * * shall be begun," etc.

This section in terms refers to the operation of the traction company's cars over the tracks of the Passenger & Power Company along Main street from First to Eighteenth. It expressly declares that the connections authorized are for the use of the tracks of the Passenger & Power Company on Main street from First to Eighteenth, and in terms provides "for the operation of the cars of the Richmond Traction Company over said tracks." The ordinance plainly gives authority to the traction company to operate cars on Main street between First and Eighteenth, and compels such operation on a schedule of five minutes continuously from Oakwood to Hollywood and return. This was the privilege sought by the traction company, and this was the privilege granted by the city and accepted by the traction company, and recognized by all the parties interested as the true and proper construction of the ordinance. It is admitted in the petition that—

"The council of the city of Richmond adopted the ordinance on December 7, 1900; evidently intended to grant to the traction company permission to operate certain of its cars on Main street along and over the tracks of the Richmond Passenger & Power Company there stated."

And again:

"Perhaps and even probably the council of the city of Richmond did intend by the ordinance of December 7, 1900, to authorize the traction company to operate its cars on Main street between First and Eighteenth street over the Richmond Passenger & Power Company tracks there stated."

If the traction company was earnestly urging the council to grant it permission to operate its cars on the Main street line of the Passenger & Power Company, and the city did intend by the ordinance to grant their request—that is, to operate the cars on Main street—it would seem clear from what we have said that section 1 of the ordinance of 1900 was not a mere permission to make track connections, but a grant of the right to operate its cars over the line of the Passenger & Power Company on Main street, on the terms and conditions therein set forth.

[3] Notwithstanding the facts hereinbefore recited that the right of the traction company to operate its cars on the Main street line of the Passenger & Power Company from First to Eighteenth streets was earnestly sought of the city council by the traction company, that the ordinance of December 7, 1900, was enacted in compliance with that request, and that the plaintiff in error admits that the city council did probably intend thereby "to authorize the Richmond Traction Company to operate its cars on Main street between First and Eighteenth over Richmond Passenger & Power Company's tracks there situated," and that such operation of cars on Main street was put into operation soon after the adoption of such ordinance and was continuous from that time till the discontinuance in November, 1917, yet the plaintiff in error contends that it is not bound thereby because "such a franchise right cannot be created by implication, but must be granted expressly." A number of cases are cited by counsel for the plaintiff in error to sustain the proposition that grants and franchises of this nature are to be strictly construed in favor of the public, and that nothing is to be taken by implication. Among them are Knoxville Water Co. v. Knoxville, 200 U. S. 22, 34, 26 Sup. Ct. 224, 50 L. Ed. 353, Blair v. Chicago, 201 U. S. 400, 26 Sup. Ct. 427, 50 L. Ed. 801, and Cleveland Electric R. Co. v. Cleveland, 204 U. S. 116, 27 Sup. Ct. 202, 51 L. Ed. 399. We have no complaint to make of the doctrine enunciated in said cases, nor will it be necessary to further consider them. They were all cases in which the court was announcing the rule for the preservation of the rights in favor of the public, and which the plaintiff in error is now seeking to so apply as to destroy the rights of the public. The rule was adopted for the preservation of the rights of the public, and "serves to defeat any purpose concealed by the skillful use of terms, to accomplish something not apparent on the face of the act, and thus sanctions only open dealing with legislative bodies." Slidell v. Grandjean, 111 U. S. 412, 438, 4 Sup. Ct. 475, 487 (28 L. Ed. 321), or, as put in another form "it is matter of common knowledge that grants of this character are usually prepared by those interested in them, and submitted to the Legislature with a view to obtain from such bodies the most liberal grant of privileges which they are willing to give; this is one among many reasons why they are to be strictly construed" (Blair v. Chicago, 201 U. S. 400, 471, 26 Sup. Ct. 427, 50 L. Ed. 801, quoted with approval in Cleveland Electric Ry. Co. v. Cleveland, supra).

[4] But even for this purpose the grant is not to receive "a strained and unreasonable interpretation, contrary to the obvious intention of the grant. It must be fairly examined and considered, and reasonably and justly expounded." Perrine v. Ches., etc., Canal, 9 How. 172, 192 (13 L. Ed. 92). The rule, and the manner of its application are well expressed in the following extract from the opinion of the court in Blair v. Chicago, supra:

"The rule was laid down with clearness by Chief Justice Taney in the often-cited case of Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. 420, and has been uniformly applied in many subsequent cases in this court. In Perrine v. Chesapeake & Delaware Canal Company, 9 How. 172, 192, the same eminent Chief Justice, speaking for the court, said: "The rule of construction in cases of this description * * * is this, that any ambiguity in the terms of the grant must operate against the corporation and in favor of the public, and the corporation can claim nothing that is not clearly given by the law. We do not mean to say that the charter is to receive a strained or unusual construction, contrary to the obvious intention of the grant. It must be fairly examined and considered, and reasonably and justly expounded." In the case of The Binghamton Bridge, 3 Wall. 51, 75, it was said: "The principle is this, that all rights which are asserted against the state must be clearly defined, and not raised by inference or presumption; and if the charter is silent about a power, it does not exist. If, on a fair reading of the instrument, reasonable doubts arise as to the proper interpretation to be given to it, those doubts are to be solved in favor of the state; and where it is susceptible of two meanings, the one restricting and the other extending the powers of the corporation, that construction is to be adopted which works the least harm to the state."

[8] But we have already pointed out that the terms of the grant are adequately expressed in the ordinance. It is true that subsections (a), (b), and (c) of section 1 do not in express terms grant the power to operate cars on the Main street line, but that is a necessary conclusion to be drawn from the ordinance read as a whole. It could never have been intended by the courts to hold that, when the rights of the parties to a contract clearly appeared from the contract itself, those rights were not expressed in the contract. What is necessarily implied is in effect expressed, and that is all that is required.

In Southern Ry. Co. v. Franklin Co., 96 Va. 693, 32 S. E. 485, 44 L. R. A. 297, there was a lease of a railroad, which contained no express agreement to operate it during the term of the lease. The lessee was proposing to abandon it, but was enjoined from doing so. This court held, as succinctly stated in the syllabus, that—

"Although courts are careful in inferring covenants and promises not contained in written contracts, yet what is necessarily implied is as much a part of the instrument as if plainly expressed, and will be enforced as such. If the language of the instrument leaves the meaning of the parties in doubt, the court will take into consideration the occasion which gave rise to it, the obvious design of the parties, and the object to be attained, as well as the language of the instrument itself, and give effect to that construction which will effectuate the real intent and meaning of the parties. * * *

"A necessary inference from a written contract of an obligation to do what the parties actually intended, and what is essential to give effect and validity to it, is not an addition to the contract."

We are of opinion that the grant of the franchise and its terms are adequately expressed in the ordinance of December 7, 1900.

[8] The next contention of the plaintiff in error is that the grant contained in ordinance of 1900 to operate cars on Main street was merely "permissive and was in the nature of a privilege, license, or permit given to meet the competitive conditions then existing between the two companies, but which has not prevailed since June, 1902, and no corresponding obligation was imposed on the Richmond Traction Company to exercise it." This contention seems to overlook the provision of section 3 of the ordinance which provides that "the privileges herein granted * * * shall be exercised in accordance with the terms and conditions imposed upon the Richmond Traction Company for the construction and operation of its lines as provided in an ordinance," etc., and of section 4, which provides, "shall run all their cars which operate by virtue of the powers herein granted upon a schedule of not less than five minutes, * * * and shall also run all of their cars which operate by virtue of the powers herein granted continuously from Oakwood to Hollywood and return."

It is admitted in the petition that—

"Under the provisions of sections 3 and 4, it may well be that if, and so long as, the Oakwood and Main line of cars was operated by the Richmond Traction Company and its successors, including the defendant, the said cars had to be operated in accordance with the terms and conditions of said ordinance."

[7] The acceptance of the ordinance created a contract to operate the cars, which the company could not revoke without the consent of the city, and which the city could enforce. Compare Southern R. Co. v. Franklin, supra; State v. Spokane St. Ry. Co., 19 Wash. 518, 53 Pac. 719, 41 L. R. A. 515, 67 Am. St. Rep. 739.

In State v. Bridgeton, etc., Trac. Co., 62 N. J. Law, 592, 600, 43 Atl. 715, 718, 45 L. R. A. 837, 841, it is said:

"It became the duty of the respondent company to operate the railway over its entire route under the franchise as acquired by it. * * * It was its duty to construct, maintain and operate a railway on the surface of the street to carry passengers and demand tolls. * * * That a portion is unprofitable, or that a portion is more difficult to operate, are not valid reasons for abandonment. Its application to the city was for the location of its tracks over the whole route. The terms and conditions of the ordinance, and the ordinance passed on the faith of the duty of the company, were to operate its road over the entire route located. * * * It appears clear from the statute and the ordinance that it is the duty of such company organized under the statutes to operate the roads mentioned in its certificate of incorporation for the benefit of the public, in consideration that it shall have the franchise of transporting the passengers and taking the tolls from them, and that it cannot escape the performance of this duty as a public agent."

Finally it is claimed by plaintiff in error:

"(3) That by the ordinance of March 11, 1915, rerouting the cars on these routes, the Oakwood and Broad line was brought down on Main street between Eighteenth and Eighth streets, and there was thus a consolidation of the Oakwood and Broad and the former Oakwood and Main lines and the clear intention of the council was that the line should be so consolidated and not duplicated, since the only effect of the duplication would be to require the operation of the cars from one end of the city to the other, in order to serve a short district of eight blocks, where there was now an abundant car service, and this would result in congestion and delay to traffic on one of the most important streets in the city."

[8, 9] It does not appear from the facts agreed, which is the only evidence before us, that there is now an abundant car service on Main street between First and Eighth, nor that the continuation of the Oakwood and Main line will "result in congestion and delay of traffic on one of the most important streets in the city," and, even if such be the facts, we cannot take judicial notice of them. If the facts be as stated, it would furnish a strong argument to the city council to induce it to release the plaintiff in error from its obligation to continue the service, but could not authorize this court to compel such release.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion to affirm the judgment of the hustings court.
Affirmed.

GROSSMAN v. KENNA. (No. 3904.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 15, 1921.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⇐272—Relief granted against collection of purchase money, where title questioned and there are covenants of general warranty.

A court of equity will grant relief against the collection of purchase money due on land where the vendee is in possession under a conveyance with covenants of general warranty, if the title to such land is questioned by suit, prosecuted or threatened, or it is clearly shown to be defective.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⇐272—Where defect in title merely possible or probable, vendor will not be prevented from enforcing lien for purchase money.

Where, however, the allegations upon which reliance is had for relief in such case do no more than to show a possibility or probability that there is a defect in the title, the vendor will not be prevented from enforcing his lien for purchase money.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Suit by M. W. Grossman against J. N. Kenna. Decree for complainant, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Leo Loeb, of Charleston, for appellant.

D. W. Taylor, of Charleston, for appellee.

RITZ, P. The appellant complains of the action of the circuit court in decreeing to sale a tract of land purchased by him from the defendant M. W. Grossman in satisfaction of a vendor's lien retained in the deed from said Grossman.

It appears that on the 26th day of January, 1918, the plaintiff conveyed to the defendant a certain tract of land for the consideration of $5,000, and covenanted in said deed to warrant generally the title to said land. Of said purchase money one-third was paid in cash, and the other two-thirds was to be paid in two equal annual installments, which were secured by a lien reserved in the deed. The first deferred installment was not paid when the same became due, and this suit was brought for the purpose of enforcing the lien reserved to secure the payment of the same. The defendant tendered an answer to the bill, in which he admitted the conveyance to him and the reservation of the lien, but claimed that the plaintiff should not be permitted to enforce the same, for the reason: First, that at the time of the making of the deed the plaintiff had agreed with him to secure a mineral interest in the land which was outstanding, and which was excepted from the operation of the deed, and to sell to him, or transfer to him, this mineral interest when he had secured it, and that, having secured this interest, the said plaintiff has declined and refused to transfer the same to the defendant, although he does not say that he has ever offered to pay for it, and does not in his answer offer to do so; and, second, that the plaintiff did not have good title to the land conveyed. The court below held that the answer did not make any defense to the bill, and, the defendant declining to make any further defense, a decree was entered as prayed for.

There is nothing in the first matter of defense set up by the defendant. The deed to him conveyed the land, excepting therefrom a one-half undivided interest in the minerals, and he claims in his answer that the plaintiff agreed to purchase this interest, and transfer it to him for whatever it cost the plaintiff to acquire it; that plaintiff has since purchased it, but has not transferred it to him. This does not make any defense to the suit to collect the unpaid purchase money for the land conveyed. It is a separate interest—in the same land it is true—but it has no relation to the matter involved in the present suit. If the plaintiff was under any legal obligation to him in regard to this undivided mineral interest, he could, by proper suit and upon tender of the amount paid by the plaintiff therefor, compel its transfer to him. This is a matter, however, entirely foreign to the matter in litigation here.

The defect in the title complained of and set up by the defendant is that Grossman's grantor, George E. Lanham, acquired 66 acres of this land from Clarence Thomas and others, and the remaining 12 $\frac{3}{4}$ acres from R. T. Melton and wife; that the deed from Clarence Thomas et al. for the 66 acres purports to be made by them as heirs at law of Catherine Hutchinson; that in fact, at the time of her death Catherine Hutchinson left two heirs besides those who joined in the deed whose names are unknown to the defendant, and that these said two heirs never conveyed their interest to the said George E. Lanham, for which reason said Lanham only acquired a one-half interest, his deed being from two heirs only; that the said Catherine Hutchinson only had a one-seventh interest in the said tract of land, for the reason that in 1835 a tract of 1,024 acres was conveyed to Catherine Hutchinson and six others, of which the 66 acres is a part; and that the said 1,024-acre tract has never been partitioned, wherefore the interest of Catherine Hutchinson in the 66 acres, part thereof, was only a one-seventh, and Lanham, having acquired a deed from only two of Catherine Hutchinson's heirs, acquired one-half of one-seventh thereof, or one-fourteenth. In regard to the remaining 12 $\frac{3}{4}$ acres acquired from R. T. Melton and wife, it is alleged that R. T. Melton was only the owner of a one-half undivided interest in this 12 $\frac{3}{4}$ acres, that he and Charles A. Melton were the owners of a tract of 125 acres, of which the 12 $\frac{3}{4}$ -acre tract is a part, and that the said Charles A. Melton never conveyed his interest in said tract of 12 $\frac{3}{4}$ acres to M. W. Grossman, or to any person under whom he holds. There is no averment in the answer that anybody is claiming any interest in these two tracts of land adversely to the defendant, or that a suit is threatened or has been brought for the purpose of attacking defendant's title. It may be entirely true that Catherine Hutchinson had four heirs at the time of her death, and that the two who do not join in the deed never conveyed their interest to Grossman's grantor, but there is no showing that the two who did convey had not acquired this title by devise, or by inheritance, or in some other way. The answer avers that the 1,024-acre tract was never partitioned between Catherine Hutchinson and her co-owners. This may be entirely true so far as any formal partition is concerned, but Catherine Hutchinson may have acquired good title to this 66-acre tract in many other ways. That conveyance was made in 1835, and it is not intimated that there has been any claim adverse to the interest conveyed to the defendant by the plaintiff since that time. The same is true of the 12 $\frac{3}{4}$ -acre tract. The answer does no more than suggest a possibility, or at most a probability, of a defect in the title. There is no clear showing of any such defect, nor any allegation of an adverse claim, or of a pending or threatened suit.

[1, 2] It is very well established in this state that equity will grant relief to a vendee in possession of land under a conveyance with covenants of general warranty, where the title thereof is questioned by suit, prosecuted or threatened, or where it is clearly shown to be defective. Ralston v. Miller, 3 Rand. (Va.) 44, 15 Am. Dec. 704; Koger v. Kane, 5 Leigh (Va.) 606; Beale v. Seveley, 8 Leigh (Va.) 658; Clarke v. Hardgrove, 7 Grat. (Va.) 399; Johnston v. Jarret, 14 W. Va. 230; Wamsley v. Stalnaker, 24 W. Va. 214; Heavner v. Morgan, 30 W. Va. 335, 4 S. E. 406, 8 Am. St. Rep. 55; Harvey v. Ryan, 59 W. Va. 134, 53 S. E. 7, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 445, 115 Am. St. Rep. 897; Smith v. Ward, 66 W. Va. 190, 66 S. E. 234, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1030; Smith v. White, 71 W. Va. 639, 78 S. E. 378, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 623; McClung v. McClung, 78 W. Va. 486, 89 S. E. 148. In none of these cases, however, did a court of equity refuse to permit the collection of the purchase money unless there was some adverse claim made to the land, either by a suit, prosecuted or threatened, or the title thereto was clearly shown to be defective. In this case the allegations made in the defendant's answer, as before stated, do no more than to show a probability that his title may be questioned in the future. There is no clear showing that the plaintiff did not have good title to the land conveyed by him to the defendant, and where this is the case the vendor will not be prevented from collecting his purchase money. The answer does not ask any abatement from the purchase money because of the alleged defects in the titles; it does not ask rescission of the contract, nor that the vendor be required to make his title good, but simply prays that the bill be dismissed. The defendant refused to make any further defense when the lower court held his answer insufficient, and there was, of course, nothing remaining to be done except to enter a decree in accordance with the prayer of the bill, which was done.

We find no error in this action, and the decree complained of is affirmed.

CROWLEY v. VAUGHAN. (No. 4212.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 15, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⇨44—Burden of proving verbal withdrawal of written offer of sale before acceptance is upon party asserting it.

The burden of proof of a verbal withdrawal of a written offer of sale of real estate, before acceptance thereof, rests upon the party asserting it.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1009(3)—Finding on conflicting oral evidence of parties alone will not be disturbed where credibility not impaired.

A finding against such a withdrawal, upon the conflicting oral evidence of the parties to the transaction, in the absence of any proved or admitted circumstance impairing the credibility of either of them or creating a preponderance of evidence in favor of either, will not be disturbed by the appellate court.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⇨16(1)—Unconditional verbal acceptance of written offer of sale before withdrawal converts it into a contract of sale.

A verbal notification of unconditional acceptance of such an offer, before withdrawal thereof, converts it into a contract of sale.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⇨16(1)—Verbal acceptance of written offer to sell, not requiring payment of money, held converted into a contract.

If such an offer or option does not in terms or by necessary implication require payment of money as a condition or element of acceptance thereof, such notice without any payment converts it into a contract.

5. Frauds, statute of ⇨115(4)—Vendor and purchaser ⇨13—Neither consideration nor mutuality lacking in contract created by verbal acceptance of written offer.

Neither consideration nor mutuality is lacking in a contract so effected.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

6. Vendor and purchaser ⇨170—Where vendor rejects check in payment because unwilling to convey, no tender of money necessary.

Where vendor declined vendee's payment by check, not because she preferred money, but because she did not intend to accept anything nor to convey the lot contracted for, no actual tender in any form was necessary.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Suit by J. E. Crowley against Eva T. C. Vaughan. Decree for complainant, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Surber & Edwards and J. E. Springston, all of Charleston, for appellant.

S. L. Flournoy and Murray Briggs, both of Charleston, for appellee.

POFFENBARGER, J. Correctness of this decree enforcing specific performance of an alleged contract of sale of a city lot is challenged on the grounds of invalidity of the contract, by reason of lack of consideration, making it a mere offer of sale, and proof of withdrawal of such offer before acceptance thereof.

[1] On the latter issue, the trial court has found against the appellant, upon evidence so conflicting and evenly balanced as to preclude disturbance thereof. As to the alleged withdrawal of the offer, there are just two witnesses, the appellant and the appellee, the former asserting it and the latter denying it emphatically. No fact or circumstance has been disclosed that can be regarded as having any weight or bearing against the credibility of either of them. The offer was made, wherefore the burden of proof of withdrawal necessarily rested upon the appellant, and the trial court did not see any reason why her word should prevail over that of the appellee. Nor do we.

Mrs. Vaughan gave Miss Crowley a written and sealed option of purchase, dated May 1, 1919, and reciting a consideration of $1. The time limit fixed by it was 60 days. On the 26th day of June, 1919, Miss Crowley, who was a real estate agent or broker, swears she accepted the option by telephone, and requested Mrs. Vaughan to execute a deed for the lot to her. As to what was said over the telephone they differ; the appellee saying she requested a deed to herself and the appellant, that she said she had an offer on the lot. They agree that Mrs. Vaughan declined to sell it. There is evidence tending to prove that Miss Crowley had either contracted a resale of the property or had a purchaser in view, at the date of her demand. Within an hour after the telephone conversation, attended by a witness, she appeared and tendered a cashier's check of $834 and her two notes for $833 each, making $2,500 the price stipulated in the offer, and demanded execution and delivery of a deed to herself for the lot.

[3] The vigor with which she asserted her demand after the telephone conversation is a circumstance tending to corroborate her testimony to the effect that she had accepted the offer. Her admitted notification by telephone that she had an offer for the lot or an opportunity to sell it, and had "promised the man," tends in the same direction. It could have meant nothing more nor less than notification of an acceptance and a desire to have the deed executed. And, as stated, the appellee's formal demand and tender, made within an hour afterward, has a strong tendency to prove what she meant and intended by the telephone conversation. Moreover, if there was no acceptance or demand, there was no reason for appellant's notification of her refusal to sell. It came in response to what the appellee had said.

As the option was made assignable, by a provision binding the appellant to deliver to the appellee an apt and proper deed conveying the lot to her or to any one she might direct, it is immaterial whether she demanded a deed to herself or to her prospective purchaser. Rease v. Kittle, 56 W. Va. 269, 49 S. E. 150.

[2] Having concluded that the trial court's finding of an acceptance of the offer, before withdrawal thereof, cannot be disturbed, it is necessary to inquire whether lack of consideration for the option, if any, precludes the existence of a contract and right of enforcement. If there had been consideration, the option would have been irrevocable within the prescribed period of 60 days. Rease v. Kittle, cited; Pollock v. Brookover, 60 W. Va. 75, 53 S. E. 795, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 403. If there was none, the offer was revocable at any time before acceptance and notice thereof, but not afterward. Morris v. Risk, 102 S. E. 725; Weaver v. Burr, 31 W. Va. 736, 8 S. E. 743, 3 L. R. A. 94. Being informal and amounting to a demand for a conveyance of the property, without mention of any conditions or request for modifications, the acceptance must be regarded as having been unconditional. That would be the ordinary and common sense interpretation of such a demand.

[4] Nothing in the option required payment of money to convert it into a contract. In other words, it did not say there should be no contract, unless nor until a certain sum should have been paid, nor that a certain sum must be paid by way of acceptance. Impliedly, it gave the optionee right to elect and thus make it a contract, and then required consummation by payment within the 60-day period. As to what should constitute acceptance, it is open and liberal. Hence acceptance did not include payment, and failure to accompany the demand for a deed with a tender of the purchase money was not an attempt to modify the offer, or effect a partial or conditional acceptance. Unless otherwise provided, payment is performance following the making of the contract.

[5] After acceptance, there were both consideration and mutuality. There was a promise for a promise, and each was consideration for the other. Unenforceability of the contract at the instance of the vendor, by reason of the statute of frauds, if so unenforceable, did not preclude the element of mutuality. That statute does not forbid the making of verbal contracts for the sale of land. Such a contract possessing all requisite elements, including mutuality, exists, though it may not be so made in writing as to bind both parties, beyond escape. The statute is only a means of avoidance of performance. Though the contract is not signed by the vendee, there is mutuality within the meaning of the law. Monongah C. & C. Co. v. Fleming, 42 W. Va. 538, 541, 26 S. E. 201; Capehart v. Hale, 6 W. Va. 547.

[6] The tender of payment was not declined on account of its character. The vendor declined to comply with her contract. She rejected the check, because she did not intend to accept anything nor to convey the lot, not because she preferred money. In such case, an actual tender in any form is not necessary. Thompson v. Lyon, 40 W. Va. 87, 20 S. E. 812; Barnes v. Morrison, 97 Va. 372, 34 S. E. 93.

This opinion is not to be taken as having conceded lack of consideration in the option, by reason of proof of nonpayment of the $1 therein recited. The seal may preclude denial thereof by estoppel or by force of law or under the rules of evidence. Foregoing inquiry as to that question, we have disposed of the cause upon the hypothesis of lack of such consideration, not lack of consideration in the contract effected by acceptance, without having decided against its existence.

Perceiving no error in the decree complained of, we will affirm it.

PECK v. ROBERTS et al. (No. 3974.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 15, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error \S 1094(5)—Supreme Court will examine depositions and records, where conflicting, to determine which of the lower courts it will sustain.

Where there has been a finding of fact in a chancery cause by the court of common pleas of Kanawha county from depositions of witnesses which are conflicting and irreconcilable, which finding has been overruled and disaffirmed by the circuit court on appeal, this court will determine for itself from the depositions and record which of the lower tribunals, if either, it will sustain.

2. Evidence \S 588—Circumstances surrounding two persons who disagree in their testimony as to transactions between them considered.

Where the evidence of two persons totally disagrees as to the intent and purpose of a transaction between them, the facts and circumstances surrounding them and their acts, then and afterwards, with relation to the transaction, will be viewed and considered in order to ascertain which, if either, should be sustained.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Suit by A. J. Peck, Assignee of the Elk Motor Truck Company, against W. S. Roberts and others. Decree for complainant, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Davis & Davis, of Charleston, and Connor Hall, of Huntington, for appellant.

Henry S. Cato, of Charleston, for appellee.

LIVELY, J. This appeal brings up for review a decree of the circuit court of Kanawha county entered on the 20th day of September, 1919, which reversed a decree of the court of common pleas entered on the 1st day of July, 1919, dismissing the plaintiff's bill. The decree of the circuit court, under review, entered a judgment for the plaintiff for the sum of $1,032, with interest from the 8th day of March, 1913, and directed a sale of the interest of defendant Roberts in certain real estate for payment thereof. In the year 1911 W. S. Roberts, defendant, formed a corporation, known as the Kanawha Auto Truck Company, for the purpose of manufacturing and selling a truck of his special design, and interested R. G. Quarrier, J. L. Sydenstricker, Geo. Gates, and others. The capital stock was $50,000, and the par value of each share was $1. For his design of the truck, services, and time expended in forming the corporation he was voted bonus stock amounting to $5,000. He was elected president of the company, and was the acting manager and moving spirit. The business of the corporation was unsuccessful, and at a later date the corporate name was changed to the Elk Auto Truck Company, and the shares of stock thereafter issued were at $100 per share par value. About the time of the reorganization S. A. Moore was selected as the president of the corporation, and Roberts was selected as vice president. On the 22d day of September, 1913, the reorganized corporation made an assignment to the plaintiff, A. J. Peck, trustee, of all its property and assets for the benefit of its creditors. It does not appear at what date Roberts severed his connection with the corporation, but it does appear that he left this state on the night of the 14th of July, 1913. The plaintiff, Peck, trustee, discovered on the records of the company that Roberts had used the sum of $1,032 of the funds of the company on the 8th day of March, 1913, when the company was in failing circumstances, for the payment of a note given by him and indorsed by R. G. Quarrier for $1,000, which had been negotiated at the Kanawha Valley Bank, and, conceiving that this constituted a diversion of the funds of the company for the payment of an individual debt, instituted this suit against W. S. Roberts and R. G. Quarrier, and attached the interest of defendant Roberts in certain real estate situate in Kanawha county. Roberts answered the bill, and depositions were taken. In the meantime the suit had been transferred to the docket of the court of common pleas, and that court found for the defendant Roberts and dismissed the bill; and, as above stated, upon appeal, the circuit court of Kanawha county reversed the court of common pleas, and directed a sale of the property attached in satisfaction of the debt. Roberts' defense is based on the theory that this note which he negotiated to the Kanawha Valley Bank on the 30th day of April, 1912, and which was signed by him and indorsed by Quarrier, was made and used for the purpose of raising funds for the corporation, and was not his individual debt. On the other hand, the plaintiff asserts that this note was the individual obligation of Roberts, and that he had no right to use the funds of the corporation for its payment.

It appears that Quarrier had made a written subscription for stock in the corporation, amounting to $2,000, on which he had paid at various times an aggregate of $1,000. On April 30, 1912, defendant Roberts approached him for the purpose of getting more money, as he then claimed, for the unpaid balance of stock. Quarrier took the position that the understanding between himself and Roberts was that he should pay only $1,000 on his subscription, and the other $1,000 was to be given to him by Roberts out of the $5,000 bonus stock which had been voted to Roberts for his plans, services, etc. Roberts then seemed to agree with Quarrier, but stated that the stock was good and he would like to have it; thereupon, according to the testimony of Quarrier, the latter proposed that he would assist Roberts in getting the money to pay for the stock, if he so desired, and the note was then executed by Roberts, which Quarrier indorsed. Roberts' theory, as outlined in his evidence, is to the effect that this note was for the purpose of raising money for pressing financial needs of the company, and that the stock of $1,000 then under discussion, would afterwards be sold and the proceeds used to pay off this note. He testified, using his own words:

"It was my understanding that if we could get this banking accommodation with the note and sell some additional stock that we would relieve Mr. Quarrier, if we could, of his subscription for the other thousand."

The result of this case depends largely upon the testimony of these two witnesses, and their testimony is totally divergent. It is therefore necessary to closely scan and consider the acts of the parties at that time and afterwards, together with the records of the company and the facts and circumstances surrounding the parties. Roberts was the president of the company, and was acting as general manager, and the books were kept in the office of the Triple State Electric Company, of which Roberts was general manager. It appears from the evidence of Sydenstricker, the bookkeeper, that an entry was made on the subscription account of Quarrier as of the 30th day of April (the date on which this note was given), which closed the subscription account of Quarrier, and on March 18, 1913, the date on which the note was paid out of the company funds, there is an entry, which Sydenstricker testifies to be in Roberts' handwriting, "Unsubscribed stock, K. V. Bk. R. G. Quarrier 51, $1,000.00 dis. & int. $32.00." On August 1, 1912, a general statement of the assets and liabilities of the company was made up and sent to the stockholders, which showed that the unpaid stock subscriptions amounted to the sum of $761. No account seems to be taken in this statement of the $1,000 note, either as an asset or as a liability. So far as the corporation was concerned, at that time it had no knowledge of this outstanding note. At least it was not treated as an obligation. In that statement the accounts receivable in the assets amounted to $680.09, and the bills payable in the "liabilities" amounted to $500 only. When the corporation was reorganized and its name changed to the Elk Auto Truck Company and the par value of the stock changed to $100 per share, a certificate for 10 shares of stock of the par value of $1,000 was issued to Quarrier, and the testimony is that these new certificates were to take the place of the outstanding stock in the old company. At that time Roberts was vice president of the company and still in active charge. It is reasonably clear that Roberts acquiesced in the claim of Quarrier that it was the understanding that he should take only $1,000 in stock in the original company. This is evidenced by what was done on the 30th day of April, 1912, and by the subsequent acts of Roberts, and the acts of the corporation in issuing the new stock to Quarrier. Another most significant fact appears, and that is that after this note had been executed and negotiated several thousand dollars worth of stock in the original company was sold and paid for. Roberts testified that between $7,000 and $8,000 worth of stock was sold after that time, and all paid for, with the exception of about $1,000 worth. If his theory was correct, that the note was given in order to raise money for pressing financial needs, and that this stock in question was to be sold and the note paid from the proceeds, it is not perceived why he did not take the money from the subsequent sale of stock and pay off this obligation for which he was individually liable. Moreover, it is shown, reasonably clearly, that Roberts treated this note as his personal obligation, because in making the renewals thereof he paid the discounts out of his personal funds; and then when he made up the financial statement as of August 1, 1912, no notice whatever is taken of this outstanding note. It was not treated as an obligation of the corporation. Another circumstance which militates against the claim of Roberts that this additional $1,000 of stock was afterwards to be sold and the proceeds used to pay this individual note is that several days after the note had been executed he issued two certificates of stock, each for 1,000 shares in the name of Quarrier, and delivered the same to Quarrier. Quarrier's statement in regard to this is positive that the additional certificate of stock for $1,000, which was handed to him, was for the purpose of securing him as indorser for Roberts on this note, and that he had supposed that Roberts would issue the stock in his (Roberts') name and assign the same to him as collateral security, and did not notice that it was issued in his name at the time, or, if he did notice the irregularity in the issuance, he took the stock nevertheless with that understanding. If Roberts' theory, that he intended to sell this controverted stock in order to pay the note, was correct, it would be most unusual to issue the stock in this way. These circumstances, to our mind, bear out the theory of the plaintiff and the evidence of Quarrier.

[1, 2] On this conflicting evidence the court of common pleas decided for the defendant, and the circuit court decided for the plaintiff, as above stated. It is at once apparent that the question of preponderance of the evidence is difficult to determine. This court has had much difficulty in arriving at a conclusion. What rule should this court invoke for its aid when these two lower courts, each with concurrent jurisdiction and presided over by able, conscientious and learned jurists, have reached opposite conclusions from the very same facts? It is insisted that the finding of the court of common pleas should have prevailed in the circuit court, and should prevail in this court, under the familiar rule that an appellate court will not disturb the findings of the trial court on questions of fact, unless clearly wrong, where the evidence is conflicting. Every rule of law and procedure is based on some good reason. The reason for this rule is that the trial court has the opportunity of observing the witnesses before it and their manner and demeanor in giving their testimony. This rule applies with special force to trials in the lower court by jury, or when a court at law tries in lieu of a jury; but the rule is not invoked strictly in chancery cases where the evidence is brought in by depositions. In such cases the lower court does not have this opportunity for observing the witnesses. However, it is usual for the appellate court to sustain the lower court in chancery cases on findings of fact where the evidence is conflicting or uncertain, on the theory that the lower court is sitting in the neighborhood where the controversy arises, and is closer to the people and may have some peculiar advantage in that regard over the appellate court. Smith

v. Yoke, 27 W. Va. 639. That reason does not apply as between the common pleas court and the circuit court. Both courts sit in the same county at the same courthouse, and this cause was heard upon the same depositions. Both courts are equally near to the people, and neither has any special advantage over the other in that regard. The common pleas court was designed to relieve the circuit court of the enormous congestion of business therein, and has equal jurisdiction, and is made inferior only in order to conform with the Constitution. It could not have been created under the Constitution except as an inferior court to that of the circuit court.

We conclude that equal weight should be given to the findings of these two lower courts on questions of fact deduced from conflicting depositions in a chancery cause. Neither should have preference over the other. We think the true rule to be followed in this case is that invoked where a commissioner in chancery has made a finding of fact, returning with his report all the evidence on which the finding is based, and the lower court overrules and disaffirms his finding. In such instances the appellate court must determine from the record for itself whether it will sustain the commissioner or the circuit court. Hyre v. Lambert, 45 W. Va. 715, 31 S. E. 927; Roots v. Kilbreth, 32 W. Va. 585, 9 S. E. 927. In some jurisdictions an appellate court will not review the findings of an intermediate court, affirming, modifying, or reversing the trial court on controverted questions of fact, where there is any evidence to support the findings of the intermediate court, and where it correctly applies the law to the conclusions of fact. 4 C. J. § 3071. But as above intimated, we do not follow this rule used in other jurisdictions, but will give equal weight to the findings of the common pleas court and circuit court, and will examine the evidence and pass upon the questions of fact.

We affirm the decision of the circuit court.

HAILEY v. McMULLAN.

McMULLAN v. HAILEY.

(Nos. 1964, 1965.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 17, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Boundaries ¶41—Instruction as to recognition of boundary line held not erroneous.

In an action involving boundary line, court did not err in charging the jury, "If you should believe that the property sued for in this case was owned and possessed by T. N. M., that he had legal title to the property when he died, and you should further believe that the plaintiff is his only heir at law, then in that event the plaintiff would be authorized to recover the property from the defendant, unless it appears from the evidence in the case that [plaintiff] has parted with her right to possess it, either by conveyance by her deceased husband or by herself, or by loss of title by prescription, estoppel, or by acquiescence in the dividing line between her property and this property, under the instructions which the court will give you," where the defense urged by defendant was that J. M., under whom defendant held title, bought from T. N. M., and that in pursuance of such purchase J. M. went into possession and made valuable improvements, and that the land purchased extended to the line now claimed by defendant, and that this line was appointed by T. N. M. as the dividing line, and that J. M. was in actual possession, and that plaintiff as sole heir at law would be bound by the sale made by her husband.

2. Boundaries ¶41—Instruction as to effect to be given deeds in boundary dispute held not error.

In an action involving boundary, where court charged the jury that "there are deeds of conveyance, and they convey the property that is referred to in these deeds, they are legally sufficient, and did convey the property that is described," it did not err in further charging, "It becomes necessary for you to take these instructions from the court as to legal effect of the deeds, and then apply the description in these deeds to the facts of the case, and determine whether or not the property sued for in this case was conveyed by these deeds and included in the description contained in the deeds," although there was conflicting evidence as to what lands the deed covered.

3. Boundaries ¶36(1)—Contract to sell land held to contain sufficient description to be admissible in evidence.

A contract, "I agree to sell J. M. a tract of land, 60 acres more or less, on the waters of Little Cedar creek, 30 acres of the Cordell place and about 30 acres of the Mantz place, adjoining, beginning at the mouth of the branch on the creek, and running across the hill to a post oak on the upper line, including all the land above, for $600, $223 already paid down," signed by T. N. M., held to contain sufficient description to be admissible in evidence in boundary dispute by one claiming under J. M.

4. Adverse possession ¶116(1)—Refusal of charge regarding adverse possession for 20 years in boundary dispute held proper.

In a boundary dispute, where defendant claimed under J. M., court did not err in failing to charge the jury that, "if J. M. went into possession of the land sued for by permission of T. N. M., and remained in possession up to his death, and W. T. J., the administrator of J. M.'s estate, took possession of this land and sold same at public outcry, and the defendant H. bought same and went into possession of said land in good faith, believing that it was a part of the estate of J. M., deceased, and without knowledge of J. M.'s possession of said land being by permission of T. N. M., and you further believe that the possession of J. M. and the possession of the defendant H., when added together, would be a period of 20 years before the filing of the suit by plaintiff, and that possession of defendant H. was adverse, public, continuous, exclusive, uninterrupted, and peaceable, he would have a title by prescription, and you would be authorized to find for the defendant."

5. Adverse possession §116(1)—Charge on seven-year statute in boundary dispute held properly refused.

In a boundary dispute court did not err in refusing to charge on defendant's request, that if the jury believed from the evidence that the defendant bought from the administrator of the estate of grantee of plaintiff's predecessor, under whom defendant was claiming the land sued for, and that he went into possession of the same under a deed duly recorded from the administrator to said land and in good faith, and remained in possession for a period of 7 years before the filing of the suit, and you believe that the defendant's possession was in his own right, and not in another, and that his possession did not originate in fraud, and was public, continuous, exclusive, etc., he would have a title by prescription as against the plaintiff, who was the wife and heir of the adjoining owner, who sold the land to defendant's predecessor.

Beck, P. J., dissenting in part.

Error from Superior Court, Hart County; John D. Humphries, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Amanda McMullan against W. I. Halley. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error, and plaintiff files cross-bill. Judgment affirmed, and cross-bill dismissed.

Some of the grounds of the motion for new trial were as follows:

Fourth. The court erred in charging the jury as follows: "If you should believe that the property sued for in this case, was owned and possessed by T. N. McMullan, that he had legal title to the property when he died, and you should further believe that the plaintiff is his only heir at law, then in that event the plaintiff would be authorized to recover this property from the defendant, unless it appears from the evidence in the case that she, the plaintiff, has parted with her right to possess it, either by conveyance by her deceased husband or by herself, or by loss of title by prescription, estoppel, or by acquiescence in the dividing line between her property and this property, under the instructions which the court will give you." This charge excluded from the consideration of the jury the defense, urged by movant, that Jack Morrison, under whom movant holds title, bought from T. N. McMullan the land sued for, and that, in pursuance of Morrison's purchase from T. N. McMullan, Morrison went into possession of the land sued for, and while in possession made valuable improvements thereon, and paid the purchase price for said land to T. N. Mc-

Mullan, and that the land purchased from T. N. McMullan by Morrison extended to the line now claimed by movant as the true line between plaintiff and movant, and that this line was pointed out by T. N. McMullan to Morrison as the dividing line between him (McMullan) and Morrison, and that Morrison was in actual possession of the land sued for from the date of his purchase in 1884 to the date of his death, — day of —, and that the plaintiff, as the sole heir at law of T. N. McMullan, would be bound by the sale made by her husband, T. N. McMullan, to Morrison; Morrison at the time having a perfect equity in the tract of land sued for.

Sixth. The court charged the jury: "There are deeds of conveyance, and they convey the property that is referred to in these deeds (referring to the deeds offered in evidence by the defendant), they are legally sufficient, and did convey the property that is described." The court, after giving the above charge, which movant insists was a correct charge, gave the following charge: "It becomes necessary for you to take these instructions from the court as to the legal effect of the deeds, and then apply the description in these deeds to the facts of the case, and determine whether or not the property sued for in this case was conveyed by these deeds and included in the description contained in the deeds." The latter part of the charge was error. The court gave the jury too much latitude in locating or determining what land was conveyed by these deeds. It was error to instruct the jury that they might apply the description in the deeds to the facts of the case. There was conflicting evidence as to what land the deeds covered. It was contended by witness for the plaintiff that the deeds did not cover the land in dispute. It was likewise contended by movant's witness that the deeds conveyed the land in dispute. To charge the jury that they could apply the description in the deeds to the facts of the case did not aid the jury in determining what land was covered by the deeds, nor did the court correctly state the rule, if the description in the deeds were indefinite and uncertain.

Thirteenth. Because the court erred in admitting in evidence for plaintiff, over objection duly made by defendant, the following writing, called a contract between T. N. McMullan and Jack Morrison as to the land in dispute which reads as follows: "I agree to sell J. Morrison a tract of land, 60 acres, more or less, on the waters of Little Cedar creek, 30 acres of the Cordell place and about 30 acres of the Mantz place adjoining, beginning at the mouth of the branch on the creek, and running across the hill to a post oak on the upper line, including all the land above, for $800, $223 already paid down. February 14, 1884. [Signed] T. N. McMullan." This evidence was objected to on the ground that it did not contain a sufficient description to admit it as evidence; that it was void for want of description; that it was not a contract between T. N. McMullan and Jack Morrison relative to the land in dispute; that it was only a proposition to sell an indefinite boundary of land, and not accepted by Jack Morrison; that the description in the paper was in conflict with the deed executed by Amanda McMullan, the plaintiff, to Jack Morrison.

Fourteenth. Because the court erred in failing to charge the jury as follows: "If Jack Morrison went into possession of the land sued for by permission of T. N. McMullan, and remained in possession up to his death, and W. T. Johnson, the administrator of Jack Morrison's estate, took possession of this land and sold same at public outcry, and the defendant, Hailey, bought same and went into possession of said land in good faith, believing that it was a part of the estate of Jack Morrison, deceased, and without knowledge of Jack Morrison's possession of said land being by permission of T. N. McMullan, and you further believe that the possession of Morrison and the possession of the defendant, Hailey, when added together, would be a period of 20 years before the filing of the suit by the plaintiff, and that the possession of the defendant, Hailey, was adverse, public, continuous, exclusive, uninterrupted, and peaceable, he would have a title by prescription, and would be authorized to find for the defendant."

Fifteenth. Because the court erred in refusing to charge the jury, after request being made by defendant so to do: "If you believe from the evidence that the defendant, W. I. Hailey, bought from the administrator of Jack Morrison's estate the land sued for, and that he went into possession of same under a deed duly recorded from the administrator to said land and in good faith, and remained in possession for a period of 7 years before the filing of this suit, and you believe that the defendant's possession was in his own right and not in another, and that his possession did not originate in fraud, and was public, continuous, exclusive, uninterrupted, peaceable, and accompanied by a claim of right, I charge you that he would have a title by prescription as against the plaintiff, and you would be authorized to find for the defendant the premises sued for." This charge should have been given to the jury, because this was an issue raised by the pleadings.

[1-5] 2. The other grounds of the motion for new trial, complaining of the admission of evidence and of excerpts from the charge, are without merit.

3. The verdict was supported by the evidence, and the court did not err in refusing to grant a new trial.

tions being affirmed, the cross-bill is dismissed.

WILLIAMSON v. STATE. (No. 2316.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Criminal law \S 1144(14)—Correct charge presumed, when no complaint made.

When there is no complaint that the court did not charge generally on the subject of reasonable doubt, the presumption is that there was a correct charge on that subject.

2. Criminal law \S 828—Failure to give further charge on reasonable doubt without written request not error.

Where there was presumptively a correct charge on the subject of reasonable doubt, a failure to charge further on such subject was not error, in the absence of a written request.

3. Criminal law \S 828—Full charge on justifiable homicide should be requested in writing.

On a trial for murder, if accused desired a more full and complete charge on justifiable homicide, it was his duty to duly request it in writing.

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; Moses Wright, Judge.

C. H. Porter, Sol. Gen., of Rome, E. S. Taylor, of Summerville, R. A. Denny, Atty. Gen., and Graham Wright, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

GILBERT, J. The defendant was convicted of the offense of murder, and, his motion for new trial having been overruled, he excepted. In addition to the general grounds, error is assigned, first, because the court "failed to charge the jury that, if they believed that the defendant did not act in self-defense, nor that he was justified, but was guilty either of the crime of murder or voluntary manslaughter, and if they further believe there was a reasonable doubt as to whether he was guilty of murder or voluntary manslaughter, it would be the duty of the jury, under the law, to give the defendant the benefit of such reasonable doubts and find him guilty of voluntary manslaughter"; second, that the court failed to charge the jury in regard to the right of the accused to justify his defense on the ground that the deceased was about to commit the offense of mayhem on defendant. Held:

[1, 2] 1. There is no complaint that the court did not charge generally upon the subject of reasonable doubt, and therefore the presumption is that there was a correct charge on that subject. That being true, it was not error for the court to fail to charge further upon the subject, in the absence of a written request. Spears v. State, 53 Ga. 252.

[3] 2. If the accused had desired a more full and complete charge in respect to the subject of justifiable homicide, it was his duty to duly request the same in writing.

3. The verdict of the jury is supported by evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

BANK OF CUMMING v. WALDRIP.
(No. 2215.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Public lands — 148—Sheriff's sale previous to grant from state was void.

On the trial of a complaint for land in Cobb county, where the plaintiff's right to recover necessarily depended upon the validity of a sale of the land by a sheriff in the year 1837, before the issuing of the grant by the state, the court did not err in rejecting, on timely objection, the deed made by the sheriff pursuant to such sale, and a nonsuit necessarily followed.

Error from Superior Court, Cobb County; D. W. Blair, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Cumming against G. W. Waldrip. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Geo. F. Gober, of Atlanta, and H. L. Patterson, of Cumming, for plaintiff in error.

J. P. Brooke, of Alpharetta, and Bryan & Middlebrooks, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

GILBERT, J. Bank of Cumming brought a complaint against G. W. Waldrip for the recovery of a lot of land in Cobb county. The abstract of title attached to the plaintiff's petition showed a grant from the state to Isaac Waters, dated November 18, 1842; deed from Isaac Waters to James G. Shinholster, dated February 20, 1837; deed from Daniel May, sheriff of Cobb county, to Abraham Hargraves, dated May 2, 1837; this deed was made pursuant to a sale under a fi. fa. in favor of William Freeman against James G. Shinholster, dated July 27, 1831; then by successive conveyances from Hargraves to the Bank of Cumming. The defendant admitted possession of the land, claimed title thereto, and denied the right of the plaintiff to recover. During the trial the plaintiff offered as evidence the above-mentioned sheriff's deed, to which the defendant objected, on the ground that under the act of the General Assembly approved December 23, 1833 (Acts 1833, p. 121; Prince's Digest, 565), the sale of the land by the sheriff, previously to the issuing of the grant by the state, was void, and conveyed no title to the purchaser, Hargraves. The court sustained the objection. This deed constituted a necessary link in the chain of the plaintiff's title; and, it having been rejected, the court, on motion, granted a nonsuit. Error is assigned on the rejection of the deed and the resultant nonsuit, and this constitutes the sole issue in the case.

Section 4 of the aforesaid act of 1833 is as follows:

"From and after the passage of this act, sales or mortgages of land in said counties [Cobb and other counties], that may be hereafter made, either by sheriffs, or other person or persons, before the grant for the same shall have issued, shall be void and of no effect, either in law or equity."

It will be observed that the grant from the state to Waters was more than five years subsequent to the execution of the deed from Waters to Shinholster. The levy upon and sale of the land by the sheriff was subsequent to the passage of the act of 1833, and previous to the grant from the state, at which time Shinholster possessed no leviable interest in the land; and under the terms of the act the sale was void. Consequently Hargraves obtained no title by virtue of the sale, and could convey none. Garlick v. Robinson, 12 Ga. 340.

Counsel for the plaintiff cite a number of cases dealing with sales of land obtained under grants from the state, where the drawer had conveyed his title before the issuing of the grant. All of the decisions in these cases hold, in substance, that after the draw and before the grant, the equitable title is in the drawer, and the legal title is in the state, for the use of the drawer, on his payment of the grant fee. This equitable title is transferable; when transferred, the legal title in the state becomes a legal title for the use of the transferee, on the payment of the grant fee. Consequently, on the issuing of the grant to the drawer, the legal title passes through him, without stop, into the transferee, by virtue of the statute of uses. Bivins v. Vinzant, 15 Ga. 521; Witzel v. Pierce, 22 Ga. 112; Henderson v. Hackney, 23 Ga. 383, 68 Am. Dec. 529; Dudley v. Bradshaw, 29 Ga. 17; Thursby v. Myers, 57 Ga. 156; Parker v. Jones, 57 Ga. 204; Pridgen v. Green, 80 Ga. 737, 7 S. E. 97; Cannon v. Young, 92 Ga. 165, 17 S. E. 863. None of these cases, however, deal with the question here at issue, as to the validity of a sheriff's sale of such land previous to the grant by the state. The sheriff's deed was properly rejected, and the nonsuit necessarily followed.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur, except GEORGE, J., absent.

WIDNER v. STATE. (No. 2235.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

Criminal Law \S 958(1)—New trial for newly discovered evidence properly denied when no affidavits presented concerning witnesses' character, etc.

A motion for a new trial for newly discovered evidence was properly denied where no affidavits as to the intelligence of the witnesses who would give such newly discovered evidence, their associates, means of knowledge, character or credibility, were adduced as required by Civ. Code, \S 6086, and no facts were shown taking the case out of that section.

Error from Superior Court, Miller County; W. C. Worrill, Judge.

Proceeding between the State and Levi Widner. Judgment for the State, and Widner brings error. Affirmed.

Alton B. Cowart and Geo. B. Cowart, both of Colquitt, for plaintiff in error.

B. T. Castellow, Sol. Gen., of Cuthbert, R. R. Arnold, of Atlanta, R. A. Denny, Atty. Gen., and Graham Wright, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BECK, P. J. 1. One ground of the motion for new trial in this case is based upon alleged newly discovered evidence, and this is furnished by the affidavits of three witnesses; but no affidavits as to the intelligence of the witnesses, their associates, their means of knowledge, their character and credibility, were adduced, in accordance with the provisions requiring this under the statute contained in section 6086 of the Civil Code, and no facts are shown by affidavits or otherwise to take this case out of the operation of the rule. Nor was the judge, under the affidavits submitted, compelled to find that the proper degree of diligence had been used to procure this evidence before the trial.

2. The other grounds of the motion are the usual general grounds that the verdict was contrary to the evidence and without evidence to support it. It does not appear, however, upon examination of the evidence, that the verdict was without evidence to support it.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur, except GEORGE, J., absent.

WALKER v. STATE. (No. 2296.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

Criminal law \S 785(8)—Instruction as to considering woman's character in passing on credibility held substantially correct.

In instruction that one might commit rape on a prostitute, but that the character of the alleged victim as to virtue, or her bad character as to being a prostitute, might be taken into consideration by the jury in determining the weight and credit to be given her testimony, etc., held substantially correct.

Error from Superior Court, Emanuel County; R. N. Hardeman, Judge.

Green Walker was convicted of rape, and he brings error. Affirmed.

T. N. Brown and I. L. Price, both of Swainsboro, for plaintiff in error.

Walter F. Grey, Sol. Gen., of Swainsboro, and R. A. Denny, Atty. Gen., and Graham Wright, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HILL, J. The defendant was indicted for the crime of rape, and the jury trying him returned a verdict of guilty, with a recommendation that his punishment be from two to four years in the penitentiary. He made a motion for new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

1. The court instructed the jury as follows:

"Well, that is the rule; but I have charged them about the weight and credit to be given to the testimony. Gentlemen, I charge you this: The jury may consider every fact and circumstance appearing to illustrate the truth of the transaction. I do charge you in that connection, also, that the mere fact that one may be a prostitute, may be entirely without virtue, does not prevent the commission of the offense of rape. One may be guilty of rape upon a prostitute; but the jury may take into consideration, as a matter of course, the character of the alleged victim as to virtue, her bad character as to being a prostitute, in determining the weight and credit to be given the testimony, and in determining the truth of the transaction. All of those are matters to be considered by the jury in determining the weight and credit of the evidence and the truth of the transaction, in determining whether he be guilty or not guilty, or whether you entertain a reasonable doubt as to his guilt."

It is insisted that the above charge was error, because, while attempting to do so, the court failed to charge that the evidence as to the previous unchaste character of the woman alleged to have been raped might be considered in determining the question as to whether she consented to the sexual intercourse, there being evidence as to the previous unchaste character of the woman. The charge as given was substantially correct. Black v. State, 119 Ga. 746(5), 47 S. E. 370.

2. There was sufficient evidence to support the verdict, and the court did not err in refusing a new trial.

HOLT v. STATE. (No. 2264.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

Master and servant \S 345—Indictment for enticing servant held bad.

Under Pen. Code 1910, \S 125, making it a misdemeanor to entice a servant, cropper, or farm laborer to leave his employer during the term of service, an indictment is fatally defective, where it omits the essential clause, "to leave his employer during the term of service."

Error from Superior Court, Crisp County; O. T. Gower, Judge.

M. H. Holt was convicted of an offense, and he brings error. Reversed.

Whipple & McKenzie, of Cordele, for plaintiff in error.

J. B. Wall, Sol. Gen., and Jesse Grantham, both of Fitzgerald, and Crum & Jones, of Cordele, for the State.

FISH, C. J. Penal Code, \S 125, declares:

"If any person shall, by offering higher wages or in any other way, entice, persuade, or decoy, or attempt to entice, persuade, or decoy any servant, cropper, or farm laborer, whether under a written or parol contract, after he shall have actually entered the service of his employer, to leave his employer during the term of service, knowing that said servant, cropper, or farm laborer was so employed, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

An indictment for a violation of this section, which omitted the essential part thereof, viz. "to leave his employer during the term of service," failed to charge any penal offense, and the court erred in overruling the general demurrer attacking the indictment on that ground.

In view of this ruling, the grounds of the demurrer urging the unconstitutionality of the statute upon which the indictment was founded will not be considered.

Judgment reversed.

FLANIGAN v. NOWELL et al. (No. 2184.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Property \S 9—Evidence insufficient to show title to money taken from persons arrested.

Under the evidence in the case, the court did not err in directing a verdict for the defendants.

Error from Superior Court, Barrow County; A. J. Cobb, Judge.

Suit by J. R. Flanigan against Calloway Nowell and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

John R. Flanigan brought an equitable petition against W. H. Beddingfield, Calloway Nowell, Floyd Lockett, and Courtney Russell, and alleged in substance as follows: The plaintiff had intrusted one of the defendants, Courtney Russell, who was a share cropper with the plaintiff, with certain cotton for the purpose of selling it and returning to the plaintiff the money arising from the sale. Russell sold the cotton for the sum of $310, and it is charged that Nowell and Lockett inveigled Russell to their home and there gave him whisky until he became drunk, and when he was thus in a dazed condition Nowell and Lockett took the money and converted it to their own use. When Russell became sober he reported the conduct of Nowell and Lockett to the defendant Beddingfield, who was a policeman, and who arrested and searched Nowell and Lockett, and found upon their persons the aggregate sum of $326.82; Nowell having $279.60 and Lockett having $47.22. The money was deposited by Beddingfield in a bank to the credit of Beddingfield, Nowell, and Lockett jointly, and the money is still on deposit. Nowell and Lockett are young negroes, working for small wages, and neither has any property. Beddingfield does not claim any title or interest in the money, except as a holder for the real owner. Courtney Russell is insolvent and has no property. When the money was deposited in the bank, it was commingled with other funds placed on general deposit, and it would be impossible for plaintiff to identify the money or describe it with such particularity as is required in an action of trover; and for this reason he has no adequate remedy at law, and brings this action, and prays that he may have judgment finding the $310 to be his property, that by proper decree it be delivered to him, and that until the final disposition of this case he be allowed to give bond and take possession of the $310 and hold it subject to the order of the court.

In their answer Nowell and Lockett denied that the money taken from them by the policeman belonged to Flanigan. Russell, the cropper, was made a party defendant; but he filed no answer. Beddingfield, the policeman, claimed no interest in the funds, but was a mere stakeholder; and, a bond having been given by the plaintiff, Flanigan, and the money turned over to him, the name of Beddingfield was stricken as a party defendant. After hearing evidence and argument of counsel, the court directed a verdict in favor of the defendants Nowell and Lockett, and the plaintiff excepted.

Lewis C. Russell and Jos. D. Quillian, both of Winder, for plaintiff in error.

G. D. Ross, of Winder, and Shackelford & Meadow and Thos. J. Shackelford, all of Athens, for defendants in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). From a careful reading of the evidence in this case, we conclude that the verdict directed by the court was demanded; there being no evidence to show that the money found on the persons of the defendants Nowell and Lockett was the money of the plaintiff, Flanigan. Nor are the circumstances such as would authorize a jury to find that the money was that of the plaintiff. Courtney Russell, the cropper of Flanigan, who claims to have been robbed, did not testify in the case. Both the defendants, Nowell and Lockett, denied that they had taken or received any money from Russell; and it was shown by two witnesses that one or two days before the alleged robbery one of the defendants was in possession of something over $210; and while it is true that Nowell admitted that he had been in a gambling game with six other men, including Courtney Russell, there is nothing in the record to show that he won any of Russell's money; and, even if it could be said that any money had been won from Russell, it does not appear that the money belonged to the plaintiff, Flanigan. We think, therefore, that the court properly directed a verdict for the defendants, under the evidence in the case; and so far as appears from the record, no ruling was made or invoked upon the demurrer based upon the ground that there was no equity in the petition, and consequently the question is not presented to this court as to whether or not the suit could be maintained in this form.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur, except GEORGE J., absent.

HENDERSON v. CITIZENS' FIRST NAT. BANK OF ALBANY. (No. 1867.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 15, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

Banks and banking §117—Bank liable on note executed by officer and indorsed by bank.

An insolvent bank in the hands of a receiver was liable on notes executed by officers of the insolvent bank, payable to such bank, indorsed by it, and assigned to another bank for a valuable consideration.

Error from Superior Court, Turner County; R. Eve, Judge.

Intervention proceeding by the Citizens' First National Bank of Albany, Ga., against J. W. Henderson, receiver of the Bank of Sycamore. Judgment for intervenor, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The petition for intervention, as amended, alleged that a receiver was appointed for the Bank of Sycamore, which was indebted to intervenor upon a note payable to the order of the Bank of Sycamore, which said note was transferred and assigned by indorsement to the intervenor for a valuable consideration by said Bank of Sycamore. The note was executed by officers of defendant bank.—Statement by editor.

A. S. Bussey and T. A. McNicholas, both of Cordele, for plaintiff in error.

Milner & Farkas, of Albany, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. 1. The amendment, properly construed, was an elaboration of the matter contained in the original petition for intervention, which was itself a suit on contract. The petition as amended set forth a cause of action.

2. The evidence was sufficient to support the judgment for the intervener, which was rendered by the court without a jury, upon agreed facts and other evidence.

3. The case differs from Henderson v. National Bank of Tifton, 146 Ga. 799, 92 S. E. 525. In that case the bank for which the defendant was receiver was not a party to the note sued on, whereas in this case the note was payable to the order of the insolvent bank, which indorsed it to the intervener.

Judgment affirmed.

2. Wills §497(2)—Grandson, reared by testator, held not entitled to rights of child, under gift to "children."

Where a grandson of a testator, reared in the testator's family, was referred to in one item of a codicil as a grandson, and in another by name without other designation, he was not entitled to be regarded as a child, under a provision that, if any legatees died without children, the property given them should go to the living "children" mentioned in the codicil.

Error from Superior Court, Hancock County; J. B. Park, Judge.

Suit by J. F. Brookings against K. T. Trawick. Judgment dismissing the petition, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

G. L. Dickens and T. M. Hunt, both of Sparta, for plaintiff in error.

Burwell & Fleming, of Sparta, for defendant in error.

GILBERT, J. [1, 2] Brookings filed complaint against Trawick, for a one-third undivided interest in described land. Plaintiff's claim is based upon the terms of the will of his grandfather Frederick Trawick. This will, which is attached to the petition, among other provisions, disposed of the land in question by devising it to Martha W. Franks, a daughter of the testator. Mrs. Franks died without child or children, leaving two sisters, the only children born of the testator. The plaintiff claims that he stands in the position of a child, rather than a grandchild, because in his infancy, and during the time of the absence of his father in the Confederate army, his mother, a daughter of the testator, gave petitioner to his grandfather, Frederick Trawick; that on the return of his father from the army he recognized the gift, and never claimed petitioner as his child; that petitioner was reared in the family of his grandfather as a child, and was always treated as such. The particular part of the will relied upon is the following in the codicil:

"If any of my legatees die without children, the property given or coming to them in this will is to go to the living children mentioned in the codicil."

Another paragraph of the codicil disposes of the personal property of the testator to—

"my son James P. Trawick, my daughters Amanda Brookings, Martha W. and Susan J. Trawick, and John F. Brookings."

The plaintiff contends that under the item first quoted he is entitled to a one-third interest in the land sued for, which was devised to Mrs. Franks. It will be observed that in the disposition of the personal property, as quoted above, the testator names one person as a son and several others as daughters, concluding the list of legatees with the name of John F. Brookings, without calling him either son or grandson. In a previous item of the codicil, however, to wit, the second item, the testator provides as follows:

"I give to my grandson, John Frederick Brookings, one-third of my Buffalo or Perkins plantation"

—thus clearly showing that he regarded Brookings as a grandson and not as a son. The court dismissed the petition on general demurrer, which constitutes the basis of the sole assignment of error. It appears that the ruling of the court was proper, and that the judgment must be

HILL v. HIXON, Sheriff. (No. 2284.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Attachment \S 191—Defendant not entitled to replevy, when agreeing that officer should sell and hold proceeds.

Where the defendant in an attachment case did not give a replevy bond, under Civ. Code 1910, § 5113, but it was agreed that the constable should sell the property and deliver the proceeds to the sheriff, to be held until final disposition, defendant was not thereafter entitled to replevy the proceeds on giving bond.

2. Mandamus \S 68—Does not lie against sheriff, holding fund as stakeholder, and not as officer.

Where the parties to an attachment suit agreed that the constable should sell the property and deliver the proceeds to the sheriff, to be held until final disposition of the case, the sheriff held the fund as a mere stakeholder, and, it not being his official duty to accept a replevy bond and pay over the fund to the defendant, he could not be required to do so by mandamus, under Civ. Code 1910, § 5440, authorizing mandamus to compel performance of official duties.

Error from Superior Court, Greene County; J. B. Park, Judge.

Petition by John Hill against E. C. Hixon, Sheriff. Judgment for the Sheriff, and the petitioner brings error. Affirmed.

M. C. Few, of Madison, for plaintiff in error.

Noel P. Park, of Greensboro, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. A constable levied on personally an attachment issued by a justice of the peace, returnable to a city court. In pursuance of an agreement of the parties, made by their attorneys at law, the constable sold the property on a given date and delivered the proceeds of sale to the sheriff of the county, who was also the sheriff of the city court, to be held by him until the final determination of the rights of the parties. Subsequently, and before the term of the city court to which the attachment was returnable, the defendant presented to the sheriff a bond in substantially double the amount of the fund in his hands, with sureties, payable to the plaintiff in attachment, for the eventual condemnation money, and demanded its acceptance by the sheriff and the delivery of the fund in his hands to the defendant. The sheriff refused to comply with such demand. Thereupon the defendant presented to the judge of the superior court his petition against the sheriff, setting forth in substance the facts as above stated, and praying that the judge order the sheriff to show cause why he should not comply with the demand to accept the bond and to pay over the fund in his hands to petitioner.

[1,2] Upon the hearing set by the judge, which was in term time, the sheriff answered, admitting substantially the allegations of the petition, but contending, among other things, that the prayers of the petition should not be granted. The judge ruled that he had no authority to order the sheriff to pay the fund in his hands to petitioner. Held, that the judge did not err in rendering this judgment. No replevy bond was given by the defendant, as provided in such an attachment case. Civil Code 1910, § 5113. The agreement between the parties that the constable should sell the property on a given date and deliver the proceeds of sale to the sheriff, to be held by him until the final disposition of the case, controls the rights of the parties, and the provision of the Civil Code just cited, allowing the defendant in attachment to replevy the property, does not apply. Under the agreement the sheriff holds the fund as a mere stakeholder; and it not being, in the circumstances, his official duty to accept the bond and pay over the fund to the defendant in attachment, he could not be required to do so by mandamus. Civil Code 1910, § 5440; Sapp v. DeLacy, 127 Ga. 659 (1), 56 S. E. 754. Judgment affirmed.

GARRICK et al. v. TIDWELL. (No. 2045.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 16, 1921.
Judgment Adhered to March 5, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Landlord and tenant \S 62(4)—Tenant holding over may set up defense of equitable ownership.

In a proceeding for eviction of a tenant holding over under Civ. Code 1910, §§ 5385-5388, defendant may repel the charge that he is tenant by proving that he is equitable owner of the land by parol gift from the alleged landlord.

2. Judgment \S 747(1/2)—In proceeding to evict tenant res judicata in action between same parties to recover land.

A judgment of the superior court in a statutory proceeding for the eviction of a tenant holding over, commenced and tried under the provisions of Civ. Code 1910, §§ 5385-5388, defendant having repelled the charge that he was tenant by proving that he was equitable owner under a parol gift from the landlord, could be pleaded in estoppel in an action or complaint for land between the same parties or their privies.

3. Judgment \S 663—Under review in Court of Appeals cannot be pleaded in estoppel.

A judgment of the superior court in a proceeding for the eviction of a tenant holding over, commenced and tried under the provisions of Civ. Code 1910, §§ 5385-5388, defendant having repelled the charge that he was tenant by proving that he was equitable owner under a parol gift from the landlord, could not be pleaded as an estoppel while it was under review in the Court of Appeals, until affirmed by that court and the decision of the reviewing court made the judgment of the trial court.

4. Pleading ⚡366—Order striking paragraph of answer setting up judgment from which appeal was pending did not estop amendment of answer after affirmance of judgment.

A judgment, unexcepted to, striking a paragraph of the answer setting up as an estoppel a judgment in dispossessory proceedings under Civ. Code 1910, §§ 5385-5388, while that judgment was on review in the Court of Appeals, did not estop defendant from amending the answer in such manner as to set up the judgment in the dispossessory proceedings as an estoppel after that judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeals and the judgment of the reviewing court made the judgment of the trial court, and court erred in striking the amendment.

5. New trial ⚡125—Ground for, should be complete within itself.

A ground of a motion for new trial should be complete within itself, and when such a ground complains of the admission in evidence of an administrator's deed on the ground that the land was held adversely to the administrator at the time of the sale, and the deed does not show such fact, and no evidence is set out in the ground of the motion for new trial showing admission of such fact, the objection to the admission of the deed is insufficient to require its exclusion.

6. Appeal and error ⚡1099(7)—Decision on former appeal as to competency of witness law of case.

Decision on prior appeal as to competency of witness to testify under Civ. Code 1910, § 5858, is controlling, where the record on the subject, while more elaborate, is not substantially different from what it was on the former appeal.

7. Witnesses ⚡159(7)—Making of improvements held to have reference to a transaction with decedent, and incompetent.

In an action involving title to land, instituted by the "personal representative" of a decedent against one who set up a parol gift of the land by the decedent and the making of valuable improvements on the land in pursuance of the alleged gift, testimony of the defendant to effect that during the life of the donor he placed valuable improvements on the land held to have reference to a "transaction" with the decedent, which the latter could have rebutted, denied, or explained if alive, and defendant was incompetent to give such testimony as a witness under Civ. Code 1910, § 5858.

8. Landlord and tenant ⚡285(4)—In action for eviction, ruling on evidence held proper.

In an action by a widow, as sole heir at law, to evict alleged tenants holding over under

Civ. Code 1910, §§ 5385-5388, where defendants claimed a parol gift from decedent and offered testimony of a defendant: "While going from my house to Mr. B.'s, I told her [the plaintiff] about this contract between me and Mr. T. [the decedent]. I told her about the contract me and Mr. T. had; that I was to give six bales of cotton for the place as long as he lived, and she told me she understood it—says, 'Everything is all right.' That is exactly what she told me; that I need not fear narry moment of my life; that it was all right. I told her the whole contract"—court did not err in permitting the witness only to testify that "she told me she understood it; everything is all right; that I need not fear narry moment of my life."

9. Witnesses ⚡159(8)—Court properly refused testimony as to transactions with decedent.

In an action by the sole heir at law of a decedent to evict a tenant holding over under Civ. Code 1910, §§ 5385-5388, defendants claiming a parol gift from the decedent under a contract that they should give to decedent during his life six bales of cotton per year, court did not err in refusing to permit a defendant to testify that "as long as he [decedent] lived I paid him six bales of cotton per year, according to the contract."

10. Evidence ⚡471(27)—Testimony held not inadmissible as conclusion.

In an action by a widow as sole heir to evict alleged tenants holding over under Civ. Code 1910, §§ 5385-5388, where defendants claimed under a parol gift whereby they were to own the land on the death of decedent on giving him six bales of cotton per year during his life, the court did not err in refusing to rule out testimony of plaintiff that defendants "were living on that land as tenants; he had been my husband's tenant on that land somewhere between 25 and 30 years; he paid six bales of cotton a year for that land"—as against an objection that it was irrelevant, immaterial, and a conclusion.

11. Trial ⚡29(1)—Remarks of court, in absence of jury, held not error.

Remarks of the court, made in the absence of the jury: "The law that applies in this case, that permits parties to enforce a parol contract of land, where the donor or grantor is dead, is in my opinion a bad law, and should be abolished and repealed by the Legislature. There was a bill introduced in the Legislature to do so, but it failed to pass. While I am personally opposed to the law, I think that I can give you a fair trial"—held not to show that the court was unconsciously prejudiced by reason of the fact that he was unfriendly to the law that governed the case.

Beck, P. J., and George, J., dissenting in part.

Error from Superior Court, Meriwether County; John D. Humphries, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Claudia Tidwell against George W. Garrick and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

The grounds of motion for new trial were in part as follows:

(4) Because upon the trial of said case the court erred in illegally withholding from the jury against the demand of the movants the following material evidence offered by them, to wit: The testimony of George W. Garrick as a witness, as follows: "While going from my house to Mr. Bowers' I told her [Mrs. Claudia Tidwell, plaintiff] about this contract between me and Mr. Tidwell. I told her about the contract me and Mr. Tidwell had; that I was to give six bales of cotton for the place as long as he lived, and she told me she understood it—says: 'Everything is all right.' 'That's exactly what she told me; that I need not fear narry moment of my life; that it was all right. I told her the whole contract.'" The court then and there permitted this witness to testify in this connection to the following disjointed, as movants contend, sentences and phrases, covered in the above recital of this witness: "She told me she understood it. Everything is all right; that I need not fear narry moment of my life." All the remaining portion of said testimony was excluded and rejected by the court, which was illegal and error. The court permitted this witness to testify in this connection what Mrs. Tidwell said and stated in the conversation referred to, but refused and rejected that portion of the testimony which consisted of statements made by the witness Garrick to Mrs. Tidwell in the conversation, and in so ruling and holding the court committed error, and made it impossible for the disconnected statements made by Mrs. Tidwell in the conversation to show any intelligence or to convey any information to the court and jury, and in so rejecting the statements made by Garrick, the witness, completely destroyed the sense, force, and effect of said testimony. This examination was by defendant's counsel.

(5) Because the court committed error in refusing to allow the witness George W. Garrick, introduced by the defendants, to testify as follows: "I have built barns and stables; I think about eight stables, cribs, smokehouse, and grain and seed houses; two-story building, where I could put it up stairs, at my own expense. I set out the orchard. I did all that was done about the terrace. I terraced on the place all that it needed. I put all the ditches there. I have cleared up all the land I have got, from a one-horse farm to close to a four-horse farm. I cleared it up at my own expense and labor." * * *

(6) Because the court committed error in refusing to allow the witness George W. Garrick, introduced by the defendants, to testify as follows: "When we first went there, where Tidwell placed me in possession, he told us if we would go on that place—it was all dilapidated; there wasn't any buildings hardly that we could live in—said if we would go there and take possession of the lands, and pay him six bales of cotton a year until his death, that the place should be ours. I was to improve it, and put any buildings there that I decided to put there, whatever the cost might be. About the clearing I was unlimited." * * *

(7) Because the court committed error in refusing to allow the witness George W. Garrick, one of the defendants, introduced by the defendants, to testify as follows: "As long as he [J. A. J. Tidwell] lived I paid him six bales of cotton per year according to the contract." Movants insist that the aforesaid testimony was material, and the court rejected and withheld the same from the jury against the demands of movants, and in so doing the court committed error, and said ruling was illegal.

(8) Because the court committed error in refusing to allow the witness George W. Garrick, one of the defendants, introduced by defendants, to testify as follows: "Nobody has made any improvements on that place since I went there, but myself. Since I have been there I have borne all of the expense." * * *

(10) Because, during the progress of the trial, movants moved the court to rule out the following material evidence, testified to by Mrs. Claudia Tidwell, and introduced by the plaintiff, to wit: "Mr. Garrick and his wife were living on that land as tenants. He had been my husband's tenant on that land somewhere between 25 and 30 years. He paid six bales of cotton a year for that land." And movants did then and there urge the following grounds of objection to said evidence: That it was irrelevant, immaterial, and a conclusion—which said objection the court then and there overruled, and allowed the evidence to remain before the jury, which rulings movants insist were error. * * *

(13) Because upon the trial of said case the court erred in the following point and particular, to wit: During the trial of the case, at the request of plaintiff's counsel, the jury was sent from the courtroom, and arguments were made to the court by counsel during the absence of the jury, and in connection with such argument the court, referring to the law governing the case then on trial, used the following language from the bench: "The law that applies in this case, that permits parties to enforce a parol contract of land, where the donor or grantor is dead, is in my opinion a bad law, and should be abolished and repealed by the Legislature. There was a bill introduced in the Legislature to do so, but it failed to pass. While I am personally opposed to the law, I think that I can give you a fair trial." While movants concede the honesty and integrity of the court, yet they insist that this language of the court clearly implies and warrants the conclusion that their case was unconsciously prejudiced in the mind of the court by reason of the fact that the court was unfriendly to the law that governed their case, and by reason of this fact the court, with honest intentions, but with erroneous judgment, construed this law too strictly against movant, and likewise weighed and judged the evidence in the case unfavorable against them. * * *

N. F. Culpepper and Hatchett & Hatchett, all of Greenville, R. W. Freeman, of Newnan, and Troutman & Freeman, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

H. A. Allen, and R. R. Arnold, both of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. [1, 2] 1. A judgment of the superior court in a statutory proceeding for the eviction of a tenant holding over, commenced and tried under the provisions of Civil Code, §§ 5385-5388, providing for summary eviction of tenants holding over, failing to pay rent when due, or tenants at will or sufferance refusing to deliver possession when the same is duly demanded, is conclusive between the parties and their privies in estate. In such a case the defendant may repel the charge that he is tenant, by proving that he is equitable owner of the land under a parol gift from the alleged landlord. When that is done, and the issue as to title is actually decided, the judgment based on such issue may be pleaded in estoppel in an action of complaint for land between the same parties or their privies. Tomlinson v. Driver, 53 Ga. 9; Hammond v. Thornton, 107 Ga. 259, 33 S. E. 183; Irvin v. Spratlin, 127 Ga. 240, 55 S. E. 1037, 9 Ann. Cas. 341, and cases cited. If the decision in Jordan v. Jordan, 103 Ga. 482, 30 S. E. 265, is in conflict with that in the case of Tomlinson v. Driver, supra, it must yield to the older decision, which has been followed by other decisions of this court.

[3] 2. A judgment of the superior court in a proceeding under the statutes mentioned in the preceding division cannot be pleaded as an estoppel while it is under review in the Court of Appeals. But where such a judgment has been carried for review to the Court of Appeals, and affirmed by that court, and the decision of the reviewing court made the judgment of the trial court, the judgment so reviewed may then be pleaded as an estoppel in other cases between the same parties involving the same question.

[4] (a) The judgment, unexcepted to, striking paragraph 10 of the original answer setting up as an estoppel the judgment in the dispossessory proceeding while that judgment was on review in the Court of Appeals, will not estop the defendant from amending the answer in such manner as to set up the judgment in the dispossessory proceeding as an estoppel, after that judgment has been affirmed by the Court of Appeals and the judgment of the reviewing court made the judgment of the trial court.

(b) It was erroneous to strike the amendment to the plea setting up the judgment in estoppel, after it was affirmed by the Court of Appeals and the judgment of the reviewing court had been made the judgment of the trial court.

[5] 3. A ground of a motion for new trial should be complete within itself. When such a ground complains of the admission in evidence of an administrator's deed, on the ground that the land was held adversely to the administrator at the time of the sale, and the deed does not show such fact, and no evidence is set out in the ground of the motion for new trial showing the fact, the objection to the admission of the deed is insufficient to require its exclusion.

[6] 4. When this case was before the Supreme Court on a former occasion (Tidwell

v. Garrick, 149 Ga. 290, 99 S. E. 872), it was held in effect that the plaintiff was the "personal representative" of her deceased husband, within the meaning of Civil Code, § 5858, relating to the competency of witnesses to testify, and that the defendants were incompetent to testify in their own behalf as to "transactions and communications" with the decedent. The record on that subject, while more elaborate, is not substantially different from what it was on the former trial; and the decision above mentioned is controlling. It is argued in the briefs of counsel for the plaintiffs in error that the record is substantially different, but this contention is not borne out by comparison of the records of file in this court. The motion for rehearing, which was denied by this court, stressed the same facts and reasons which are now relied on for a different ruling.

[7] 5. In an action involving title to land, instituted by the "personal representative" of a decedent against one who sets up a parol gift of the land by the decedent and the making of valuable improvements on the land in pursuance of the alleged gift, testimony of the defendant, to the effect that during the life of the donor he had placed valuable improvements on the land, had reference to "a transaction" with the decedent, which the latter could have rebutted, denied, or explained if alive, and the defendant was incompetent to give such testimony as a witness. Civil Code, § 5858; Zellers v. Orr, 147 Ga. 607, 95 S. E. 8; Hill v. Merritt, 146 Ga. 307, 91 S. E. 204; Chamblee v. Pirkle, 101 Ga. 790, 29 S. E. 20.

(a) The case of Walker v. Neil, 117 Ga. 733 (3), 45 S. E. 387, refers to improvements made after the death of the donor.

(b) The case differs on its facts from Nugent v. Watkins, 129 Ga. 382, 58 S. E. 888, in which there was no question as to a gift or other transaction between the deceased and the witness, and where it was held that independent physical facts, which do not involve any communication or transaction with the decedent, are not within the rule excluding such communications and transactions.

[8-11] 6. Other grounds of the amended motion for new trial, relating to admissibility of evidence, and certain remarks of the court made out of the presence of the jury, show no error, and are not of such character as to require elaboration.

7. As the judgment of the trial court will be reversed on account of the ruling striking the amendment to the defendants' answer, no ruling will be made as to the sufficiency of the evidence to authorize the judge to direct a verdict for the plaintiff.

Judgment reversed.

All the Justices concur, except BECK, P. J., and GEORGE, J., who dissent from the ruling in fifth headnote [fifth division] of the opinion].

JONES v. HARRIS. (No. 1973.)(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 17, 1921.
Rehearing Denied Feb. 28, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Ejectment \S 64—Premises should be fully described in pleading.

In an action for the recovery of land, the premises should be so fully described as to enable the sheriff to execute the writ of possession.

2. New trial \S 117(3)—Indefinite verdict may be set aside on motion during term.

A verdict in a civil case, which is too indefinite for enforcement, may be set aside on proper motion for that purpose, made during the term at which the verdict was rendered, though subsequent to its reception by the court and its entry upon the minutes.

3. Judgment \S 358—May be set aside for insufficient description of premises in petition to recover land.

A defendant, who passes over without demurring to a petition in an action for land, which is fatally defective, in that it does not set forth a sufficient description of the premises sued for, may, after verdict and judgment against him, in addition to other available remedies, duly move to set the judgment aside.

4. Ejectment \S 64—Petition held to describe premises insufficiently.

Where, in a petition in an action for land, the naming of adjoining owners is relied on as a necessary part of the description of the land, and the plaintiff is alleged to be the adjoining owner on one side of the land, and the defendant is alleged to be the owner on two sides of the land, the land not being a definite quantity, and no data being given locating the dividing lines between the tract in question and other lands of the parties, such description is fatally defective.

5. Pleading \S 403(2) — Defective description of land in petition not cured by answer.

A petition in an action for land, naming adjoining landowners as a necessary part of the description of the land, plaintiff being alleged to be the adjoining owner on one side, and the defendant being alleged to be the adjoining owner on two sides of the land, the land not being a definite quantity, and no data being given locating the dividing lines, held not cured by allegations in the answer.

6. Ejectment \S 111(1)—Verdict held too indefinite.

A verdict in an action for land, "We, the jury, find for plaintiff, so say we all," was too indefinite, and the court erred in overruling a motion to set it aside, where the pleadings were defective, in that they did not sufficiently describe the land in controversy.

Error from Superior Court, Tattnall County; W. W. Sheppard, Judge.

Action by M. H. Harris against R. D. Jones to recover land. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

The petition described the land in controversy as being bounded as follows:

"On the west and north by lands of R. D. Jones, on the east by lands of M. H. Harris, on the south by lands of E. Widincamp, containing about fifteen hundred (1,500) square yards, same being, in part, a part of the field that had been cultivated annually for the last forty years, or more, by your petitioner, until about January, 1917, at which time your petitioner removed his worm rail fence and stretched a wire fence inside of his field for a distance of about two hundred yards, attaching same to his lot fence, where he keeps his stock, and has so kept them for the last forty years."

The answer and plea filed by the defendant was as follows:

"(1) Defendant admits possession of said land described in the petition and that he is a resident of said county, but denies the other allegations of paragraph 1 of the petition. * * *

"Defendant, further answering said petition, says that the land sued for in said petition is the land of petitioner; that, instead of petitioner being in possession of the land of plaintiff, said plaintiff is in the possession of one acre, more or less, of land of defendant described in about the manner as the lands described in the petition; that said disputed lands being differences in the true land line between the true lands of plaintiff and defendant. Where the land line of plaintiff is straight, the plaintiff has attempted to change the straight line so as to make it bend westward and include about two acres, part of which said Harris now claims possession, and the other part being the part of land sued for in the petition. Defendant therefore files his cross-action and prays a judgment of the court for the recovery of that portion of said land lying westward of such north and south straight line of which said plaintiff is in the possession; defendant claiming title thereto in fee simple.

"Defendant claims title from E. Widincamp by warranty deed covering said disputed lands.

"The plaintiff obtained possession of that portion of said land of which he is possessed under lease from said E. Widincamp, and has never surrendered such possession to him since said term of tenancy began."

The verdict was as follows:

"We, the jury, find for plaintiff, so say we all.

GATE CITY COFFIN CO. v. PAULK. (No. 12062.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Sales §77(2)—Invoice and accompanying statement of terms held not to authorize deductions of freight charges nor to present ambiguity.

The terms of the invoice and of the "term sheet" attached and made a part of it being explicit and unambiguous as to the payment of freight, there was nothing for the jury to consider, and the court erred in submitting the construction of the invoice and term sheet to the jury.

Error from Superior Court, Atkinson County; A. B. Lovett, Judge.

Action by the Gate City Coffin Company against Henry Paulk. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Levi O'Steen, of Douglas, and F. A. Hooper & Son, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

E. R. Smith, of Willacoochee, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. This is a suit upon account, brought in the superior court of Atkinson county. The plaintiff sold to the defendant some undertaker's supplies, and the defendant paid him his bill with the exception of $8.81, for which this suit was brought. There is no conflict in the testimony. The whole case turns on the construction of the invoice and what is called the "term sheet," which accompanied the invoice and was made a part of it. This invoice is in the following language:

"Gate City Coffin Company, Manufacturers of Coffins, Caskets, and Undertaker's Supplies.

"Atlanta, Georgia, Jan. 13, 1919.

"Terms: 2% 30 days. 60 days net. See attached terms.

"Sold to Henry Paulk, Willacoochee, Ga.

½ Hrs 94 Thumb Screw Plates.....	5.55	2 78

The term sheet referred to is as follows:

"Kindly note our terms. If you discount the inclosed invoice: (1) Deduct such part of the freight as the invoice allows. (2) Do not deduct that part of your freight bill that is added for war tax. The government expects you to pay your part of the war, and if it is deducted from our bill the settlement will be returned to you. (3) After deducting the freight, then take off 2 per cent. for cash discount if you pay within 30 days from the date of invoice. (4) Return to us your paid freight bill with your remittance."

On receipt of the invoice and the term sheet, the purchaser, after deducting $8.81 for freight charges and 2 per cent. for discount allowed for cash payment, sent his check. The seller insisted that the purchaser pay the entire freight charges, according to the explicit terms set out in the term sheet. The trial judge thought the term sheet and the invoice were ambiguous as to this, and submitted the question to the jury.

We cannot agree with him that the contract was ambiguous. The invoice expressly refers to the term sheet for the terms, and this term sheet specifically says, in the very first paragraph, that only such part of the freight should be deducted from the bill as the invoice allows, and by reference to the invoice it will be seen that no freight whatever is allowed. It follows, therefore, necessarily that the purchaser was to pay the freight. We conclude that in holding that the contract was ambiguous, and in referring its proper construction to the jury, the court committed an error, as in our opinion the express terms of the contract demanded a verdict for the plaintiff. The order overruling the motion for a new trial was erroneous.

Judgment reversed.

ROUNTREE v. STATE. (No. 11992.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 8, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Criminal law \S 1064(4)—Motion for new trial complaining of admission of evidence should give name of witness.

A ground of a motion for a new trial which complains of the admission of specified testimony must state the name of the witness whose testimony is complained of.

2. Criminal law \S 784(4)—Failure to give charge on circumstantial evidence more comprehensive than statute not error.

The failure to charge a quoted extract from an opinion of the Court of Appeals on the law of circumstantial evidence, which was more comprehensive than Pen. Code 1910, \S 1010, held not error, especially in the absence of a timely and proper written request.

3. Criminal law \S 935(1)—Motion for new trial for refusal to direct verdict is without merit.

There is no merit in a ground of a motion for a new trial which complains of the refusal of the court to direct a verdict.

the name of the witness whose testimony is complained of. Adams v. State, 22 Ga. App. 252, 95 S. E. 877, and cases cited. Under this ruling the fourth ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial cannot be considered.

[2] 2. The fifth ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, after alleging that the evidence was wholly circumstantial, does not aver that the court failed to instruct the jury upon the law of circumstantial evidence, or failed to charge section 1010 of the Penal Code 1910, but merely complains that the court failed to charge "this rule," and then the ground sets forth as "this rule" a quoted extract from the opinion (written by Russell, J.) in Thomas v. State, 8 Ga. App. 95, 68 S. E. 522, wherein it is said what the lower court, under the particular facts of that case, should have charged upon the law of circumstantial evidence. This extract is not in the language of section 1010 of the Penal Code, and is much more comprehensive. Under the facts of the instant case, it was not error, especially in the absence of a timely and appropriate written request, for the court to fail so to charge.

[3] 3. Under repeated rulings of this court and the Supreme Court, there is no merit in a ground of a motion for a new trial which complains of the refusal of the court to direct a verdict.

4. The verdict was authorized by the evidence, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

1. Parent and child §7(3)—Employer putting minor in dangerous employment without parent's consent liable for loss of services from injury.

Where the father, or, in case of his death, the mother, hires a minor son to an employer to do certain work, and the employer, without such parent's consent, puts the minor in a more dangerous employment in which he is injured, the employer is liable to the parent for the consequent loss of the minor's services.

2. Parent and child §7(10)—Minor's contributory negligence not defense to parent's action, where minor put in dangerous employment without consent.

Where an employer, hiring a minor from the parent to do certain work, put the minor in a more dangerous employment without the parent's consent, the minor's contributory negligence was not a defense to the parent's action for loss of services from an injury, and no issue of the minor's negligence was involved.

King & Johnson, of Covington, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. [1, 2] The plaintiff, a widow, sought to recover damages, on account of injuries to her minor son. She alleged that the defendant corporation knowingly put him to work without her consent, in a different position from that in which, under the contract between her and the defendant, he was to be employed, and that he received his injuries as a consequence of such change of work. This issue was correctly presented to the jury, under the charge of the court, there being a conflict in the evidence, and the jury decided the issue in favor of the plaintiff. Held: Where the father, or in the case of the father's death, the mother, hires a minor son to an employer to do certain work, and the employer, without such parent's consent, puts the minor to a different and more dangerous employment, and the minor is injured in such employment, the employer is responsible to such parent for the consequent loss of the minor's services. In such case the gravamen of the action is the alleged wrong of the defendant in putting the minor to work at the dangerous employment without the parent's consent. Therefore contributory negligence of the minor is no defense to such action, and no issue of the minor's negligence is involved. Braswell v. Garfield Cotton Oil Mill Co., 7 Ga. App. 167, 66 S. E. 539; Hendrickson v. L. & N. R. Co., 187 Ky. 562, 126 S. W. 117, and note to this case in 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 311. That Corker employed him as an agent to negotiate the sale of this real estate and to assist in disposing of it at named prices, and agreed to pay him stipulated commissions for his services; that, "in pursuance of said contract, he immediately went to work, in good faith and for the promised consideration, to sell said property and approached some prospects, chief among whom were T. A. Curry and F. J. Schiff, and succeeded in interesting said prospects in the purchase of said property, thus creating, by his efforts under the contract, a demand for said property, making it possible to sell the same on account of petitioner's negotiations and experience in the sale of real estate in the city of Dublin"; that "as a direct result and consequence of his personal negotiations" Corker "did consummate a trade for the sale of said property to Dr. W. R. Brigham," and that the sale of said property by Corker to Brigham was "a result of the efforts of agitation and conduct of your petitioner in seeking to sell said property, and that as a result * * * Corker got the immediate benefit of petitioner's labors in the sale of said property to Brigham, as it required no effort on the part of the said Corker to sell said property to the said Brigham, but was merely the consummation of a contract and deal resulting directly and immediately from labors performed by your petitioner pursuant to the contract with the defendant to sell said property, the said labors performed being negotiations with the said Curry and the said Schiff and others, and thus creating a demand for said property, the demand thus created having interested the said Brigham, the said Brigham having become interested as a direct result of the demand thus created."

Alvin G. Golucke, of Crawfordville, for plaintiff in error.

L. D. McGregor, of Warrenton, for defendants in error.

HILL, J. [1, 2] This was a suit in trover. Two things are essential to show a right of recovery: Title in the plaintiff, and possession in the defendant. Of these essentials the first was admitted. The evidence as to the second consisted of an implied admission of the defendant; and, while the evidence on this point is exceedingly weak, this court cannot say that there was no evidence whatever to support the verdict, and, in the absence of any special assignment of error of law, the refusal of the trial court to grant a new trial must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

STOUFER v. MISSENHEIMER.
(No. 11776.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 26, 1921.)

1. Certiorari § 53—Answer subject to exceptions when pleadings and other parts of record not certified and sent up.

It is the duty of a justice of the peace or other tribunal or person whose decision is sought to be reviewed upon certiorari, when answering the writ of certiorari, to certify and send up all of the proceedings in the cause to the superior court as directed in the writ of certiorari. Civil Code 1910, § 5183. The judge of the superior court therefore erred in overruling the exceptions to the answer of the trial judge upon the ground that copies of the pleadings and other parts of the record were not certified and sent up with the answer.

2. Certiorari § 59—Assignment of error in petition held insufficient to require admission or denial.

An assignment of error in a petition for certiorari that the trial judge expressed an opinion upon the facts, without reciting what opinion was expressed, but merely reciting, "the exact evidence that the court stated being disclosed in the stenographic report," is insufficient and presents no question for determination. It was therefore not error to overrule an exception to the answer upon the ground that the answer fails to either admit or deny the allegations of fact contained in the assignment of error.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action between W. B. Stoufer and R. J. Missenheimer. Judgment for the latter, and the former brings error. Reversed.

CAMPBELL v. PEARCE et al.

PEARCE et al. v. HOLT et al. (KELLY et al., interveners).

(No. 282.)

1. Jury \S 28(1)—No right to trial by jury where reserved right waived.

Where reservation to interveners of right to jury trial was expressly made in the original order of reference, but later to expedite the hearing the interveners and all others expressly waived their right to a jury, and agreed that the matters at issue should be heard and determined by the judge, there was no error by way of denial of jury trial to the interveners.

2. Reference \S 48 — Referee's powers held measured by second and further order of reference.

Though original order for reference in proceedings brought by an administrator to sell lands gave the referee only power to take and state an account, but such cause and another were consolidated, and the further order of reference of the two causes was broad enough to hear and decide all pertinent issues, the referee did not act in excess of the powers conferred upon him in so doing, despite the character of the first order.

3. Reference \S 100(7)—Objection referee acted in excess of powers waived by attending hearings, etc.

Where interveners attended hearings before the referee without protest, and presented all of the testimony relative to their claims, also filed their special exceptions to the report, and consented that they be heard and determined first by one judge, than by another, their objection that the referee acted in excess of his powers conferred upon him by the order of reference should be considered as waived.

4. Executors and administrators \S 59—Evidence held to support finding as to ownership of intervening heirs.

In consolidated proceedings by representatives of decedents to sell land to make assets, evidence held to support the referee's finding in support of the ownership of the heirs of one decedent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Cumberland County; Allen, Judge.

Actions by Archie Campbell, administrator of Burton McArthur, deceased, against Warren Pearce and others, and by Laura Pearce, administratrix of Pettigrew Pearce, deceased, and others, against Rachel Holt and others, in which Robert Kelly and others intervened. From the judgment confirming the reports of the referee, interveners appeal. Judgment affirmed.

Pending the controversy, Robert Kelly, and other children, and their descendants, heirs at law of Isabella McArthur, second wife of Burton McArthur, and born to her prior to her marriage to Burton, were allowed to intervene and claim title to the land in controversy as against the alleged ownership of the original parties, children and their descendants and heirs at law of Burton McArthur, deceased. The referee, among other things not excepted to, reported in favor of the original parties—heirs at law of Burton McArthur, and against the claim of Robert Kelly et al.—children, etc., heirs at law of Isabella. After hearing the cause, the court gave judgment confirming the report of the referee, and the interveners excepted and appealed.

A. M. Moore, of Fayetteville, for appellants.

Nimocks & Nimocks and Sinclair & Dye, all of Fayetteville, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. From a perusal of the record it appears: That Burton McArthur died in 1900, leaving several children as his heirs at law, the facts and findings being to the effect that these children and their descendants were heirs at law under rule 13 of our canons of descent. That he died seized and possessed of a tract of land in controversy, having continuously occupied and possessed same under a deed conveying property to him of date in 1872; that Archibald Campbell, having qualified as his administrator in 1902, filed a petition before clerk to sell the land to make assets in due administration of the estate. On issue joined, cause was transferred to superior court, and in February term, 1915, cause was referred to H. L. Brothers to state an account between estate of Burton McArthur, etc., the order providing that on coming in of report either side may demand a jury trial. That in January, 1918, Robert Kelly et al., children and descendants of Isabella McArthur, second wife of Burton McArthur, born to her prior to her marriage to Burton, made affidavit, alleging that the land in question belonged to them as heirs at law of Isabella, and making averment further that said Isabella had bargained for the land, and she and her children had paid for it. On this affidavit said applicants were made parties to the proceedings. That, one of the heirs of Burton McArthur having died, his widow and other descendants and heirs at law of Burton McArthur, without being advertent to the original petition, instituted a suit for sale of the land for division among the heirs at law of Burton, etc. That, this cause having been transferred to superior court at March term, 1919, before his honor, W. P. Stacy, judge, an order was made consolidating the causes and confirming the order of reference previously made, and directing said referee to hear and determine said causes after due notice, etc. The referee having fully heard and considered the evidence, made a full report thereon; the same, among other things, being against the claim of the interveners and in favor of the heirs at law of Burton McArthur.

In order to expedite the hearing, the parties having waived the jury trial, Judge Calvert at October term entered on hearing, and, being unable to complete same, the hearing was continued before his honor, O. H. Allen, judge, at February term, 1920, and his honor, as stated, confirmed the findings of the referee both of fact and law, and gave judgment for the original parties and against the interveners who have appealed to this court.

Appellants object to the disposition made of the case:

[1] First, that they have been denied a jury trial, expressly reserved to them in the original order of reference. An inspection of the record shows that such a reservation was made. But it further appears that later in the proceedings, in order to expedite the hearing, the interveners and all others both before Judge Calvert and Judge Allen, expressly waived their right to a jury trial, and agreed that the matters on issue should be heard and determined by the judge.

[2, 3] Appellants object further, that the referee acted in excess of the powers conferred upon him by the order of reference. An examination of the record, however, will show that, while the original order in the first cause gave only the power to take and state an account, after the causes were consolidated the further order of reference of the "two causes" seems to be fully broad enough to hear and decide on all pertinent issues, and, if it were otherwise, the appellants having attended the hearings without protest and presented all of the testimony relevant to their claims, filed their specific exceptions to the report, and consented that the same be heard and determined first by Judge Calvert and then by Judge Allen, this objection should be considered as waived.

[4] The further objection that findings of the referee in support of the ownership of the heirs of Burton McArthur are without evidence to support them cannot at all be maintained, it appearing, among other testimony, that Burton McArthur occupied and possessed the land under a deed purporting to convey the absolute title from 1872 to his death in 1900, and that the original parties to this controversy, his children and heirs at law, continued in possession thereafter to this present time.

As a matter of fact there is very little, if any, valid testimony tending to support the claim asserted by the interveners, and the ownership of the original parties, upheld both in the rulings of the referee and the judge must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

RALEIGH TIRE & RUBBER CO. v. MORRIS et al. (No. 252.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 6, 1921.)

1. Fraudulent conveyances §47—Bulk Sales Act is valid.

The Sales in Bulk Act (C. S. § 1013), making the sale in bulk of a stock of merchandise prima facie fraudulent unless the statutory requirements are complied with, is a valid exercise of the police power of the government.

2. Fraudulent conveyances §47, 276—Bulk sale void where statute not complied with and prima facie fraudulent notwithstanding compliance with statute.

Sales coming within the operation of the Sales in Bulk Act, made without compliance with the provisions for notice and an inventory, are void as against creditors, and, where those requirements have been met, such a sale is prima facie fraudulent.

3. Fraudulent conveyances §237(1) — Stock fraudulently sold in bulk may be seized on execution.

When the sale of a stock of merchandise is void as to creditors of the seller by reason of failure to comply with the requirements of the Sales in Bulk Act, the goods can be made available by direct process of levy and sale in the hands of the original purchaser.

4. Fraudulent conveyances §182(1) — Purchaser of stock in bulk liable for value after resale.

Since the purchase of a stock of merchandise in bulk is out of the ordinary course of business, the buyer is thereby affected with notice and may be held liable for the value of the goods if the requirement of the Sales in Bulk Act is not complied with, even after the goods have been disposed of by him.

5. Fraudulent conveyances §47 — Purchaser of stock of "merchandise" liable under Bulk Sales Act, though he is not merchant.

A stock of automobile tires and tubes sold by one who was admittedly a dealer in auto supplies is a stock of merchandise, which is defined as including all those things which merchants sell either at wholesale or retail; whatever is conveyed, sold, or bought in trade or market or by merchants; so that the buyer is liable for the value of the stock where the Sales in Bulk Act was not complied with, even though the buyer was not the merchant of the goods, but merely disposed of them to customers who brought their cars to him for repairs (quoting Words and Phrases, Merchandise).

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Kerr, Judge.

Action by the Raleigh Tire & Rubber Company against E. W. Morris and another, trading as the Morris-Divers Company and J. P. Matthews and another, trading as the Matthews Auto & Electric Company. Judgment for the plaintiff against defendant E. W.

Morris, but in favor of the defendants J. P. Matthews and another, and plaintiff excepts and appeals. New trial.

The action is to recover of Morris-Divers Company a balance due for goods sold and delivered, and to hold defendant the Matthews Auto Electric Company and its members, J. P., and C. T. Matthews, liable by reason of having bought the stock of goods of the debtor, in violation of plaintiff's rights and when the statute applicable to sales in bulk of such stock had not been complied with. There were facts in evidence tending to show that defendant the Morris-Divers Company was a partnership in Lillington, N. C., engaged in the business of selling auto supplies, etc., and in July, August, and September, 1919, they bought of plaintiffs tires and tubes for resale in their business to the amount of $1,040; that they had paid on said account $400 and an additional $50 since suit started, leaving a balance due of $590; that while said company was so indebted they sold out their entire stock of goods to the amount of $800 and more, including some of those bought of plaintiff, to defendant the Matthews Company, a partnership composed of defendants J. P. and C. T. Matthews, and without inventory made or notice given or otherwise complying with the statute appertaining to sales in bulk. Consolidated Statutes § 1013. There was also testimony on part of plaintiff permitting the inference that the goods were placed with the Morris Company on consignment to sell at retail and render an account of proceeds to plaintiff at the end of each month, and that at least $200 of the goods in question were on hand at the time of the sale to the Matthews Company.

There was evidence for defendant tending to show that the Morris-Divers Company had bought the goods outright from the plaintiff company, and there was a balance due of $590.60. There was further evidence to the effect that C. T. Matthews alone composed the Matthews Company, and that J. P. Matthews was only an employee, otherwise having no interest in the business; that defendant bought the stock of the Morris Company, paying them about $800 therefor, and that there was included in the stock about $200 of goods sold to the Morris Company by plaintiff; that the Matthews Company ran a garage and dealt in oils, gas, tires, tubes, etc., but these last were only sold to customers or patrons who had their machines repaired at the shops, and as required for properly carrying on the work of such business. During the progress of the trial it appeared that there had been no service of process on Mary Divers, and a nonsuit was taken as to her.

On an issue submitted the jury found the amount due plaintiff from E. W. Morris to be $590.60, and, the court being of opinion that the sale to the Matthews Company did not properly come within the provisions of the Sales in Bulk Law, and that no other reason for liability had been shown, on motion the case against the Matthews Company was dismissed, and judgment entered against Morris for the balance of plaintiff's debt as declared in the verdict. Plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Evans & Eason, of Raleigh, for appellant.
Ross & Salmon, of Lillington, for appellees.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1,2] The Sales in Bulk Act (1 Consolidated Statutes, § 1013) provides in general terms that "the sale in bulk of a large part or the whole of a stock of merchandise, otherwise than in the ordinary course of trade and in regular and usual prosecution of the sellers' business, shall be prima facie evidence of fraud, and void as against the creditors of the seller," unless a specified notice is given to creditors and inventory made within seven days before the contemplated sale. The statute contains provision also that, if the vendor shall before the sale execute to a trustee a good bond available to creditors to an amount equal to the cash value of the goods, in such instances the law shall not apply. In several cases where the question was directly presented and considered this has been approved as a valid exercise of the police powers of government, and these and other authorities also hold that sales coming within the effect and operation of the statute and without compliance with the provisions as to the notice and inventory are void as against creditors, and where these requirements have been met such a sale is to be regarded as prima facie fraudulent in the trial of an issue as to its validity. Swift & Co. v. Tempelos, 178 N. C. 487, 101 S. E. 8, 7 A. L. R. 1581; Armfield Co. v. Saleeby, 178 N. C. 298, 100 S. E. 611; Whitmore v. Hyatt, 175 N. C. 117, 95 S. E. 38; Gallup v. Rozler, 172 N. C. 283, 90 S. E. 209; Pennell v. Robinson, 164 N. C. 257, 80 S. E. 417, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 77.

[3,4] And when avoided as to creditors of the vendor by reason of failure to comply with the statutory requirements, the goods can be made available by direct process of levy and sale in the hands of the original purchaser, and, being out of the usual course of business and so affecting him with notice, such purchaser may be held liable for their value when they have been disposed of by him under the principles recognized and applied in the well-considered case of Sprinkle v. Wellborn, 140 N. C. 163, 52 S. E. 666, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 174, 111 Am. St. Rep. 827, and either remedy may be pursued by the creditors of the vendor as against subsequent purchasers as long as the goods can be identified or until they pass into the hands of a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice. Manufacturing Co. v. Summers, 143 N. C. 102, 55 S. E. 522. In Sprinkle v. Wellborn the principle is stated as follows:

"The remedy of the vendor is not defeated where a fraudulent vendor has sold the property to an innocent purchaser, for in such case the proceeds of the sale are as available as the property itself. The fraudulent vendee becomes chargeable with the proceeds received from the innocent purchaser, but the property itself is not, and a personal judgment may be obtained."

And in Summers' Case, supra, it was held, among other things:

"That when property has been obtained by actionable fraud it can be followed as long as it can be identified and traced, and the right attaches not only to the wrongdoer himself, but to any one to whom it has been transferred otherwise than in good faith and for valuable consideration."

[5] These being the recognized principles pertinent to the inquiry, it appears from the facts in evidence that the firm of Morris & Divers, dealers in automobile supplies, have sold their entire stock to the Matthews Company, and in our opinion such a sale comes directly within the provision of the statute; that the same is void as against plaintiff as creditor of the vendor, and the defendant purchasers are liable for the value of the goods included in the "stock of merchandise" of the vendors.

It is urged for defendant the Matthews Company that they are proprietors of a repair shop and were not dealers in supplies generally, but only sold to customers whose machines were taken to them for repair, and that they could not properly come within the effect and operation of the statute, citing the recent case of Swift & Co. v. Tempelos, 178 N. C. 487, 101 S. E. 8, 7 A. L. R. 1581, in support of their position. But, apart from the testimony tending to show that these defendants sold tires and tubes and gas and oil, the question here is not what Matthews the purchaser has done and proposed to do with the goods, but what was the business of the vendors who sold to them, and there seems to be no dispute that this company, the original debtor, was a dealer in auto supplies. The character of the bill bought of plaintiff would of itself well-nigh suffice to establish the nature of their business, and there seems to be no dispute about it in the record. The case cited for defendant, Swift v. Tempelos, was the sale of supplies held for the purpose of a restaurant, which were not usually disposed of directly to customers, but only used for the purpose of making their food acceptable to their individual patrons in the ordinary run of their trade and occupation, and, while a bulk sale of such an enterprise was excluded from the effect and operation of the statute, it was treated as an exception coming very near to the border line, and in the well-considered opinion of Associate Justice Walker, the inclusive character of the terms used in the statute "a stock of merchandise" was fully recognized. In the original series of 5 Words and Phrases, p. 4478, Webster's definition of Merchandise is said to be "objects of commerce; whatever is usually bought and sold in trade or market or by merchants; wares, goods, commodities." And, citing several decided cases, the term is further there defined as including "all those things which merchants sell either at wholesale or retail, as dry goods, hardware, groceries, drugs," etc. And again the definition is given as "commodities or goods to trade with," saying that the word came into use as designating the goods and wares sold at fairs and markets. And in the decision referred to and much relied on by defendants, and also in Gallup v. Rozler, the supplies ordinarily sold in a garage are expressly recognized as coming within the statutory terms.

The question of the liability of J. P. Matthews as one of the purchasers or a member of the firm, etc., must be determined under the principles ordinarily applicable to his case as presented in the pleadings and evidence, but on the record we are of opinion, as stated, that this transaction between the Morris-Divers Company and the Matthews Auto Electric Company comes within the provisions of the statute governing sales in bulk, that the purchaser must account for the value of the goods, etc., and for the error indicated plaintiff is entitled to a new trial of the cause; and it is so ordered.

New trial.

COBLE v. LEGG. (No. 329.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 6, 1921.)

Appeal and error. ⇨1002.—Verdict on conflicting evidence conclusive.

Where the controversy was almost entirely one of fact, presenting no serious question of law, and the evidence was conflicting on the issues in the case which were fairly submitted to the jury, a judgment rendered on the jury's special findings will not be reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alamance County; Allen, Judge.

Action by John M. Coble against M. F. Legg. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. No error.

This was an action to recover $452.50 alleged to be due as commissions on the sale of three motortrucks for defendant under a verbal contract. There was conflict in the evidence which was fairly submitted to the jury. The defendant pleaded a counterclaim of $45 paid by him for freight on another truck which he alleged the plaintiff should have paid and $10 paid by him for lettering on a truck which he alleges the plaintiff had agreed to have done. The court submitted two issues:

(1) Is the defendant indebted to the plaintiff? If so, how much? To which the jury responded, $452.50.

(2) Is the plaintiff indebted to the defendant? If so, how much? To which the jury responded, $55.

And thereupon the court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the difference, $397.50.

Hicks & Son, of Henderson, for appellant.
Parker & Long, of Graham, and W. S. Coulter and A. H. King, both of Burlington, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. Upon examination of the record and assignments of error, it is apparent that the controversy was almost entirely one of fact, and no serious question of law is presented. There are three exceptions to the evidence which do not require discussion. There are also exceptions to the failure to nonsuit, and refusal to charge that there was no evidence as to certain facts, and for submitting the matter to the jury, and for refusal to set aside or modify the verdict because against the weight of the evidence, and to the charge; but upon careful consideration of the whole case we see no sufficient ground to disturb the result.

No error.

INGRAM v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.
(No. 292.)

1. Master and servant \Leftrightarrow 137(3) — Railroad held not negligent in failing to keep lookout for brakeman on tender of backing engine.

A railroad company was not negligent in failing to keep lookout for a brakeman crushed between the engine and cars left by him on a storage track so that they were too near the track on which the engine was backing, while he was riding on the tender and giving signals to the engineer following them as his duty required.

2. Master and servant \Leftrightarrow 236(9)—Brakeman held guilty of contributory negligence barring recovery under federal act.

Where a brakeman in charge of placing cars on a storage track not equipped with a "jackknife" or a derailler to indicate clearance could easily see that he had left them too near a passing track, with the result that he was crushed between the backing engine and the cars while he was riding on the tender and giving signals to the engineer, recovery under the federal Employers' Liability Act was barred by contributory negligence as the sole cause of the accident.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover County; Kerr, Judge.

Action by Nellie Ingram, administratrix, against the Atlantic Coast Line Railway Company. There was a judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action to recover damages for the death of the intestate of the plaintiff, caused, as the plaintiff alleges, by the negligence of the defendant, in that: (1) The defendant failed to keep a proper lookout down the track; (2) that the defendant failed to have a jackknife or derailler or other appliance on its storage track at Warsaw.

On the 9th day of March, 1908, at about 8:30 o'clock of a dark, rainy night, the intestate of the plaintiff was brakeman on a freight train going from Wilmington to Rocky Mount. As the train approached Warsaw it ran into a pass track for the purpose of letting a passenger train pass on the main line. After the passenger train passed the freight train backed onto the main line, and there the engine and tender and three cars were cut off for the purpose of placing the three cars in the storage track at Warsaw. The engine and the three cars then passed through the pass track and backed into the storage track, where the three cars were left.

The intestate of the plaintiff was in charge of this movement of the cars, and it was his duty after the three cars were placed in the storage track to pass down the cars on the storage track, there being then 26 or 27 cars on the track, and see that the cars were coupled together, and that the cars on the track were in the clear, by which is meant that they were to be far enough from the pass track that there would be no danger to cars or persons passing on the latter track.

It was the duty of the intestate to see that the cars were in the clear, and this duty was not imposed upon any other employee of the train, and it was the duty of the engineer to observe the signals of the intestate and follow them.

The evidence is that the intestate went to the end of the cars on the storage track, and that he then signaled the engineer to back down the pass track, and he, the intestate, got up on the tender of the engine, and as the engine backed the intestate was crushed and killed between the tender and cars on the storage track, which had been left by the intestate too close to the pass track.

The intestate was an experienced brakeman and familiar with the conditions at Warsaw and knew that there was no jackknife or derailler there.

It was also in evidence and uncontradicted that, without a jackknife or a derailler or any marker, an employee could easily tell whether a car was in the clear; that he could do so by standing on the rail of the pass track and reaching out, and if his hand did not touch the car on the storage track it was clear and in a place of safety, or he could observe the curvature of the storage track as it left the pass track, and, if it was beyond the curve, it was in the clear.

A derailer is an appliance on the top of the rail, and a jackknife one that when operated separates two rails so that the ends do not come together. The principle purpose of each is to prevent cars on side tracks from running out on the main line, although they may also operate to indicate the point of clearance.

The evidence shows that, when cars were being placed in a track, it was the duty of the employee in charge of the movement where the derailer or jackknife was located, if there was one in use, to place them so that, if a car reached that point, it would not be derailed or thrown from the track, but would pass over the derailer or jackknife, and, after the movement or operation was completed, to go to the point and place the derailer or jackknife so that it would derail a car instead of letting it pass along the track.

It was also in evidence that at Warsaw there were three tracks, a main track, a pass track, and a storage track, and that the storage track was higher at both ends than in the middle; also that, when a track was built with both ends higher than in the middle, derailleurs, jackknives, etc., were not in use, although one witness stated that he had known these appliances to be used in four or five side tracks on the Seaboard system.

It was also in evidence that at one time clearance posts were in use, but that these had been abolished upon petition of the employees because dangerous to them in the operation of trains.

At the conclusion of the evidence his honor entered judgment of nonsuit, and the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

E. K. Bryan, of Wilmington, for appellant. Rountree & Carr and Carl H. Davis, all of Wilmington, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. [1] There is no evidence to sustain the first allegation of negligence, as it was the duty of the engineer only to keep a lookout for the signals of the intestate, who was then in charge of the movement of the train, and to follow his signals, and all of the evidence shows that he performed this duty.

[2] Nor do we think that the failure to have a derailer or jackknife had anything to do with the death of the intestate, who knew that there was no derailer or jackknife in the storage track, and whose duty it was to place the cars and see that they were clear of the pass track, and the responsibility for the performance of this duty rested solely on him.

If a derailer or jackknife had been in the track, and he had performed his duty, before pushing the cars into the storage track, he was required to set the appliances so that the cars would pass over them, and their use would not have prevented the cars from reaching the place where the intestate left them. He also could easily see where the cars were as they were much more easily perceived than the appliances referred to, and, according to the evidence, he could have ascertained definitely that the cars were not in the clear when he signaled to the engineer to move backward.

It appears, therefore, that the death of the intestate was caused solely by the failure on his part to perform the duty which had been intrusted to him alone, and under such conditions a recovery cannot be sustained under the Employers' Liability Act, which controls this decision, because the intestate was engaged in interstate commerce.

In Railroad v. Skaggs, 240 U. S. 66, 36 Sup. Ct. 249, 60 L. Ed. 528, an authority relied upon by the plaintiff, the plaintiff, a brakeman, was crushed between two cars because one had been left too near the track, and a recovery was sustained, but upon the ground that there was another brakeman connected with him in the operation of the train, and that the evidence supported the contention of the plaintiff that his injury resulted from the negligence of a fellow servant, but the court says in the course of the opinion:

"The statute does not contemplate a recovery by an employee for the consequences of action exclusively his own."

The syllabus in Railroad v. Wiles, 240 U. S. 444, 36 Sup. Ct. 406, 60 L. Ed. 732, is as follows:

"There is no room for the application of the rule of comparative negligence established by the Employers' Liability Act of April 22, 1906 (35 Stat. at L. 65, c. 149; Comp. Stat. 1918, § 8657), where the rear brakeman of a parted freight train, disregarding his duty to protect the rear of his train by going back a short distance and giving the warning signals which the carrier's rules required, remained in the caboose and was killed there when a passenger train, which he knew was closely following, ran into the standing train, since his was the causal negligence, even if negligence could be imputed to the carrier from the pulling out of the drawbar which caused the train to break in two, there being no claim that the passenger train was negligently run."

In Baugham v. Railroad, 241 U. S. 237, 36 Sup. Ct. 592, 60 L. Ed. 977, the facts were much more favorable to the plaintiff than in this action, and it was held that the plaintiff had assumed the risk, and could not therefore recover.

Affirmed.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 6, 1921.)

1. Carriers §281—Duty to render assistance in alighting to passenger requiring it.

Where a passenger was old and weak and had been ruptured, and the conductor was notified that she needed help in alighting, it was his duty to render her such assistance in alighting as was reasonably necessary in her condition.

2. Appeal and error §930(1)—Verdict assumed supported by the facts.

The Supreme Court must assume that the verdict is supported by the facts, where there is nothing authorizing its impeachment.

3. Carriers §319(2)—Evidence held to justify punitive damages for misconduct of conductor toward alighting passenger.

Evidence that a conductor, though notified that a passenger required assistance in alighting, because old and weak, refused to furnish a step box or permit a boy to get one, and was rude and rough and used insulting language, and threatened to carry her if she could not get off, tended to show inexcusable conduct justifying punitive damages.

4. Damages §91(1)—When punitive damages allowable stated.

Punitive damages may be allowed when there is any element of fraud, malice, such degree of negligence as indicates reckless indifference to consequences, oppression, insult, rudeness, mere caprice, willfulness, or some other element of aggravation in the act or omission causing the injury.

5. Trial §85—General objection to evidence good in part insufficient.

Where some of the evidence objected to is competent, the objection should be specific, and designate the parts supposed to be incompetent, and, when it is general, the exception cannot be sustained.

6. Carriers §320(3)—In action for refusal to assist passenger, nonsuit properly refused.

In an action against a carrier for injuries sustained in alighting because of the refusal of the conductor to furnish the passenger necessary assistance, evidence held sufficient to justify the refusal of a nonsuit, and a peremptory instruction requested by defendant.

PER CURIAM. [1] The feme plaintiff was a passenger on the train of the defendant railroad company August 19, 1919, traveling from Wilmington, N. C., to Bolton, N. C. She was very old and feeble, and so informed the conductor, requesting him, at the time, to assist her in alighting from the train and to have a box for the purpose, which was not done. A boy who was standing near the train, when it stopped at the station, offered to go for a box, which was near by, but the conductor refused to let him do so, and threatened to "carry her on, if she could not get off," and was rude and rough to her, using insulting language. She sat on the floor of the platform and slid, or bumped, down the steps after the conductor had said, "Are you coming off or not?" to which she replied, "Well, if I have to get off without any help and expose myself and hurt myself I will have to do so." She added, "He could not have talked meaner to me." She further testified that it was too far from the ground for her to step from the car, and she was severely injured, in attempting to do so, that she had been ruptured, and "her ruptures were torn loose"; that she nearly fainted, and had to lie down for ten days and suffered great pain. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff assessing the compensatory damages at $400 and the punitive damages at $100. Judgment thereon, and the defendant appealed. The two instructions requested by the defendant were sufficiently covered by the charge. The real question was whether the jury believed the plaintiff or the conductor, and they believed the former. It was the duty of the defendant's conductor to render her such assistance for alighting from the car as was reasonably necessary in her weak physical condition. She was very old and had been ruptured. The conductor was notified that she needed help; he was put on his guard, but says he forgot it. The plaintiff was entitled to proper assistance, as she was aged and feeble, or infirm, which, if not apparent to the conductor, was made known to him by the son of the plaintiff, and by her before she alighted. Morarity v. Durham Traction Co., 154 N. C. 586, 70 S. E. 938; Moore on Carriers, 682; Hinshaw v. Railroad, 118 N. C. 1052-1053, 24 S. E. 426; Railroad v. Miller, 79 Tex. 78, 15 S. W. 264, 11 L. R. A. 395, 23 Am. St. Rep. 308. This controversy would not have arisen if conductors would always treat their passengers with proper consideration. Courtesy and politeness are cheap commodities, costing little in the beginning but paying well in the end, while rudeness never pays, and often proves to be very expensive. It is the conductor's duty to see that his employer does not suffer by his omission of duty and especially by his lack of civility and proper attention to those who because of apparent or known feebleness cannot help themselves or alight safely from the cars. Lanier v. Pullman Co., 180 N. C. 406, 105 S. E. 21.

[2] The verdict may not be supported by the facts, but we must assume that it is, as there is nothing to authorize us to impeach it, and we have proceeded on the hypothesis of its correctness in what we have said. There was evidence here that step boxes were seen on the train, and the use of one of them would have saved the company a vast deal of trouble and annoyance, not to speak of the money loss.

[3, 4] The ruling of the judge as to punitive damages was correct in every particular. There was evidence tending to show inexcusable conduct on the part of the conductor, and such treatment of this old and feeble woman as justified the imposition of punitive damages, which may be allowed when there is an element of fraud, malice, such a degree of negligence as indicates reckless indifference to consequences, oppression, insult, rudeness, mere caprice, willfulness, or some other elements of aggravation in the act or omission causing the injury. Holmes v. Railroad Co., 94 N. C. 318-323; Thompson on Carriers of Passengers, 157; 3 Sutherland on Damages, 270; Ammons v. Railroad Co., 140 N. C. 198, 52 S. E. 731; s. c. 138 N. C. 559, 51 S. The other exceptions are without substantial merit.

[5] The objection to evidence is general, whereas some of it, at least, is competent. The exception, therefore, cannot be sustained. The objection should, in such a case, be specific, and designate that part of the evidence supposed to be incompetent. State v. Ledford, 133 N. C. 714, 45 S. E. 944; Kennedy v. Trust Co., 180 N. C. 225-229, 104 S. E. 464; Lanier v. Pullman Co., 180 N. C. 406, 105 S. E. 21.

[6] The charge of the court submitted the case to the jury pointedly and fully, and properly refused a nonsuit, and the peremptory instruction requested by the defendant. The verdict, as we have said, may be wrong, but we have to accept it as right, unless there was some error in law for which it should be set aside, and we have found none which justifies a reversal.

No error.

COSTIN v. TIDEWATER POWER CO.
(No. 288.)

1. Railroads ⚡312(13)—Warning of approach to crossing required.

It was the duty of a railroad company to give such signal by ringing a bell or blowing a whistle as would be reasonably sufficient to warn persons on the highway of the approach of cars, and the failure to give such signal is evidence of negligence, especially where the view at the crossing was obstructed.

2. Railroads ⚡320—Care to avoid injury required.

It was the duty of a railroad company, after a truck stopped on the track and a collision was probable, to stop its car if it could do so by the exercise of ordinary care in time to avoid striking the truck.

3. Railroads ⚡309—Neglect of duty actionable if proximate cause of injury.

The failure of a railroad company to perform its duty to ring the bell or blow the whistle for a crossing or to stop its cars when a truck has stopped on the track is negligence and gives a right of action if such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury.

4. Railroads ⚡350(7, 12, 32)—Issues of negligence in not warning and discovering automobile truck held for jury.

Evidence held to make questions for jury as to whether any signal was given of a car's approach to a highway crossing and whether the dangerous position of plaintiff, whose truck stopped on the track, could have been discovered in time to avoid the injury, and whether the failure to give the signal or stop was the proximate cause of the injury.

5. Railroads ⚡327(1)—Traveler required to use senses.

It was the duty of a traveler to exercise ordinary care as he approached a railway crossing and to use his senses of sight and hearing to the best of his ability under the surrounding circumstances.

6. Railroads ⚡335(5)—Unwarned traveler using faculties at obstructed crossing not negligent.

Where a traveler's view at a crossing was obstructed by a building, if no warning was given of the approach of a train, and, induced by this failure, he approached the crossing and was struck, having used his faculties as best he could under the surrounding circumstances to ascertain if there was any danger, negligence will not be imputed to him, but to the railroad company; the failure to warn being regarded as the proximate cause of the injury.

7. Railroads ⚡350(16)—Contributory negligence held question for jury.

Evidence as to whether plaintiff automobile truck driver looked and listened for cars as he approached a railroad crossing held to make a question for the jury as to his freedom from contributory negligence.

8. Appeal and error \S 1051(3)—Expression of opinion as to matter practically admitted by defendant's motorman not reversible error.

It was not reversible error to permit a witness who saw the danger of a collision between a railroad car and a motortruck and threw up his hand as a signal to testify that the car could have been stopped in time to avoid the injury, where the evidence showed the car was then 150 to 200 feet from the crossing, and the motorman practically admitted that he could at that time have stopped the car.

9. Evidence \S 490—Nonexpert knowing conditions may express opinion as to distance in which car can be stopped.

One who is not an expert, but who knows the conditions, may express an opinion of the distance in which a car can be stopped, or the jury may form its own opinion from the evidence.

Walker, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover County; Daniel, Judge.

Action by A. H. Costin against the Tidewater Power Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action to recover for alleged negligence in striking plaintiff while he was in an automobile truck crossing the tracks of the defendant, at Seagate (or Greenville Sound) station, and for damage to the truck. The allegations of negligence are:

"First. That defendant had a wooden building or structure on the side of its road near Seagate station to the east of the public road, which he alleges obstructed the view of the cars on the defendant's line coming from Wrightsville Beach to Wilmington to such an extent that persons riding in automobiles were unable to see the cars until they entered upon the track.

"Second. That as plaintiff entered on the track in an automobile truck he was struck by a street car, and that the conductor was negligent in not keeping a proper lookout and in not blowing his whistle.

"The defendant denied the allegations of the complaint as alleged, and set up that the plaintiff saw or could have seen the train before attempting to cross the crossing if he had stopped, looked, and listened at the proper place and time, and set up that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence."

The public road crosses the track of the defendant at Seagate almost at a right angle. On the east of the road and between it and the track there is an icehouse or freight station with a platform on the side next to the track.

Mr. Gillette, a witness for the defendant, testified, among other things, as follows:

"The freight station is a small inclosure, with a platform. The edge of this house or platform is 18 feet from the center of the hard surface road—that is, the western edge. The distance from the northern edge of the platform to the railroad track, the south rail, is 6 feet. The northern edge of the platform is next to the railroad, and the freight shed is on the south side of the track and on the east side of the county road. The freight station is shown on the map as an icehouse. The northern end of that freight station is a platform, a portion of which is inclosed and a portion not inclosed. The uninclosed portion is the north edge of the platform. Half of it, 5 feet 1 inch, is not inclosed. From the inclosed portion of that platform to the rail is 11½ feet of unobstructed view. The county road coming from the south to the railroad going towards Wilmington has about 1 per cent. down grade towards the track. The platform is 3 feet 10 inches from the ground level to the top of the platform. * * * I should say a person standing at the platform, point C, could see a train coming up the track eastward at least 300 feet. Standing at C, he could see to the point marked T-2, at least three hundred feet. * * * The ice house and platform combined, from north to south, is twenty eight feet four inches long. The ice house itself is eighteen feet two inches long. * * * If this machine was beyond the platform, he could probably be seen as far from a motorman on a car as the car could be seen at least 200 feet."

The point C referred to by the witness is marked on the map introduced by the defendant as 10 or 11 feet from the track.

The plaintiff testified in his own behalf as follows:

"On the 10th of August, 1917, my wife and myself boarded the train at Atkinson on our way to Wrightsville Beach. We arrived in Wilmington in time to catch the 11 o'clock car out to the Beach. When I purchased my ticket, I purchased a ticket to Seagate only, intending to get off there and go out to a little farm I owned on the turnpike road to the left of the track going toward the Beach and to later join my wife on the Beach. The car stopped at Seagate, and I got off on the right-hand side near the little station house. The car passed on, and I noticed, standing in the western edge of the Seagate road, a truck which was about 25 or 30 feet, I suppose, from the track on the same side of the track that I got off. This truck was operated by Mr. Ben Harper, who lived with his father out on my place. I inquired for Mr. Harper, didn't see him around there anywhere, and I was told he was over to a cold drink stand about 40 or 50 yards from the station, and I walked over there and spoke to Mr. Harper and asked him if he was going over to my place, and he said that he was. I told him I wanted to go with him; so in a very short time we walked on back toward the station. We were all the while in full view of the track below this building toward the Beach down to the creek. There was no car there. No car whistle blew. Didn't hear the roar of any car, so we passed on, and just before going behind the building to the truck I again looked, but there was no car there and no car whistle blew. I didn't hear the roar of any car. We walked on to the truck, and I spread out a newspaper on the seat to protect my clothes and got up on the seat. Mr. Harper walked around to crank the truck, and while he was going around I again looked and listened. There was no car whistle blew, didn't hear the roar of any car, didn't see any car, and he immediately cranked up the truck, and we felt it perfectly safe to cross the track. Other people were going and coming, and he immediately proceeded to cross the track slowly and in low gear, and just as the front wheels of the car entered the first track I noticed that the truck came to a stop at once throwing me forward, and I looked up and saw Mr. Harper was busily engaged trying to get the car off the track, and then I immediately looked down the track and saw this car coming from behind the building at a distance of 25 feet, running slowly, slightly up grade. It ran on up slowly and bumped our truck suddenly, jarring it forward a distance of 2 or 3 feet, and then immediately came against it with tremendous force, everything flying up with a terrible crash, and at this point I was hit in the back. The car hit me in the back, knocking me off into the sand, and I fell into the sand. The truck was then drug ahead of the car a distance of about 20 feet towards Wilmington. The building that stood at the junction between the car line and the Seagate road is a dilapidated looking affair and it has a platform in front of it. The platform stands about 12 inches, I suppose, from the end of the cross-ties; has an open space over it which readily enabled the motorman on that car, in the elevated position that he was, to see the radiator on that truck at least 40 or 50 feet before he reached it. While we were sitting back on the seat of the truck we were not able to see the car until it was within a much closer distance to us."

There was other evidence that the defendant gave no signal or notice of the approach of its car to the crossing and that the crossing was much used.

G. V. Larsen, a witness for the defendant, testified as follows:

"I was at Seagate the date of this accident. I left the house, and just as I came out of the door the passenger car was going down. I walked on down the middle of the road, and just before I got to the station, when I was about 150 or 180 feet from it, I heard a whistle blow, sound like it was on the other side of Bradley's Creek, a station blow; blowed one time; didn't blow for any crossing at all, just blowed one time; and I went on a little further, and about that time I seen a car come around the curve, and Mr. Costin and Mr. Hanby and Mr. Harper was in the car. I hollered to them, but the machine was making a lot of noise, and they didn't hear me. When I hollered the second time they had started off, and I hollered a third time. I hollered the third time, and Mr. Hanby looked around. I threw up my hand to the motorman, and Mr. Hanby rolled off; didn't jump off, but rolled off. The car hit plaintiff's truck just at the wind shield; drug him up the road a distance of about 20 feet right at the crossing; drug him up the road a distance of about 20 feet right at the crossing; drug him a distance of about 20 feet. I didn't see the driver of the truck turn his truck at all. He drove out on the road and started on the track. The car hit him about where the windshield belonged. The driver jumped out of the seat over the door on the left-hand side, and Mr. Costin was mashed down between the steering wheel and the work car. He was not thrown out. Mr. Hanby took him out. I hollered at them three times. I stuck my hand out to the motorman. Nobody paid any attention to me. * * * The motorman didn't seem to pay any attention to me when I waved. He was looking out the door at me, and couldn't help but see me. He said he saw me. He did not stop his car until after they hit. I think the street car was going somewhere between 8 and 10 miles when I first saw it, just as it came around the curve. I couldn't say whether the signal I heard was made by the freight car; it was too far off. It might have been made by a passenger car. It was a station blow. It wasn't a crossing signal. Never heard any signal given for the crossing, horn blown, or bell rung by the street car. * * * I wasn't waving at the men on the truck. I was waving at the fellow on the car. When I threw up my hand Mr. Hanby looked around and rolled off the truck. When I waved my hand Mr. Costin and the driver of the truck were not looking in my direction. They were kinder faced away from me. I was at right angles to them. I was in the middle of the track when I threw my hand up, about 180 feet from where the crossing was, looking straight down the track to the approaching car. The motorman was standing in the door looking straight down the track toward me. He was looking in my direction when I threw up my hand and hollered. Q. I will ask you, Mr. Larsen, if that motorman had applied the brakes to his car at the moment when he saw your signal or the moment you threw up your hand and hollered, if he could have stopped that car before it reached the crossing and struck the truck? A. He could."

The motorman testified that he blew for the crossing, and, among other things:

"Just before I got to this little station you could see up and down the road each way, and I looked out and saw that the road was clear each way, and just as I got near the crossing was when I saw Larsen. He threw up his hand, but didn't realize there was anything standing behind the icehouse, or anything of the kind behind the station. I shut off my current then. I was going very slow, and just about the time that I got to the crossing I saw the truck, and supposed that he saw me. He turned that way, and there was a colored man I had on the line car that was sitting right on the south corner of the line, and when he turned that way he hit just back behind, possibly a foot or 2 behind where this man was sitting, and turned and ran on the side of the road a distance of possibly 15 or 18 feet. When I saw the truck I immediately applied the brakes and stopped in 15 or 18 feet. I would judge my car was going about possible 10 or 12 miles an hour. Brakes were in good condition. There was nothing I could have done right at that time when I saw this truck coming toward the track. * * * At the time of the accident I was looking out of the window. I saw Mr. Larsen when he threw up his hand. I possibly could have stopped the car at that time before the accident."

The curve referred to by witness Larsen is 150 or 200 feet from the crossing.

There was other evidence sustaining the contentions of the plaintiff and defendant.

At the conclusion of the evidence the defendant moved for judgment of nonsuit upon the ground: (1) That there is no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant; (2) that upon the whole evidence the plaintiff is guilty of contributory negligence. The motion was overruled, and defendant excepted. The same point is presented by several prayers for instruction.

There was a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

George Rountree and Thomas W. Davis, both of Wilmington, for appellant.

J. H. Stringfield, of Atkinson, and McClammy & Burgwin, of Wilmington, for appellee.

ALLEN J. The exception chiefly relied on by the defendant is to the refusal to enter judgment of nonsuit, the defendant insisting that there is no evidence of negligence, and that upon the whole evidence plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

The principles determinative of the questions raised by this exception are so well settled and they have been discussed so recently in several cases that it is only necessary to state them.

[1] It was the duty of the defendant as it approached the crossing to give such signal as would be reasonably sufficient to warn persons on the public road, which crossed the track, of the coming of the car by ringing the bell or blowing the whistle, or both, if necessary and the failure to give such signal would be evidence of negligence, and this duty was more insistent because the view of the motorman and of the plaintiff was obstructed by the icehouse or freight station.

[2] It was also the duty of the defendant, after the truck stopped on the track, if a collision was probable, to stop its car, if it could do so by the exercise of ordinary care in time to avoid striking the truck.

[3] If it failed to perform either duty, it was negligence, and if there is evidence that such failure of duty was the proximate cause of the injury, the action can be maintained. Bagwell v. Railroad, 167 N. C. 615, 83 S. E. 814; Norman v. Railroad, 167 N. C. 533, 83 S. E. 835, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 508; Goff v. Railroad, 179 N. C. 219, 102 S. E. 320; and Perry v. McAdoo, 180 N. C. 290, 104 S. E. 673.

[4] Is there evidence that the defendant did not give notice of the approach of the car to the crossing or that the truck stopped on the track, and that by the exercise of ordinary care the defendant could have discovered the danger of a collision in time to stop and avoid the injury?

The plaintiff testified that as he was approaching the track he was listening, and that he heard no signal from the approaching train, and there was other evidence to the same effect. He also testified that the truck stopped when it reached the track; that the head of the truck could have been seen by the motorman when he was 40 feet from the crossing; that he himself saw the car when it was 25 feet from the crossing; and that the truck had then stopped.

The witness Larsen evidently saw that a collision was imminent, because, when he saw the truck approaching the crossing and the car coming, he got in the middle of the track, threw up his hands, and called out three times to attract the attention of the motorman, and that when he first saw the car and threw up his hand the car was about the curve 150 or 200 feet from the crossing. He also states that the motorman saw him.

The witness Gallette testified that at a point about 11 feet from the track you could see up the track in the direction the car was coming about 200 feet.

* The motorman testified that when he applied his brakes he stopped the car in 18 or 20 feet.

Upon this evidence the jury could well find that no signal of the approach to the crossing was given; that the car, which was running at 8 or 10 miles an hour, could have been stopped in 18 or 20 feet; that the motorman was put on notice by Larsen when 150 or 200 feet away that there was some danger at the crossing; that in any event the motorman could have seen the truck as it approached the crossing when 40 feet away, and that he could have seen the truck after it stopped on the track 25 feet away; that the car could have been stopped in 18 or 20 feet, and, if so, there was evidence to support the contention of the plaintiff that the defendant was negligent in failing to give the proper signals, and also that it could have discovered the dangerous position of the plaintiff after the car stopped in time to stop its car and avoid injury to the plaintiff.

It was also a reasonable inference to be drawn from the evidence that, if the whistle had been blown, it would have been heard and the truck would have been stopped before it reached the track of the defendant, and that the real and proximate cause of the injury was the failure to give the signal or the failure to stop after the dangerous position of the plaintiff could have been discovered.

[5, 6] It was also the duty of the plaintiff to exercise ordinary care as he approached the crossing and to use his sense of sight and hearing to the best of his ability under the surrounding circumstances, but, as his view was obstructed by the icehouse, which was in part on the right of way of the defendant and a part of it used by the defendant, if the defendant failed to warn him of the approach of its train and to give the proper signals as its car approached the crossing, and, induced by this failure of duty, the truck approached the crossing and was struck, and the plaintiff injured, he having used his faculties as best he could under the circumstances to ascertain if there was any danger ahead, negligence will not be imputed to him, but to the defendant; the failure to warn him being regarded as the proximate cause of any injury he received. Johnson v. Railroad, 163 N. C. 443, 79 S. E. 690, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 598, approved in Goff v. Railroad, 179 N. C. 220, 102 S. E. 320.

[7] The plaintiff testified that after he reached Seagate he found a truck standing 23 feet from the track which he recognized as one used on his farm, which was within a short distance of the station; that he inquired for the driver of the truck and found that he was at a cold drink stand about 50 yards from the track; that he went to the drink stand and found the driver, who said he would take him to his farm on the truck; that he then started towards the truck; that upon leaving the cold drink stand he could see down the track towards the beach; that he looked down the track at that time and saw nothing; that as he was going towards the track he looked two or three times and saw no car nor did he hear any whistle blow; that he got on the truck, but that his view was then obstructed by the icehouse; that as the driver walked around to crank the truck he looked and listened, and that he heard no car whistle nor did he hear the roar of the car; that he looked down the track just before going behind the building going to the truck; that the truck started, and it proceeded to cross the track slowly and in low gear, and as it reached the track it stopped.

If this evidence is true, and its credibility was for the jury, the plaintiff was doing all that he could under the circumstances for his own safety, and it cannot be declared as matter of law that he was guilty of contributory negligence.

[8] The exception to the expression of opinion by the witness Larsen that, "if that motorman had applied the brakes to his car at the moment when he saw your signal or the moment you threw up your hand," the car could have been stopped before it reached the crossing, is without merit.

According to the evidence the car was 150 or 200 feet from the crossing when Larsen first threw up his hand, and the motorman practically admits that he could at that time have stopped the car in time to avoid the injury, so that the evidence was about a matter that was really not in dispute.

[9] If, however, it was otherwise, it has been held that one who is not an expert and knows of the conditions may express an opinion of the distance in which a car can be stopped, and indeed that the jury may form its own opinion from the evidence. Deans v. Railroad, 107 N. C. 686, 12 S. E. 77, 22 Am. St. Rep. 902.

We have examined the parts of the charge excepted to and find that they conform to the opinions of this court.

No error.

WALKER, J., dissents for the reasons stated in his opinion filed in Perry v. McAdoo, at the last term, 180 N. C. 290, at 299, 104 S. E. 673, in regard to the duty to stop, look, and listen.

John Gary Evans, of Spartanburg, for appellants.

Wallace & Barron, of Union, for respondents.

WATTS, J. This is the third appeal in this cause. This is an appeal from an order of his honor, Judge Sease, sustaining an order of Probate Judge W. W. Johnson, wherein interest was allowed on attorneys' fee, due to Wallace and Barron and Geo. S. Mower, Esqs. The exceptions must be sustained. There was no entry and enrollment of the judgment, as the law provides for, so as to make it a money judgment. cree upon which an execution could be issued." Ex parte Farrars in Re Garrett v. Dial, 13 S. C. 254.

Exceptions sustained, and order appealed from reversed.

STATE v. BING et al. (No. 10589.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 19, 1921.)

1. Jury \S 131(4)—Held not error for the court to refuse to ask juror from what part of the county he came.

In a criminal prosecution, it was not error for the court to refuse to ask each juror what part of the county he was from, because requested by defendants' counsel to do so, on the ground that there was a prejudice against defendants in certain parts of the county.

2. Criminal law \S 696(2)—Witnesses \S 337 (6)—Defendant must move to strike out objectionable answer; asking defendant witness about former conviction held proper to test credibility.

Under Cr. Code 1902, \S 64, in a prosecution for burglary, it was proper to ask one of defendants, a witness, if he had been convicted for housebreaking prior to such time, and for the court to rule such testimony admissible for testing the witness' credibility; and if defendants' counsel regarded the answer as inadmissible or not responsive to the ruling he should have moved to strike it.

3. Criminal law \S 531(3)—Confession held inadmissible because obtained by threats and violence.

In a prosecution for burglary, evidence held to show that defendant's confession was extorted by threats and violence, so that the presiding judge erred in ruling that the confession was voluntary.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Hampton County; I. W. Bowman, Judge.

Tom Henry Bing and others were convicted of breaking into a store and stealing money therefrom, and they appeal. New trial granted.

T. Hagood Gooding, of Hampton, for appellants.

George Warren, Sol., of Hampton, for the State.

GARY, C. J. The following statement appears in the record:

"There were two indictments for the alleged breaking into a store in this county and stealing money therefrom. One indictment was against the defendants Tom Henry Bing, Franklin Gordon, and Horton Gordon, and the other against the defendant Joe Williams; both indictments charging burglary.

"The state relied principally upon alleged confessions of the defendants, and the defendants pleaded that the alleged confessions were obtained under duress.

"Counsel for defendants made a motion for a directed verdict, upon the ground that it was conclusively shown that the alleged confessions were made by defendants under the fear of losing their lives, induced by severe whippings administered by arresting parties, and other circumstances showing duress. Motion was refused.

"At the conclusion of the testimony the solicitor stated that he would not ask for a conviction of burglary, but only of grand larceny. The jury found the defendants, with the exception of Franklin Gordon, guilty of grand larceny. Thereupon counsel for defendants gave notice of a motion for a new trial, upon the grounds that the testimony showed that the alleged confessions were made under duress, and upon the further ground that the defendant Joe Williams was allowed to answer, in response to the solicitor's cross-examination, that he had been on the chain gang before. The motion for a new trial was refused."

[1] The defendants, with the exception of Franklin Gordon, were sentenced by the court, and appealed upon exceptions, the first of which is as follows:

"Because his honor, the presiding judge, erred in refusing the request of counsel for the defendants that each juror be asked upon presentation what part of the county said juror was from, and holding and deciding that this was the preliminary work of counsel for the defense and not a matter to be asked on the trial of the cause; whereas, it is respectfully submitted that such question on the part of the court was proper at this time to fully protect the interests of the defendants, inasmuch as the testimony shows that there was strong feeling in the neighborhood of the alleged robbery against the alleged robbers, and citizens from this part of the county were highly incensed over same, and the refusal of his honor to put this question at the request of the defendants was prejudicial to their rights and their constitutional guaranty of a fair and impartial trial."

The question presented by this exception thus arose:

"Mr. Gooding: Before we proceed with the case, I would like to ask the court to ask each juror what part of the county he is from.

"The Court: What say you to that, Mr. Solicitor?

"Mr. Warren: That is not a proper question here. Counsel ought to find that out ahead of time.

"The Court: I think so. That is preliminary work of counsel, and is not a matter to be asked here, on the trial of this case."

The admissibility of testimony must, necessarily, be left in large measure to the discretion of the presiding judge; and it has not been made to appear that it was erroneously exercised.

[2] The second exception is as follows:

"Because his honor, the presiding judge, erred in allowing the state, upon cross-examination of the witness Joe Williams, to question said witness as to an alleged former conviction for housebreaking over the objection of the defendant's counsel; whereas, it is respectfully submitted that such questions were irrelevant and incompetent, in that the defendant had not put his good character in issue, and same could not be attacked by the state, and such questions and the testimony adduced therefrom could have no other effect than to prejudice the jury against the said defendant."

On the cross-examination of the defendant Joe Williams, the record shows that the following took place:

"Q. You have been in court before? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What did they have you up for?

(Mr. Gooding: That has nothing to do with this case, and I object to it, if the court please. Mr. Warren: It has something to do with the credibility of the witness. The Court: He may test his credibility, Mr. Gooding.)

"Mr. Warren (continuing): They had me up for housebreaking, and the jury convicted me, and I went on the chain gang."

Section 64 of the Criminal Code of 1902 is as follows:

"In the trial of all criminal cases, the defendant shall be allowed to testify (if he desires to do so, and not otherwise), as to the facts and circumstances of the case."

If he testifies in his own behalf, he may be cross-examined as to such facts and circumstances as affect his credibility, but not his general character. State v. Knox, 98 S. C. 114, 82 S. E. 278; State v. Peterson, 35 S. C. 279, 14 S. E. 617; State v. Mills, 79 S. C. 187, 60 S. E. 664; State v. Kennedy, 85 S. C. 146, 67 S. E. 152.

The ruling of his honor, the presiding judge, that the credibility of the witness might be tested, was in accordance with these decisions. At the time of the ruling it did not appear how the credibility of the witness was to be tested. Therefore the defendants' counsel should have made a motion to strike out the answer of defendant, if he regarded it as inadmissible and not responsive to the ruling of his honor, the presiding judge. A similar question arose in the case of State v. Mills, 79 S. C. 187, 60 S. E. 664, in which this court thus ruled:

"When this objection was made, there was nothing to show that the transaction inquired about was not one tending to affect the credibility of the witness. The circuit judge was not in error, therefore, at the time in admitting the question. Had the objection been made or renewed when it subsequently appeared the transaction did not tend to affect the credibility of the witness, it would have been error to allow the examination to continue. * * * But the objection was not made at that time, and must therefore be considered waived."

[3] The third exception is as follows:

"Because his honor, the circuit judge, erred in refusing defendants' motion for a new trial upon the ground that the alleged confessions were obtained under duress, it being respectfully submitted that all of the testimony showed that the alleged confessions were obtained from the defendants through the application of bodily violence and threats of death, the testimony being borne out by the physical condition of the defendant Franklin Gordon, and the testimony of the state on this point, by their several witnesses, being that 'the whipping was not done while they were there,' or 'not that they knew of,' and in excluding defendants' motion for a directed verdict, on the same grounds."

Dr. C. A. Rush, a witness for the defense, says:

"I am a practicing physician and surgeon at Hampton. I know this negro, Franklin Gordon. I was called to the jail to examine him and found him suffering considerably with contusion of the posterior surface, that is, right down the side here (indicating to the jury); that extending from right along here (indicating to the jury) to down about here, and it had every appearance that he had been hit with some blunt instrument, and he was considerably bruised and swollen, and there was one place along about here (indicating) that was blistered, and also on his arm there was a sign of that. I think that the left arm was worse than the other one. Also the left testicle was badly swollen. He had some fever when I examined him. I gave him some medicine to relieve the pain, soreness, and suffering. He had the appearance of having been whipped.

"Cross-Examination.

"By Mr. Warren: Q. In fact he had been whipped, had he not, Dr. Rush? A. Yes, sir; he had."

The testimony of the defendant Franklin Gordon is supported by physical facts, and the only reasonable inference from the testimony is that confessions were extorted from the other defendants likewise by threats or violence.

A confession is not admissible unless it is voluntary, and the question whether it is voluntary must be determined, in the first instance, by the presiding judge; but if the only reasonable inference is that it was extorted by threats or violence it should be excluded. State v. Rogers, 99 S. C. 504, 83 S. E. 971.

His honor, the presiding judge, erred, therefore, in refusing to exclude the confessions from the consideration of the jury.

BOWDEN v. STATE. (No. 2293.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 16, 1921.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Criminal law \Leftrightarrow 531(3)—Evidence held not to show confession involuntary.

The record does not disclose any evidence of compulsion used to elicit the statement made by the accused in response to the question as to why he killed the decedent; nor does it appear that he was induced to make the statement by the hope of any benefit to be derived from making it.

2. Criminal law \Leftrightarrow 400(7)—Homicide \Leftrightarrow 316—Testimony that accused gave witness checks cashed by decedent incompetent as secondary; admission not ground for new trial where other testimony of same witness showed motive.

Testimony that the accused produced two or three checks for stated amounts; and handed them to the officer who had him in charge, was objectionable and should not have been admitted over the objection that no ground had been laid for the introduction of secondary evidence; but this evidence was not of such materiality as to require the grant of a new trial, in view of other evidence in the case.

3. Criminal law \Leftrightarrow 570(2)—Defendant has burden of proving insanity to reasonable certainty.

The court did not err in instructing the jury, upon the subject of the defense of alleged insanity of the accused at the time of the homicide, that, "when the defendant sets up this plea, the burden is upon the defendant to satisfy the minds of the jury to a reasonable certainty."

4. Criminal law \Leftrightarrow 48, 805(1)—Charge as to weakness of mind substantially correct; not error because of failure to charge on delusional insanity in connection therewith.

The court instructed the jury, in substance, that a person of weak mind would not be exempt from criminal responsibility if he had sufficient mental capacity to distinguish between right and wrong and to "understand that his act [the one he is charged with committing] is against the criminal laws of the state of Georgia, * * * and that he is liable to be punished and held responsible therefor." Such a charge is not error. Nor was the charge error because it did not contain in immediate connection therewith a charge upon the subject of delusional insanity, especially as the evidence did not distinctly raise the issue as to this form of insanity.

5. Criminal law \Leftrightarrow 516, 781(2)—Statement of reasons for killing decedent constituting confession justified charge thereon.

There is evidence in the case to authorize the charge upon the subject of confession.

6. Homicide \Leftrightarrow 294(1)—Failure to charge on delusional insanity held not error.

Under the evidence in the case the court did not err in omitting to charge upon the subject of delusional insanity. The charge upon general insanity was sufficient.

7. Sufficiency of evidence.

There is evidence in the record to support the verdict.

Error from Superior Court, Putnam County; J. B. Park, Judge.

Dave Bowden was convicted of murder, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Davidson, Callaway & De Jarnett, of Eatonton, for plaintiff in error.

Doyle Campbell, Sol. Gen., and A. Y. Clement, both of Monticello, R. A. Denny, Atty. Gen., and Graham Wright, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BECK, P. J. Dave Bowden was tried under an indictment charging him with the offense of murder, and the jury trying the case returned a verdict of guilty, without recommendation. He was thereupon by the court sentenced to be hanged. A motion for a new trial was made and overruled.

[1] 1. A. J. Walton, sheriff, testified as follows:

"I was sheriff at the time this man [the accused] was in my charge. There was no hope of reward held out to him at the time by me, or any one else, to make a statement to me. I asked him why he killed the woman, what the trouble was, and he gave me his pocketbook, with three checks, one for $30, one for $10, and one for $8, that had been cashed by Cindy Jackson, and he said he had been giving her a good deal of money, and she had promised to meet him several times, and she had never done it, and he couldn't let her treat him that way. And I think the next day I approached him again; and he told me he wouldn't say anything else; he would wait and make his statement in the courthouse. His mental condition seemed to be all right. Yes; he was locked up and in my charge and under my authority. When I told him to tell me what happened, if he hadn't I wouldn't have done anything to him. I don't know whether he knew that or not."

This evidence was objected to on the ground that it appeared from the testimony of the witness himself that the statement made by the prisoner was not voluntary, and that the witness, the sheriff, induced the defendant to make this statement, and, moreover, that the prisoner "did not know what the sheriff would do to him if he did not make the statement to him after being asked to do so, and, further, because the evidence does not show that it was not induced by the slightest hope of benefit or the remotest fear of injury," and for the further reason that the introduction of the evidence was an attempt upon the part of the state to prejudice and bias the minds of the jury on the idea that a confession had been made by the accused. There is no merit in the objections stated. So far as the record discloses, the statement made by the defendant was voluntary. The accused had the privilege of further examination of the witness in order to adduce any circumstances showing inducement or compulsion used to elicit the statement made by the defendant.

[2] 2. The testimony that the accused handed to the sheriff three checks, one for $30, one for $10, and one for $8, that had been cashed by Cindy Jackson, the decedent, should not have been admitted over the objection that the three checks were the highest and best evidence, and that testimony in reference to them was inadmissible, as no ground for introducing secondary evidence had been laid. But we do not think that this evidence was of such materiality as requires the grant of a new trial, although it was of some materiality. The other evidence given in this connection, which was unobjectionable, shows, if credible, that the defendant claimed that he had been giving Cindy Jackson, the woman whom he killed "a good deal of money, and she promised to meet him several times and she never done it, and he could not let her treat him that way." If the giving of the checks to the woman and her failure to comply with her promises of meeting the accused tended to show motive, motive of that character, as far as it could explain the homicide, was shown by the testimony which was perfectly competent, coming from the mouth of the same witness, that the accused "had given her a good deal of money."

[3] 3. The defendant in the case admitted the fact of the shooting and killing, but set up the defense that he did not have sufficient mental capacity to render him responsible for the act under the criminal law; and the court, in reference to this contention, charged the jury, that—

"When the defendant sets up this plea, the burden is upon him to satisfy the minds of the jury to a reasonable certainty that the defense is true."

Movant assigns error upon this charge, contending that it required a higher degree of proof than that required by law, and that the court should in this connection have imposed upon the defendant no other burden than that of establishing this theory of the defense by a preponderance of the evidence. A similar question to the one here raised has been discussed in prior decisions made by this court, and it has been held that charges substantially the same as the one here criticized were not error. In the case of Beck v. State, 76 Ga. 452, it was said:

"There was no error in charging that the law presumes every person to be of sound mind, and the burden is upon the defendant to satisfy the jury, by evidence, to a reasonable certainty, that he was not of sound mind at the time of the commission of the act."

And in the case of Hobbs v. State, 8 Ga. App. 53, 68 S. E. 515, it was held:

"There is no merit in the exception to the instructions of the trial judge upon the subject of insanity. As every person is presumed to be sane, the burden of proving insanity or idiocy rests upon the defendant, and the insanity or idiocy need not be established beyond a reasonable doubt, but only to the reasonable satisfaction of the jury."

[4] 4. The court charged the jury further upon the subject of insanity and criminal responsibility:

"If a man has reason sufficient to distinguish between right and wrong in relation to a particular act about to be committed, and has sufficient mental capacity at the time to understand such act is wrong and in violation of the criminal laws of the land, and he will be punished for the commission of such an act, then he would be criminally responsible for such an act: that is, the law does not say, except to give the jury the definition of where a man would be responsible, and where he would not be responsible. Although a man may have a weak intellect, although his mind may not be very strong, yet the law says that, if he has sufficient mental capacity to distinguish between right and wrong and to understand the act he is about to commit is against the criminal laws of the state of Georgia, and if he comprehends at the time that such act is wrong and against the laws of the state of Georgia, and if he commits an act of that kind he is liable to be punished and held responsible therefor, under those circumstances the law says he would have sufficient mental capacity to be responsible for his mental acts."

The charge in itself was substantially correct and applicable to the issues of the case; and the fact that the court did not charge some other principle of law in connection therewith is not a valid ground of criticism upon the charge as actually given.

[5] 5. Error is assigned upon the charge of the court relating to confessions, upon the ground that there is no evidence authorizing a charge upon that subject. The sheriff of the county, A. J. Walton, testified:

"I asked him about the killing, what caused the killing, and why he killed the woman, and he said he had given her a lot of money, and he gave me three checks, one for $30, one for $10, and one for $8, and he said she had promised to meet him several times and had never done it, and he couldn't stand to be swindled out of his money in such way. After I asked him, he made that statement to me voluntarily. I didn't tell him it would be best for him to make it or hold out any inducement to him to make it. I didn't make any threats against him; he just answered my questions voluntarily. * * * He didn't mention it until I asked him about it. He was in jail, and I had him locked up in a cage. I asked him why he did it, and he told me. * * * I was sheriff at the time this man was in my charge. * * * I asked him why he killed the woman, and what the trouble was."

And this is followed by a statement which is substantially repetitions of the preceding answer of the accused to this question. The admissibility of this evidence has been ruled upon above; and it was held that it was admissible. With this evidence in, the court was authorized to charge upon the subject of confession. When the witness asked the defendant why he killed the woman, and he answered that he did it for certain reasons, stating them, this amounted to a confession. Jones v. State, 130 Ga. 274, 60 S. E. 840; Thompson v. State, 147 Ga. 745, 95 S. E. 292. It follows that a charge upon the subject of confession was proper; especially as it contained the usual caution that the jury would not consider the evidence unless they found that it was freely and voluntarily made, without being induced by another by the slightest hope of reward or the remotest fear of punishment.

[6] 6. The court did not err in this case, especially in the absence of a written request, in failing to charge upon the subject of delusional insanity. We have carefully examined the record and the testimony of all the witnesses, and the evidence does not raise the distinct issue of delusional insanity or show that the defendant was afflicted with that form of insanity at the time of the homicide, or that he had been laboring under that form of insanity in the past. There is some evidence of his general insanity, and upon that subject the court charged.

[7] 7. There is some evidence to support the verdict.

Judgment affirmed.

CALLAWAY v. STATE. (No. 2304.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law \S 511(2), 829(10)—Instruction on corroboration of accomplice held correct and requested instruction properly refused.

Upon the subject of the necessity of corroborating evidence and circumstances where the testimony of an accomplice with corroboration is relied upon by the state for conviction, the court instructed the jury, in substance, that the corroborating evidence must be such as tends to connect the defendant with the perpetration of the crime and to show his participation therein. This was a correct charge upon this subject; and the court did not err in refusing to give a charge, requested in writing, which stated a rule upon this subject correctly (if properly considered), but with less precision and exactness than the rule stated in the charge.

2. Criminal law \S 778(11)—Evidence held to warrant instruction on flight.

There was sufficient evidence on the subject of the flight of the accused to authorize a charge upon that subject.

3. Instruction not misleading.

The other part of the charge excepted to states a principle of law substantially correct; and, while the language employed is somewhat inapt, it did not obscure the meaning of the court, nor could it have misled the jury.

4. Homicide \S 250—Evidence held to support conviction of murder.

The evidence in the case was sufficient to authorize the verdict.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. Criminal law \S 784(7)—Instruction on circumstantial evidence held correct and complete.

An instruction that where the evidence adduced to show guilt was circumstantial the jury could not convict unless the proven facts were not only consistent with the hypothesis of guilt, but exclude every other reasonable hypothesis, and that, in other words, where circumstantial evidence alone was relied on, if there was any reasonable conclusion to be drawn from the evidence consistent with his innocence, it was the duty of the jury to acquit, was correct and complete.

6. Criminal law §780(4)—Instruction too favorable to accused if requiring circumstances corroborating accomplice to lead conclusively to inference of guilt.

A requested instruction that corroborating circumstances must be such as, independently of the testimony of the accomplice, would lead to the inference of guilt, and must in some way connect defendant with the criminal act, if meaning that the corroborating circumstances must lead conclusively to the inference of guilt, was too favorable to accused.

7. Criminal law §780(4)—Requested instruction as to sufficiency of circumstances corroborating evidence held erroneous.

An instruction that, whether offered as the sole proof of guilt or in corroboration of an accomplice, the evidence, when alone relied on, must be sufficient to satisfy the jury of the guilt of accused to the exclusion of every other reasonable supposition, was properly refused as requiring that the corroborating evidence be in itself sufficient to exclude every reasonable hypothesis other than that of guilt.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; John D. Humphries, Judge.

Marvin Callaway was convicted of murder, and he brings error. Affirmed.

H. A. Allen, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Jno. A. Boykin, Sol. Gen., of Atlanta, and R. A. Denny, Atty. Gen., and Graham Wright, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BECK, P. J. Marvin Callaway was convicted of the murder of Mack Herndon, and was recommended to life imprisonment in the penitentiary. He made a motion for new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

[1] 1. On the trial of the case the state relied upon the testimony of the accomplice who had been convicted of the crime with which the defendant was charged, and upon corroborating evidence; and the defendant's counsel at the trial in due time submitted to the court the following request to charge:

"Corroborating circumstances must be such as, independently of the testimony of the accomplice, would lead to the inference of the guilt of the accused, and must in some way connect the defendant with the criminal act. While it is true that the sufficiency of circumstances offered for the purpose of corroboration is a matter for determination by the jury, and the law cannot lay down a rule to measure the extent of corroboration necessary, still, where the only witness in a felony case is confessedly an accomplice, the corroborating circumstances are not sufficient to dispense with another witness, unless they are such as to connect the defendant with the crime. It is not sufficient for a witness to corroborate as to time, place, and circumstances of a transaction, if there is nothing except the statement of the accomplice to show any connection of the prisoner therewith; and facts which merely place upon the defendant a grave suspicion of guilt are not sufficient. Whether offered as the sole proof of guilt, or in corroboration of an accomplice, the general rule applies that, where circumstantial evidence alone is relied upon, it must be sufficient to satisfy the jury of the guilt of the accused to the exclusion of every other reasonable supposition."

The court refused to give this charge, but did charge as to the necessity of corroborating evidence as follows:

"Usually the testimony of a single witness is sufficient to establish a fact. There are certain exceptions in law to this rule. One of these exceptions obtains in cases of felony; and this is a felony charged against the defendant in this case. The jury would not be authorized to convict upon the testimony of an accomplice alone, unless that accomplice's testimony is corroborated by other evidence in the case, either direct or circumstantial. While it is true that the sufficiency of the circumstances for the purpose of corroboration is a matter for determination of the jury and the law cannot lay down a rule to measure the extent of corroboration necessary, still, where the only witness is an accomplice, the corroborating circumstances referred to must be such as to connect the defendant with the perpetration of the crime and tend to show his participation therein."

[5] This charge of the court states completely and accurately the rule as to the necessity of corroborating evidence where the testimony of an accomplice, with corroboration, is relied upon for conviction. The court had already charged the jury that where the evidence adduced by the state to show guilt was circumstantial in its character, before the jury would be authorized to convict "the proven facts must not only be consistent with the hypothesis of guilt, but should exclude every other reasonable hypothesis save that of the guilt of the accused."

* * * In other words, where circumstantial evidence alone is relied on for conviction if there is any reasonable conclusion to be drawn from such evidence consistent with his innocence it is the duty of the jury to give the defendant the benefit of such conclusion and acquit him." This charge of the court upon the subject of circumstantial evidence and the necessity for corroborating evidence before the jury could convict on the testimony of an accomplice, stated both rules correctly and completely.

[6] If the rule upon the subject of corroborating evidence, that "corroborating circumstances must be such as, independently of the testimony of the accomplice, would lead to the inference of the guilt of the accused, and must in some way connect the defendant with the criminal act," is a stronger rule in favor of the defendant and means more than the rule laid down by the court in the charge actually given, then the charge given by the court is the better rule. Because, if the expression "corroborating circumstances must be such as, independently of the testimony of the accomplice would lead to the inference of the guilt of the accused," means that they must be such as to lead conclusively to the inference of the guilt of the accused, then that rule is too strong in favor of the accused. It is probable that where the Court of Appeals and the Supreme Court have used and approved that part of the charge embodied in the written request, and now under consideration, they meant by it to state in different language the rule laid down in the court's charge; because, upon this subject, the case of Childers v. State, 52 Ga. 106, lays down the rule that has been followed in other decisions where the same subject is involved. There it is said:

"The rule is, and ought to be, that some facts must be shown by other witnesses tending to show the guilt of the person on trial."

And in the headnote in that case it is said:

"In a case of felony, where the only witness implicating the prisoners in the crime was himself avowedly guilty, the corroborating circumstances necessary to dispense with another witness must be such as go to connect the prisoner with the offense, and that it is not sufficient that the witness is corroborated as to the time, place, and circumstances of the transaction, if there be nothing to show any connection of the prisoners therewith, except the statement of the accomplice."

The opinion in that case was agreed to by two Justices. Chief Justice Warner dissented, and in the course of an elaborate dissenting opinion he said:

"The statute does not require that the corroboration of the accomplice's testimony shall be restricted to any particular points in the case, and to what particular points shall the court restrict it? What shall be the extent of the corroborating circumstances? Shall the court confine it to the corpus delicti, or to the identity of the parties charged, or to the main elements which constitute the offense? If so, then there would be no necessity for introducing an accomplice in any case; the facts could be established without his testimony."

[7] But the rule laid down by the majority has obtained and now prevails. The language employed by Judge McCay in the Childers Case in stating the rule is sometimes varied, but the language of that case is the best statement of the rule. And any language that is more favorable to the accused than that used in the Childers Case is stating a doctrine more favorable to the accused than is sound. Besides, the court might well have refused to give the written request in charge, because it is in part clearly erroneous. In the request is embodied the following proposition of law:

"Whether offered as the sole proof of guilt or in corroboration of an accomplice, the general rule applies that where circumstantial evidence alone is relied upon it must be sufficient to satisfy the jury of the guilt of the accused to the exclusion of every other reasonable supposition."

Such a charge would have been manifest error, for it would have required that the corroborating evidence, if circumstantial in its nature (as it was here), should in itself be sufficient to exclude every other reasonable hypothesis than that of the defendant's guilt.

[2] 2. The court charged the jury upon the subject of the flight of the accused shortly after the commission of the crime charged. The correctness of the charge as a rule of evidence is not challenged, but its applicability is denied; movant contending that no evidence adduced upon the trial authorized the instructions upon this subject. The record does not support this contention, for it contains testimony of two police officers showing that on the day after the killing of Herndon search was made for the defendant in or near the city of Atlanta, and that he was not found. It was also discovered that on the day after the homicide he had gone to the naval recruiting office, where he had previously made application to be allowed to enlist, and there learned that his application had been refused; that shortly thereafter it was learned that the defendant was in Monroe, Va., and a member of the police force of Atlanta went to Monroe and returned with the accused on September 13th, two weeks after the homicide. The officer testifying as to these facts testified further:

"I asked him how many days it took him to make it over, and he said he made it pretty quick on account of some peach train, or cattle train; made it across pretty quick; that he was on that; while he was in jail he got out of his cage twice, he told me. * * * Said he took a piece of steel out of his shoe here; told me how he done it. * * * Said he made a key to the door, there was a padlock on it, and unlocked the door and came out."

There was sufficient evidence on the subject of flight to authorize a charge on that subject. The weight of the circumstances was for determination by the jury.

[3] 3. The other part of the charge excepted to states a principle of law substantially correct: and, while the language employed is somewhat inapt it did not obscure the meaning of the court nor could it have misled the jury.

[4] 4. The ground of the motion for new trial raising the contention that the evidence was insufficient to authorize the conviction is strongly urged in the brief and argument of counsel. The testimony of the accomplice was, in part, that on the same day as that on which the homicide was committed he saw Callaway in the neighborhood of the factory, the exact situation being described by references to certain streets and bridges near the factory; that while he and the accused were waiting there they were joined by another person, Charles Powers; that the defendant handed the witness a piece of iron pipe, instructing him to strike an iron tank on a flat car as a signal if any one approached; that Callaway said he and Powers were going up to the factory to get a little money from the watchman, this place being about 40 feet from the factory in which the decedent was watchman; that upon leaving the witness the accused and the other person went up the railroad to the end of the Southern Furniture Company's building (the building in which the murder was committed); and that they took the inside of a fence near the factory and went to a certain window, and then went in. The witness states they were to give him a dollar apiece for watching. After they effected an entrance through the window, some one in the building holloed, and the witness ran. Some one in the building said, "O, Lordy," and the witness ran up Marietta street. The meeting of the three was about half past 5 or 6 o'clock in the evening. There was evidence to authorize a finding that the homicide took place between 6 and 8 o'clock p. m. Witness saw the accused afterwards that evening at a show, and he had two five-dollar bills and five ones in money. In substance, his testimony was that he was an accomplice; that the accused met him at a place near the factory at about 6 o'clock in the evening; that he entered the factory building of the Southern Furniture Company with the express purpose of robbing the night watchman there; that soon after the accused and another party entered the factory through a window a voice was heard crying out, and that shortly thereafter the defendant was seen by the witness, the accomplice, to have a stated sum of money—$15. Such facts proved by another than an accomplice would have authorized a conviction of the accused. But before the accused could be convicted upon this testimony, inasmuch as the witness was already proved to be an accomplice, corroborating evidence was necessary; and we must look to the testimony of other witnesses not connected with the crime to find this.

It is shown by the testimony of other witnesses in the case that the accomplice, Berryhill, and the accused, Callaway, had both been employed in the factory of the Southern Furniture Company. They had left that employment some time before the commission of the homicide for which Callaway was on trial. Herndon was killed on the evening of Friday, August 29th; on Thursday before the homicide he was seen in the factory, according to the testimony of a witness introduced by the state making inquiries as to whether certain acquaintances of his were still in the factory or not, and making remarks which seem to have no particular significance; but he also inquired who was night watchman at that time, and was informed that it was Mack Herndon, a negro man, who is referred to in the evidence by some of the witnesses as "old man Mack," or "old man Mack Herndon." One of the witnesses testified that he was in his 60's or 70's; another witness stated that he was 50 or 60 years of age. The jury were authorized to find that he was an old negro man. On Friday evening the employes of the factory were paid off, and the jury might have inferred from this that the accused knew that this was the day on which the employes received their pay, and that therefore the night watchman would be in possession of some money.

There was other evidence tending to show that the accused contemplated leaving the city, had made application for enlistment in the navy and went on the morning after the homicide to the recruiting office to know whether his application had been acted on, and there found that it had been refused. There is evidence of search made by police officers for the accused; that he could not be found about the city; his home was in the suburbs, and they went to his home, but were informed that he was not there. About ten days or two weeks after the homicide it was learned that he was in Monroe, Va. He had stolen a ride on a freight train, and in that way made the trip to Virginia. He had a piece of iron in his shoe, according to his own statement, that he could use to pick a lock and escape from a jail. One witness stated that he saw the accused in the factory on Thursday before the crime was committed, and when the accused saw him, the witness, he turned back into another door. The statement of the accused is very meager. In the brief of counsel he is referred to as a 15 year old boy. One of the witnesses testified that he was 16 or 17 years of age. At any rate, he was a mere youth. This fact, and the fact that the accused may have been laboring under embarrassment and excitement at the time of making his statement, may be considered in reading his statement. That statement in full is as follows:

"Gentlemen, I used to live in Baxter, Ga., and I came from Baxter to Atlanta, and then my father had been dead seven years and I never have been to school much in my life; and this statement from Francis Berryhill, he said I would kill him if he swore against me. I didn't tell him nothing of the kind. Gentlemen, I didn't have anything to do with this killing, none whatsoever. Gentlemen, I am innocent of this crime. My aunt Claudia gave me $20, and I started for Washington and I got as far as Monroe, Va., and they caught me for hobnobing and locked me up and kept me until the officers come and got me and brought me back to Atlanta. Gentlemen, that is all I have got to say."

It is pertinent to observe that there is nothing in the statement to account for the whereabouts of the accused at the time the crime with which he was charged was committed. It will also be observed that he says in his statement that his aunt had given him $20, and he started for Washington and got as far as Monroe, Va. There was no evidence offered to show that the aunt referred to had actually given him the sum of money stated. The facts relied upon as corroboration may be trifling when viewed by themselves and separately from the entire case; but the jury had the right to consider all the facts and to consider them in their relations one to another, and to determine whether or not, considering the facts and comparing them in their proper setting, under the evidence adduced, they tended to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime and were a sufficient corroboration of the evidence of the accomplice to authorize a conviction of the accused under the law as given them by the court.

COLLIER v. SCHOENBERG. (No. 11772.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Evidence \S 121(2)—Principal and agent \S 22(2), 23(1, 2)—Agency may be established by principal's declarations; agent's declarations not admissible of themselves; may be proved by circumstances, apparent relations, and conduct; agent's declarations may be admissible as res gestæ.

The fact of agency may be established by declarations of the alleged principal. Taylor v. Young & Co., 21 Ga. App. 40(1a), 93 S. E. 558. Declarations of an alleged agent are not by themselves admissible to prove agency, but it may also be established by proving circumstances, apparent relations, and the conduct of the parties; and where the extraneous circumstances, independently of and without regard to the declarations of the agent himself, clearly tend to establish the fact of his agency, his declarations, though inadmissible if standing alone, may, as a part of the res gestæ of the transaction, be considered. Williams & Bro. v. King Hardware Co., 25 Ga. App. 680, 104 S. E. 454, and cases cited; Cable Co. v. Walker, 127 Ga. 65, 56 S. E. 108; Martin & Hicks v. Bridges & Jelks Co., 18 Ga. App. 24 (2), 88 S. E. 579. Applying the foregoing principles of law to the evidence in this case, the jury were authorized to find that the fact of agency had been established.

2. Master and servant \S 332(4)—Instruction held to state servant's acts must be within scope of master's business.

The judge charged the jury that if the person in charge of the defendant's car at the time of the injury was driving it "as the servant or agent of the defendant," the defendant would be responsible for any negligence of which the driver might be guilty. He did not amplify this statement by adding that such alleged acts of negligence by the servant must have been done in the prosecution of or within the scope of the master's business. Held, that such a charge cannot be accounted as reversible error, for while a master is bound by the acts of his servant only when the latter is acting within the scope of his authority (Civil Code of 1910, \S 3593, 4418), still, since the charge limited the accountability of the master for the negligence of the servant to his acts when done "as the servant or agent of the defendant," this should be taken as the equivalent of a statement that the acts must have been done within the scope of the master's business. Fielder v. Davison, 139 Ga. 509, 511, 512, 77 S. E. 618.

3. Evidence \S 32—Municipal corporations \S 706(1)—Trial \S 252(8)—Ordinance not pleaded, admitted, or proved should not have been charged; ordinance held not sufficiently pleaded; ordinance of Savannah cannot be judicially noticed.

The court erred in charging the provisions of a municipal ordinance of the city of Savannah, which had not been sufficiently pleaded or admitted by the defendant, or in any wise proved by the evidence.

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by L. Schoenberg against H. M. Collier. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Shelby Myrick, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error.

Morris H. Bernstein and Simon N. Gazan, both of Savannah, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, P. J. [1-3] In regard to the city ordinance referred to in the third headnote, the court charged the jury as follows:

"There is a valid municipal ordinance of the city which requires that any person or persons operating or driving any vehicle upon the streets and lanes of this city, when turning into a street to the right, shall keep close to the right curb, and, when turning into the street to the left, shall swing wide of the left curb, passing beyond the center of the intersecting street. To violate that ordinance he would be guilty of negligence as a matter of law, and if by reason of such a violation of the ordinance and such negligence a plaintiff or person is hurt or his property is injured, then there is a liability on the part of the person who did it, or whose employee did it."

It is contended that this was error, because the ordinance referred to was not set out or admitted by the pleadings or introduced in evidence, and that consequently it was harmful error for the judge, as a matter within his judicial cognizance, to charge it. The court, in the order overruling the motion for a new trial, stated that this ordinance was sufficiently pleaded for the court to take cognizance of it under section 4872 of the Code of Georgia 1882 (Code of Savannah 1918, § 131), which provides:

"All ordinances, by-laws, rules and regulations of said city, published by authority of said mayor and aldermen, and promulgated as such by said authority, shall be evidence in all the courts of this state to the same extent that laws of the state, as published by authority, shall be evidence of such laws; and when, in any case, an exemplification of any such ordinance, by-law, rule or regulation, minute of council, or any paper of file in any of the departments of the government of said city may be required, the same may be authenticated under the official signature of the mayor, or acting mayor, and the seal of said city."

In the pleadings the only reference to the ordinance is a meager statement in the petition that the defendant's agent or servant was negligent "in making a short turn as he was about to turn west in crossing Drayton street, when he was running north, in violation of the city ordinance requiring a long turn under those circumstances." This allegation was denied by the defendant's answer, and there was no proof offered by either party as to the existence of any such ordinance.

The general rule is that courts cannot take judicial cognizance of municipal ordinances. Funk v. Browne & Leacy, 145 Ga. 828 (2), 90 S. E. 64; Taylor v. City of Sandersville, 118 Ga. 63, 44 S. E. 845. That the general rule has application to the ordinances of Savannah would seem to be necessarily and clearly implied by the following cases: Pounds v. Central of Ga. Ry. Co., 142 Ga. 415, 417, 83 S. E. 96; Mayor & Aldermen of Savannah v. Jordan, 142 Ga. 409, 414, 83 S. E. 109, L. R. A. 1915C, 741, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 240; McDermott v. Mayor & Aldermen of Savannah, 18 Ga. App. 308, 309, 89 S. E. 348. We think, therefore, that the court erred in charging the unpleaded and unproved ordinance.

Trial ~~426~~—Verdict in dispossession proceeding held cured by admissions of counsel on motion in arrest.

In a proceeding under a dispossessionary warrant under Civ. Code 1910, §§ 5385, 5386, if a verdict finding for plaintiff for $420 was defective for failure to find on the eviction issue, the defect was cured by the admissions of defendant's counsel on motion in arrest of judgment, recited in the order overruling the motion, that defendant had vacated the premises, and that the amount of the verdict was double the amount of rent.

Error from Superior Court, Ben Hill County; O. T. Gower, Judge.

Dispossessionary proceeding by F. J. Hansen against A. L. Mobley. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Myer Goldberg, of Fitzgerald, for plaintiff in error.

D. E. Griffin, of Fitzgerald, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. This was a proceeding under a dispossessionary warrant and a counter affidavit. Civil Code of 1910, §§ 5385, 5386. The verdict was as follows:

"We the gentlemen of the jury find in favor of the plaintiff entitled to recover $420.00. July 6th, 1920."

On this verdict the court rendered the following judgment:

"The above-stated case having come on in its regular order for trial on the 6th day of July, 1920, and the uncontradicted evidence having shown that the defendant's term of rental had expired on the 31st day of December, 1919, and that demand had been made on him for the premises, and it further appearing that notice to vacate on December 31, 1919, said premises was personally served on the 10th day of September, 1919, and further that the reasonable rent of the said premises was $40 per month, the same having been rented for this year and next, from January 1, 1920, at $40 per month, and the court having directed that the jury find in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant the possession of the premises, and having directed the jury that they consider what would be reasonable rental for the premises, and double said amount and turn same into court, the jury having returned the following verdict, to wit: 'We the gentlemen of the jury find in favor of the plaintiff entitled to recover $420.00, July 6th, 1920'—whereupon it is considered, ordered, and adjudged by the court that the premises in dispute, and the lot upon which the same is located, and all said premises in the city of Fitzgerald, in the county of Ben Hill, state of Georgia, be awarded to F. J.

Hansen, the plaintiff, and that the clerk of this court do issue a writ of possession accordingly. Ordered further that the plaintiff do recover of the defendant as principal, and W. R. Luke and Jehue Harper as securities, $420 and costs to be taxed by the clerk of this court. This 14th day of July, 1920."

During the term at which the verdict and judgment were rendered the defendant filed a motion in "arrest of said verdict and judgment," on the following grounds: That the said verdict "is too vague, indefinite, and uncertain to support a judgment or the judgment" rendered in the case; "that there were two issues, both of which should have been covered by the said verdict, viz., the eviction issue, or whether or not the defendant was holding over and beyond his term of rental, and then the question or issue of reasonable rent," and the verdict failed to cover the eviction issue; "that an adverse finding against the defendant on this issue was necessarily a condition precedent before the jury could find double rent against" the defendant; and, the jury having failed to find on the eviction issue, the verdict "is entirely void" and so insufficient that a "judgment cannot be legally based thereon, and therefore the judgment" rendered in said case ought as a "matter of law" to "be arrested." On the hearing of the motion in arrest the court "overruled and denied the same. * * * counsel for plaintiff in error admitting that the plaintiff in error had vacated the premises from which he was * * * sought to be evicted, and had voluntarily surrendered the possession of same over to the defendant in error," and "having admitted that the verdict as found by the jury was double the amount of rent." Held: There was no error in overruling the motion in arrest. If the verdict was insufficient, as set out, the defect was fully cured by the admissions of the defendant, made in court and recited in the order overruling the motion in arrest.

Judgment affirmed.

McKALE v. HINES, Director General of Railroads. (No. 11814.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. March 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Master and servant §106(1)—Master liable for defects in instrumentalities temporarily made part of plant.

A master is answerable, as owner pro tempore, for defects in instrumentalities temporarily taken over from the owner and made a part of his own plant.

2. Master and servant §106(1)—Third person's electric trucks left for recharging held no part of employer's plant.

A railroad company, operating electric trucks and maintaining a charging station, and, by agreement with a compress company, recharging its trucks but making no use of them, and having possession only for the purpose of recharging them, did not take over and use as a part of its plant a truck left in a shed near the charging station for recharging.

3. Master and servant §106(1)—Master not liable for defect in electric truck of third person left for recharging without actual knowledge.

A railroad company, operating electric trucks and maintaining a charging station at which, by agreement with a compress company, it recharged the trucks of such company, without making any use of them or having any possession of them except for the purpose of recharging them, was not the temporary owner of a truck so left for recharging, and was not charged with constructive knowledge of the defective condition of the brake, and, in the absence of actual knowledge, was not liable for injury to an employee.

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by James McKale against Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, operating the Central of Georgia Railroad. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The plaintiff brought suit to recover damages for personal injuries received while in the employ of the Director General of Railroads operating the Central of Georgia Railroad, and the case is here on exceptions to the awarding of a nonsuit. The Central of Georgia Railroad has an electric charging station on its terminals in Savannah where its trucks are recharged after having finished the day's work. The Atlantic Compress Company had a cotton compress located adjacent to these terminals, and the compress company used the same sort of trucks in its business. Both the trucks of the Atlantic Compress Company as well as the trucks of the defendant were taken care of at this station; the compress company paying the Director General of Railroads for its proportion of the cost of the labor and supplies used in its behalf. The plaintiff was employed by the railroad company at this station, and it was his duty to recharge the trucks of both the compress company and of the defendant. There is a shed maintained by the defendant under which the trucks of both the defendant and the compress company are placed after the day's work is done for the purpose of being recharged at night, and it was the plaintiff's duty to operate the trucks from this shed to the recharging station and there recharge the trucks. On the night of his injury the plaintiff undertook to operate a truck belonging to the Atlantic Compress Company from the shed in question, a distance of about 30 feet, from where it had been left by an employee of the compress company at the close of the day's work, into the charging station. While moving the truck into the station plaintiff was standing on the front foot board of the truck with his back in the direction in which the truck was moving, and while he was within 3 or 4 feet of the wall of the charging station he attempted to put on the brake of the truck, but for some reason it would not work, and he was mashed between the truck and the wall of the station. The truck was also equipped with a reversed lever by which the truck could be stopped immediately without reference to the brake. The truck so injuring the plaintiff after the accident was found to be the Atlantic Compress Company's truck. The employee of the compress company, who had placed the truck in the shed, knew that the brake appliance was out of repair, but when he had finished his day's work there was no one on the premises on behalf of the defendant to whom a report of the defect could be made. Knowing that it was the plaintiff's duty to operate for the purpose of recharging all the trucks placed in the shed, it was the defendant's duty to provide some representative to inspect the trucks so placed in the shed and to have made a report of the defects and disrepair of any of said trucks, and not subject the plaintiff to injury by reason of defective trucks placed there for recharging and to warn plaintiff of any insecurity in any of said trucks. The defect in the truck was known to the defendant, or in the exercise of proper care and diligence should have been known. Its defects or deficiencies were unknown to the plaintiff, and could not have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence. It was no part of the plaintiff's duty to inspect the trucks, and he had a right to rely on the fact of the truck being in good condition, since he found it where serviceable trucks were placed for the purpose of being recharged, and defendant, knowing of the defect and deficiency, was negligent in placing said truck where only trucks in good condition should have been placed; that this truck was used by the defendant in its business of handling freight, and defendant used it as its own, causing the same to be operated by its employees, and, irrespective of the ownership of the truck, operated it and used it as its own instrumentality. The plaintiff, in operating it from the shed where it was placed to the recharging station, was in the discharge of his duty.

The evidence in support of the foregoing allegations contained in the petition substantially stated are as follows: The truck which caused the injury to the plaintiff was not used by the defendant in any of its business or in any respect and had never been so used. It was the property of the Atlantic Compress Company, and had always been used by that company in its business, and was so used until its employee placed it in the adjacent shed for the purpose of being recharged by the plaintiff at the recharging station of the defendant. There was no evidence whatever that the defendant knew of any defects or deficiencies in the truck operated by the employee of the Atlantic Compress Company when he placed it in the shed, or at any other time, or had anything to do with placing the truck in the shed. The employee of the compress company discovered the afternoon when he placed the truck in the shed that the brakes were for some reason defective, but he did not know what was the matter with them, and did not report their condition to the defendant company or to any one else. It was the duty of this employee to report any defect in the truck that he discovered to some officer or agent of the compress company in order that it might be sent to the repair shop about a half a mile away from the charging station. He did not make a report as to the defect of this truck to anybody, because there was no one at the compress office to whom to make the report, and he did not go to the office of the defendant company for that purpose, because he had never made any report of the kind to it, although, if he had gone into the office, he might have found an employee of the defendant company therein. Plaintiff testified in reference to his work:

That he would go out and get one of the electric trucks and run it into the charging station, and when he got it in there he would work on the batteries, would clean them, would look to see that all of the wires were connected and in good order, would oil the trucks, and, in order to oil them, would have to go underneath the trucks below the platform of the trucks. "All I was hired down there for was to charge the trucks and if I found anything broke on them have it marked 'To the shop.' I did not actually do the repairing myself. If I found anything defective or broken part of it so that it would not operate, I should chalk it to the shop, and it would be taken to the other place where they repaired trucks before they were operated again. Mr. Pharr, he was my foreman; he told us down there, he said, 'McKale, if you happen to find anything the matter with these trucks mark them to the shop, because some careless driver is liable to leave them outside the charging station when they need repairs.' My business was to work on the trucks, not with the trucks."

Plaintiff was operating the truck in question over smooth concrete floors on which there was a quantity of oil which had been dropped from the trucks as they were oiled each night. Plaintiff was an experienced man, having been employed in this work three years. While running the truck into the charging station he stood on the front end of the truck with his back to the wall which he was approaching. He did not undertake to put on the brake or to see if it was in working condition until within three or four feet of the wall of the charging station, and then found that the brake would not work. He did not attempt to use the reverse lever on the truck until the wall had touched his back. Plaintiff's duty was to examine the truck before recharging it, and this work was performed by him sometimes out in the shed before running the truck into the station, but generally in the station, where the light enabled him to do the work.

Simon N. Gazan, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error.

H. W. Johnson, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. [1] 1. It is well established in principle and authority:

"That a master is answerable for defects in any instrumentalities which he has temporarily taken over from the owner and made a part of his own plant. * * * So far as regards his obligations to his servants, he must be considered as the owner pro tempore." 3 Labatt's Master & Servant, § 1074; 1 Shearman & Redfield on Negligence (6th Ed.) § 197; Georgia Railroad v. Hunter, 12 Ga. App. 301, 77 S. E. 176; Southern Bell Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Covington, 139 Ga. 566 (2a), 77 S. E. 382; Central Ry. Co. v. McClifford, 120 Ga. 90, 47 S. E. 590.

[2] In the instant case the evidence for the plaintiff clearly disproved the allegations of the petition relied upon to show that the master had taken over and used as a part of his plant the instrumentality whose defective condition was the cause of the servant's injury.

[3] 2. The defendant corporation owned and operated electric trucks for the transportation of freight from railroad cars to steamships, and vice versa. These trucks were recharged every night at the charging station of the defendant corporation by its servant. Another corporation owned and operated electric trucks of identically the same kind as those of the defendant. By an agreement with the defendant the trucks of the other company were recharged at night at the defendant's charging station by the defendant's employee. The trucks of the other corporation were used every day by the employees of that company, and at the end of the day were placed by them in a shed near the charging station, and afterwards operated by the employees of the defendant corporation from that shed to the charging station to be recharged. When recharged these trucks were taken possession of and used by the employees in the business of the company owning them. No use was made of the trucks of this company whatever by the defendant, and its possession of them was alone for the purpose of recharging them for the use of the owner company. One of these trucks which had been left for recharging had a defective brake, and while plaintiff was taking it into the charging station for the purpose of being recharged, he was injured because of this defect. Held: The defendant corporation was not the temporary owner of the defective truck, and had no qualified right of property therein and could not be held to have had constructive knowledge of its defective condition, and, in the absence of actual knowledge of its defective condition, was not liable for the injury to its employee. Green v. Babcock Lumber Co., 130 Ga. 469 (1), 60 S. E. 1062.

After a careful examination of the allegations of the petition and the plaintiff's evidence applicable thereto, this court is clearly of the opinion that a fatal variance exists between the allegations of negligence on which defendant's liability is predicated and the proof, and therefore that the judgment of nonsuit was not error.

Judgment affirmed.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Weapons ¶18(1)—One selling to minor liable for natural and probable consequences.

Where one has violated a penal statute of this state which forbids the sale of a pistol to a minor, and injury results therefrom, he should be held liable for the injury, if it be a natural and probable consequence of the violation of the statute and should reasonably have been anticipated by the offender as a natural and probable result of his unlawful act.

2. Negligence ¶62(1)—Intervening cause defined.

If, subsequently to the original wrongful act, a new cause intervened, sufficient of itself to stand as the cause of the injury, the former will be considered as too remote. But if the intervening cause and its probable consequences should reasonably have been anticipated by the original wrongdoer as a natural and probable result of the wrongful act, the causal connection between the wrongful act and the consequent injury is not broken, and an action for resulting damages will lie against the original tort-feasor.

3. Negligence \S 62(1)—First wrongdoer responsible.

A tortious act may have several consequences, concurrent or successive, for all of which the first tort-feasor is responsible; and a consequence of an original wrong may in turn become the cause of succeeding consequences, and should not be regarded as an efficient intervening cause, which will excuse the original cause, so long as it appears that the injury is attributable to the original wrong as a result which reasonably might or ought to have been anticipated and foreseen.

4. Weapons \S 18(2)—Whether injury by one to whom minor lent pistol was proximate result of selling to minor held a question for the jury.

The allegations of the petition show that the defendant sold to a minor loaded cartridges and a pistol in violation of the criminal statute of the state, and that this minor, some days afterwards, lent the pistol to another minor, and the latter shot, injured, and damaged a third minor, who brought suit against the defendant as the original wrongdoer. Held, that these allegations, with others in the petition, presented issuable facts relating to the cause of action and the liability of the defendant, which should have been submitted to the jury, and the court erred in sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the petition.

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Action by Phocian Spirea, by next friend, against Sam Goldberg and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The petition, briefly stated, makes the following allegations: In November, 1919, the defendants sold to a named minor, about 14 years of age, a pistol and loaded cartridges to be used in it, and the following January this minor loaned the pistol to a minor of about the same age, for the purpose of using it in target practicing. Two days later this second minor took the pistol to school, for the purpose of returning it, and while he was playing with it and demonstrating it to another minor it was discharged, and the bullet entered the petitioner's right shoulder, inflicting a dangerous and painful wound. The petition alleges that the defendants were negligent in selling the pistol to a minor in violation of the statute of the state of Georgia; that they were criminally negligent in so selling it, and were guilty of negligence per se; that they knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care and forethought should have known, that by reason of the immature age and lack of experience and understanding of the minor to whom they sold the pistol the public was endangered, and some one was liable to be killed or injured by the weapon.

The defendants demurred generally on the ground that no cause of action was set forth; that the sale of the pistol to a minor, and the lending of the pistol, nearly 60 days thereafter, by that minor to another minor, by whom it was accidentally discharged while he was playing with it, did not constitute the immediate cause of the injury received by the plaintiff, and the injury could not have been reasonably expected by the defendants; that the proximate cause of the injury was the act of the minor who negligently discharged the pistol; that it was not such a probable result as could have been foreseen by the defendants, so as to make them liable therefor; that the mere sale of the pistol to a minor, even though in violation of the statute, there being no reason to anticipate that he would, after an interval of 60 days or more, lend it to another minor, who might inadvertently, by demonstrating it, injure a third minor, was not, in legal contemplation, to be anticipated by the defendants in the sale of the pistol.

The demurrer was sustained, and the petition dismissed, and the plaintiff excepted.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1-4] Section 350 of the Penal Code of this state (1910) forbids the sale of pistols to minors and makes the violation of the statute a misdemeanor. It has been uniformly held in this state that a violation of a penal statute resulting in injury is negligence per se, and authorizes a recovery by the party injured, without other negligence. Platt v. Southern Photo Material Co., 4 Ga. App. 159, 60 S. E. 1068; Elk Cotton Mills v. Grant, 140 Ga. 729, 79 S. E. 836, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 656. There is no doubt as to this legal proposition, and if the minor who bought the pistol from the defendants had intentionally or negligently discharged it, causing injury to another, in the absence of negligence on the part of the injured person, the right to recover damages would result, without proof of any other act of negligence on the part of the defendants. 1 Thompson on Negligence, § 10.

Did the fact that the injury was not inflicted by the minor to whom the defendants sold the pistol, and did not "follow immediately upon" the violation of the statute, but was inflicted by another minor, to whom the pistol was loaned by the first minor, prevent a recovery of consequential damages? The solution of this question depends upon the application of the facts, admitted to be true by the demurrer, to the well-settled principles of law relating to proximate and remote cause. As tersely stated in section 4509 of Civil Code (1910):

"If the damages are only the imaginary or possible result of the tortious act, or other and contingent circumstances preponderate largely in causing the injurious effect, such damages are too remote to be the basis of recovery against the wrongdoer."

And the next section of the Code (§ 4510) states the rule for ascertaining when damages can be recovered:

"Damages which are the legal and natural result of the act done, though contingent to some extent, are not too remote to be recovered. But damages traceable to the act, but not its legal or material consequence, are too remote and contingent."

These definitions are in substantial harmony with the decisions of the courts and the dicta of text-writers. The divergent and conflicting views are due to the difficulty of application of the principle to the particular facts of the case. Nothing new can be added to the many exhaustive discussions on the subject by the courts and learned writers, and we will content ourselves with a statement of the accepted general rule, and endeavor to make such application of the facts of this case as will correctly indicate the proper legal conclusion. The general rule of law is that—

"Whoever does an illegal or wrongful act is answerable for all the consequences that ensue in the ordinary and natural course of events, though those consequences be immediately and directly brought about by the intervening agency of others, provided these acts causing the damage were the necessary or legal and natural consequences of the original wrongful act." Addison on Torts (Wood's Ed.) § 12; Southern Ry. Co. v. Webb, 116 Ga. 152, 42 S. E. 395, 59 L. R. A. 109; Valdosta Street Ry. Co. v. Fenn, 11 Ga. App. 587, 75 S. E. 984.

In further elucidation of the subject it may be stated, in the apt language of the attorney of the plaintiff in error in his excellent brief:

"A tortious act may have several consequences, concurrent or successive, for all of which the first tort-feasor is responsible, and a consequence of an original wrong may in turn become the cause of succeeding consequences and should not manifestly be regarded as an intervening cause which will relieve the original cause, so long as it affirmatively appears that the mischief is attributable to the original wrong as a result which reasonably might have been, or ought to have been, foreseen as probable." Southern Ry. Co. v. Webb, supra; Valdosta Street Ry. Co. v. Fenn, supra.

The earliest illustration of the above-stated legal rule is found in the celebrated "squib" case, frequently referred to and approved by subsequent learned authorities. In that case the defendant threw a lighted squib into a large concourse of people in a market.

"The squib fell upon the standing of one Yates, who sold gingerbread; * * * one Willis instantly, and to prevent injury to himself and the said wares of the said Yates, took up the lighted squib from off the said standing, and then threw it across the * * * market house, when it fell upon another standing there of one Ryal, who sold the same sort of wares, who instantly, and to save his own goods from being injured, took up the said lighted squib from off the said standing, and then threw it to another part of the market house, and in so throwing it, struck the plaintiff * * * in the face therewith, and the combustible matter then bursting put out one of the plaintiff's eyes."

The judges unanimously held that the action was maintainable against the wrongdoer who first threw the lighted squib. The language of the judges in that case is strongly applicable to the facts of the instant case. Nares, J., said:

"Wherever an act is unlawful at first, trespass will lie for the consequences of it. He [the defendant] is the person who * * * gave the mischievous faculty to the squib. That mischievous faculty remained in it till the explosion. No new power of doing mischief was communicated to it by Willis or Ryal. It is like the case of a mad ox turned loose in a crowd. The person who turns him loose is answerable for whatever mischief he may do. The intermediate acts of Willis and Ryal will not purge the original tort in the defendant. But he who does the first wrong is answerable for all the consequential damage."

Gould, J., was of the same opinion with Nares, J.:

"I agree with Brother Nares that, whenever a man does an unlawful act, he is answerable for all the consequences. * * * I think the defendant may be considered in the same view as if he himself had personally thrown the squib in the plaintiff's face."

De Grey, C. J., said:

"The true question is whether the injury is the direct and immediate act of the defendant; and I am of opinion that in this case it is. * * * I look upon all that was done subsequent to the original throwing as a continuation of the first force and first act." Scott v. Shepherd, 2 Wm. Blackstone, 892.

This case is quoted from at length because it has been substantially followed ever since, and Mr. Thompson calls it—

"the best illustration of the doctrine of proximate and remote cause and of the interposition of causes deemed to have been set in motion by the original wrongdoer." 1 Thompson on Negligence, § 53.

Let us briefly apply to the facts of the instant case the law as announced by these learned judges. Here the defendants were the original wrongdoers. They gave the "mischievous faculty" to the pistol with the loaded cartridges when they sold it to the minor in violation of the penal statute. That "mischievous faculty" remained in the pistol while the first minor had it in his possession and until it exploded in the hands of the second minor. The intermediate act of the second minor did not purge the original criminal act of the defendant. The fact that the first minor had possession of the pistol for some time is not material. The illegal act of placing it in his possession made the defendants responsible for any damages resulting as a legal and reasonable consequence until protected by the statute of limitations.

There are many other cases illustrating the point now under consideration and supporting the view we take of this case, but we will cite only two, which come nearest to analogy. In Fowell v. Grafton, 22 Ontario Law Reports, 550, the defendants sold an airgun to a boy who used it to shoot birds. While engaged in that pastime one of the bullets injured the plaintiff, who sued the defendants for damages, alleging negligence. A verdict was found for the plaintiff, and on appeal the judgment was affirmed. The selling of the airgun to a minor was a violation of the statute. Clute, J., in his opinion, used the following language appropriate to the instant case:

"Was the sale the causing cause of the accident, or was it too remote to be so regarded? The prohibition against selling an airgun to an infant under 16 years of age was, no doubt, to protect the child and the public as well, from the danger which would arise from an instrument of that kind being placed in the hands of such a person. The sale of the instrument makes the danger possible, and in that sense the defendants have created a dangerous condition of affairs which in effect resulted in the injury complained of. * * * The prohibition must mean that, if a child of tender age had a gun, he would probably use it, and, if he used it, he would probably hurt either himself or somebody else. * * * During all the time the infant had possession of the gun, that possession was unlawful, and made unlawful by the defendants. He was unlawfully possessed of it by their act; the natural result following—having become possessed of the weapon, he used it, and in using it caused the injury. His final act in the using is so connected with the prohibition that I do not think * * * it is so remote as to have entitled the defendants to have the case withdrawn from the jury."

In Binford v. Johnston, 82 Ind. 426, 42 Am. Rep. 508, the facts are as follows: Two boys, one aged 10 and the other 12 years, purchased of a dealer cartridges for use in a toy pistol. * * * It was against the statute to sell pistol cartridges to minors. * * * Shortly after the purchase the toy pistol, loaded with one of the cartridges, was picked up by another minor, who discharged it, killing one of the minors first mentioned. It was held that the dealer was liable for the death of the boy killed. The judge who spoke for the court used the following language strongly applicable to the facts of the case now under discussion:

"A man who places in the hands of a child an article of a dangerous character, and one likely to cause injury to the child * * * or to others, is guilty of an actionable wrong. * * * The more difficult question is whether the result is so remote from the original wrong as to bring the case within the operation of the maxim 'causa proxima, et non remota, spectatur.' * * * The fact that some agency intervenes between the original wrong and the injury does not necessarily bring the case within the rule; on the contrary, it is firmly settled that the intervention of a third person or of other and new direct causes does not preclude a recovery if the injury was the natural or probable result of the original wrong. Billman v. Indianapolis, etc., R. R. Co., 76 Ind. 166, 40 Am. R. 230. This doctrine remounts to the famous case of Scott v. Shepherd, 2 W. Black, 892, commonly known as the 'squib case.' The rule goes so far as to hold that the original wrongdoer is responsible, even though the agency of a second wrongdoer intervened. This doctrine is enforced with great power by Cockburn, C. J., in Clark v. Chambers, 7 Cent. L. J. 11, and is approved by the text-writers. * * * It is a probable consequence of such a sale as that charged against appellant that the explosives may be so used by children, among whom it is natural to expect that they will be taken, as to injure the buyers or their associates. * * * One who deals with children must anticipate the ordinary behavior of children. The appellant was bound to take notice of the natural conduct of lads like those to whom he sold the cartridges, and it cannot be justly said that the act of the lads in carrying the pistol with them to their home, and leaving it upon the floor within reach of their brother and playmate, was an unnatural or improbable one."

So, in the instant case, were not the defendants, when they sold the pistol to the minor, legally bound to take knowledge of the habits of boys to lend their pistols to their playmates, and that minors are in the habit of great negligence in handling these weapons while playing with and exhibiting them to other playmates? The purpose of the Legislature, in the act making it a misdemeanor to sell a pistol to a minor, was twofold—to protect that class and to prevent injuries resulting from negligence in the handling of these dangerous weapons by irresponsible persons. Knowledge of this purpose in a legal sense was chargeable to the defendants when they violated the law by selling the pistol to the minor. With such knowledge, is it not reasonable to assume that they were also chargeable with notice that a violation of the statute would result in the evil which its enactment was intended to prevent?

We conclude that under the allegations of the petition, admitted to be true by the de-murrer, the question whether the violation of the statute by the defendant was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury, and the injury a result which he might in the exercise of prudence have reasonably anticipated as a natural result of his unlawful act, or whether the act of the minor who actually shot the plaintiff was such an intervening efficient cause as would prevent the unlawful act of the defendant from being the proximate cause, was a question properly determinable by the jury. 22 R. C. L., § 31; Mills v. Central of Ga. Ry. Co., 140 Ga. 181, 78 S. E. 816, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 1098; Mayor and Council of Unadilla v. Felder, 145 Ga. 440, 89 S. E. 423; *Bonner v. HINES, Director General of Railroads, v. RUBNITZ. (No. 11292.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2, March 3, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Railroads \S 394(6)—Petition held to allege wanton injury.

Petition held to charge wanton injury to plaintiff after his perilous position as a trespasser on defendant's tracks had become known.

2. Pleading \S 64(2)—Allegation that a watchman knew or should have known duplicitous.

An allegation in a petition that a watchman, when he directed plaintiff to cross the tracks of the defendant, knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care should have known, that the plaintiff's safety would be endangered, is duplicitous.

3. Pleading \S 64(2)—Duplicitous allegation cured by other allegations.

Though an allegation that a watchman knew or should have known that plaintiff's safety was endangered when he directed him to cross the tracks was duplicitous, defect was cured by other allegations showing that cause of action was based on the fact of knowledge.

4. Railroads \S 369(3)—Signals required to warn trespasser near crossing.

Where a trespasser's perilous situation a short distance beyond a crossing is known to operators of train, a failure to ring a bell or give warning or to perform any act required by the statute to be performed at a crossing may be negligence independently of the statute.

5. Railroads \S 5½, New, vol. 6A Key-No. Series—Suing Director General and alleging negligence against railroad sufficient.

In an action for personal injuries brought against the Director General, it is sufficient to charge negligence against railroad, where petition alleges that defendant is operating and controlling railroad company.

6. Railroads \S 344(1)—Petition not demurrable because not alleging purpose of going on tracks.

In action for injuries to plaintiff, struck by a train when crossing, at the direction of watchman, the tracks a short distance from the highway crossing, petition held not subject to special demurrer for failure to allege for what purpose or in what capacity plaintiff was crossing.

7. Railroads \S 344(1)—Petition not demurrable for not stating reason for watchman's knowledge of danger.

In an action for injuries to plaintiff, struck by a train when crossing, at the direction of watchman, the tracks a short distance from the highway crossing, petition alleging that watchman had reason to know that plaintiff was near the end of standing cars which were going to be moved, and that he was in a place of danger, was not demurrable for failure to allege reason why watchman knew.

8. Railroads \S 344(1)—Petition held to allege authority of watchman to give directions to cross.

In action for injuries to plaintiff, struck by a train a short distance from highway crossing, petition held sufficiently to allege the authority of a watchman to direct plaintiff to cross the tracks.

9. Railroads \S 344(1)—Petition not demurrable for failure to allege how watchman acquired knowledge.

In action for injuries to plaintiff, struck by a train a short distance from the highway crossing, petition alleging that plaintiff was directed to cross by a watchman stationed at crossing and that watchman had full knowledge of plaintiff's desire to cross held not demurrable because not alleging how watchman acquired knowledge.

10. Pleading \S 8(17)—Allegation of plaintiff's due care held not demurrable as a conclusion.

In action for injuries to plaintiff struck by a train near a highway crossing, allegation that plaintiff was exercising the utmost care and diligence for his protection held not demurrable as a conclusion.

11. Railroads \S 344(1)—Petition held not demurrable for failure to allege engineer knew of plaintiff's presence.

In action for injuries to plaintiff struck by a train near a highway crossing, petition alleging that he had been directed to go across the tracks where he did by the watchman stationed at the crossing held not demurrable for failure to allege that engineer knew of plaintiff's presence on the tracks.

12. Railroads \S 344(1)—Petition held not demurrable for failure to allege watchman knew where plaintiff would cross.

In action for injuries to plaintiff, struck by a train when attempting to cross the tracks a short distance from the highway crossing, petition alleging that plaintiff was by a watchman directed to cross held not demurrable for failure to allege knowledge of watchman as to where plaintiff would cross.

13. Railroads §344(1)—Petition held not demurrable for failure to allege watchman knew train would move.

In action for injuries to plaintiff resulting from engine striking cars and moving them against plaintiff when he was attempting to cross the tracks on direction of watchman stationed at highway crossing near by, petition held not demurrable for failure to allege that watchman knew that engine would move cars against plaintiff.

14. Railroads §344(1)—Petition held not demurrable for failure to allege how employees knew of danger.

In action for injuries to plaintiff resulting from engine striking cars and moving them against plaintiff, petition alleging that engine-man knew plaintiff was in danger and failed to give signals held not demurrable for failure to allege how the knowledge was obtained or through what employee defendant had knowledge.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; P. W. Meldrim, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by P. Rubnitz against W. D. Hines, Director General of Railroads. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The petition, so far as affected by the demurrer, was as follows:

First. That the Central of Georgia Railway Company is a railroad corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of Georgia, with its office and principal place of business in Savannah, Chatham county, Ga.

Second. Said company owns various railway tracks, connecting its main line, entering the city of Savannah, with the Ocean Steamship terminals, which tracks cross Bay street extension, in the western limits of Savannah.

Third. That Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads of the United States government, is operating and controlling the system of railway owned by the Central of Georgia Railway Company.

Fourth. The tracks of defendant at the second Bay street crossing, west of West Broad street, run north and south, Bay street running east and west. Bay street is a public street of the city of Savannah. Just before reaching the crossing of Bay street, the western of the two tracks divide, one branch running on the eastern, and the other branch on the western side of the aforesaid tracks, and all three tracks enter the Ocean Steamship terminals; also just prior to the Bay street crossing the eastern of the two tracks divide, one branch running to the northeast, and, after crossing Bay street extension, it subdivides into other tracks. At the point where petitioner was struck there are eight tracks.

Fifth. On the afternoon of February 22, 1918, about 4:30 o'clock, petitioner approached the said crossing of the defendant company. The watchman, whose name petitioner does not know and cannot ascertain, but whose name is well known to the defendant company, was present and saw petitioner walk northward beside the eastern track just north of Bay street. After he had walked on the eastern side of the tracks, from 100 to 125 feet north of the Bay street crossing, an engine of the defendant company approached from the south and pushed two cars upon the third track from the west, which it left standing, with the northern end thereof about 100 or 125 feet north of Bay street crossing.

Sixth. Petitioner remained standing on the eastern side of the track aforesaid. Immediately after the engine had left the cars thus standing, it moved back towards the south and crossed the Bay street crossing. The watchman in charge of the crossing, whose duties were to protect persons using the crossing, was then standing upon the crossing in full view of petitioner.

Seventh. Petitioner had waited until the engine had moved the cars across the crossing and the same had become stationary, and the engine had moved back towards the south. He was exercising the utmost care and diligence for his protection.

Eighth. While petitioner was thus standing upon the eastern side of the track aforesaid, and out of danger, the watchman who was then standing upon the crossing motioned to the petitioner with his flag towards the left, saying to petitioner, "Go on across."

Ninth. Petitioner does not know what authority the watchman had to direct him to cross the tracks at any point other than the crossing, or whether he had any authority. The watchman did, in fact, exercise such authority, and had done so for nine years. The watchman's express authority cannot be ascertained by petitioner, but is well known to the defendant. Petitioner charges that the watchman had full knowledge of his desire to cross the tracks and of his presence upon the tracks. Petitioner started to cross the tracks and was upon the tracks at his express direction and with his full knowledge.

Tenth. After receiving the signal aforesaid, petitioner started across the tracks, in plain view of the watchman, and with his full knowledge and consent, and after petitioner had gotten to the track upon which the stationary cars were standing, and was upon the same, then being within 5 or 10 feet of the northern end of the cars, the engine of the defendant company moved northward across the Bay street crossing, struck the stationary cars suddenly and with great violence, knocking them upon petitioner and knocking petitioner to the ground. The cars were struck with such violence by the locomotive of the defendant that both trucks of one car ran over petitioner. The wheels of the car ran over petitioner's right leg just below the knee, so crushing and mangleing it that it had to be amputated.

Eleventh. The defendant company, through its watchman, knew that petitioner was crossing the tracks. He had reason to know that petitioner was near the end of the standing cars aforesaid, that he was in a place of danger, and that the movement of the cars northward would strike petitioner to his injury and damage.

Twelfth. A part of the duty of said watchman is to signal persons across the railroad crossing when the crossing is clear of trains or cars. Other duties performed by the said watchman are to signal trains across the street crossing, and to stop the same before crossing the street crossing; and the said watchman knew that, if he permitted the locomotive to move northward upon the track where the stationary cars were standing, and where petitioner was crossing, such movement would in all probability inflict injury upon petitioner.

Thirteenth. The agents and servants of the defendant company in charge of the engine at the time and place, whose names are unknown to petitioner and cannot be ascertained by him, but are well known to the defendant, approached the said crossing without ringing any bell, sounding any warning, or giving any other notice to any persons who might be upon the crossing, or who might be in danger, with the knowledge of the defendant or its watchman; and petitioner charges that, if such notice had been given of its purpose to cross said crossing, petitioner would have been enabled to avoid injury.

Fourteenth. The defendant company, through its crossing watchman, did a careless and negligent thing in directing petitioner across the tracks of the defendant company at a place other than a crossing, and knew that he was directing petitioner into a place of grave danger, and knew that after having done so that he should exercise commensurate care to avoid injury to petitioner.

Fifteenth. The defendant company had no person stationed upon the north end of the stationary cars, either to warn persons who might be upon the track of danger, or to signal to the engineer of the presence of such persons, so that he might stop the engine.

Sixteenth. The watchman in charge of the crossing, whose duties required that he should signal the crews in charge of the locomotive and trains to cross the street, although knowing that petitioner was crossing the tracks of the defendant company, nevertheless permitted the engine to cross the Bay street crossing, with result that the said locomotive struck the cars to petitioner's injury and damage.

Seventeenth. The said crossing watchman, whose duties required that he should stop engines and trains from crossing the street if occasion required, although he knew petitioner was crossing the tracks aforesaid, negligently failed to stop the said train, but permitted the same to move across the street, to petitioner's injury and damage.

Eighteenth. The defendant company would have avoided injury to petitioner if its crossing watchman had not motioned petitioner and directed him to cross the tracks at the time and place, and would also have avoided injury to petitioner if he had warned petitioner of the approach of the engine towards the stationary cars, and if the engineer had rung a bell or sounded a warning as the engine approached the Bay street crossing, and if the crossing watchman had not permitted the engineer in charge of the engine to cross the street and strike the cars. If the defendant company had sounded any warning whatever of the approach of the said engine to the said crossing, or if the crossing watchman had given petitioner any warning whatever of its approach, petitioner would not have been injured.

Nineteenth. Petitioner's injuries are due entirely to the fault and negligence of the defendant company for the following reasons, to wit:

(1) Because the crossing watchman directed petitioner to cross the tracks of the defendant company at a time when the watchman knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care should have known, that petitioner's safety would be endangered.

(2) Because the crossing watchman knew petitioner's danger in crossing the tracks of the defendant company where he had been directed by the watchman aforesaid, and directed the engineer in charge of the locomotive to cross the street and permitted him to strike the cars aforesaid.

(3) Because the crossing watchman, knowing of petitioner's danger in crossing the tracks, failed to stop the locomotive before it had crossed the street and before it struck the cars aforesaid.

(4) Because the watchman, knowing of petitioner's presence upon the tracks, failed to give any warning whatever of his approaching danger, which warning the watchman could easily have given.

(5) The defendant company was negligent because its employees in charge of the locomotive permitted its engine to approach a public street crossing without sounding a bell, blowing a whistle or sounding any warning to apprise persons upon the crossing, or petitioner in a place of danger, known to the defendant, of the approach of the said engine and of the danger to petitioner.

(6) In suddenly and without warning striking the cars and injuring petitioner.

(7) In failing to have upon the northern end of said cars an employee who could have warned petitioner or notified the engineer of his dangerous position in time to stop the engine and avoid injury to petitioner.

(8) The defendant is guilty of negligence per se in crossing the street without sounding a bell, or other warning, as prescribed by law.

Defendant demurred specially to the petition on the following grounds:

(3) Because it is not alleged or shown for what purpose or in what capacity the plaintiff was crossing the railroad tracks at the place where he was injured.

(4) To the eleventh paragraph of the petition because it is not shown why the watchman had reason to know that petitioner was near the end of the standing cars and was in a place of danger.

(5) To subdivision (1) of the nineteenth paragraph because the same is ambiguous and uncertain in that it charges both actual and implied notice of the danger of the plaintiff, and defendant is not advised upon which theory the plaintiff relies.

(6) To paragraph 9 thereof because it appears from the allegations of the petition that the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury was due to his going upon and across the several yard tracks of defendant, not at a public or private crossing, while the switching and movement of cars was in progress on said tracks; it being alleged in the petition that plaintiff went upon and across the switching tracks in obedience to the direction of a crossing watchman of defendant at the Bay street extension crossing, but it not being alleged in the petition that said watchman had any authority so to direct the plaintiff, or that said watchman in giving said direction was acting within the scope of his authority from this defendant.

(7) To the allegation of the ninth paragraph of the petition which alleges that "the watchman did in fact exercise such authority and had done so for nine years," because it is not alleged when, where, how, under what circumstances, or for what purpose said watchman had previously during nine years directed petitioner to cross said tracks at any point other than the public crossing where the watchman was employed.

(8) To the ninth paragraph of the petition, which charges that the watchman had full knowledge of plaintiff's desire to cross the track because it is not alleged for what purpose plaintiff desired to cross the track at a place other than the public crossing, or when or how defendant's watchman acquired such knowledge of plaintiff's desire to cross the track.

(9) To the seventh paragraph, which alleged that the petitioner was exercising the utmost care and diligence for his protection, on the ground that the same is the mere conclusion of the pleader.

(10) To paragraphs 13, 15, 18, and to subdivisions 5, 6, 7, and 8 of the nineteenth paragraph, because it is not alleged that defendant's engineer in charge of the movement of said engine had any knowledge of plaintiff's presence on said track in a position of danger or any reason to anticipate that he would be injured by the switching of said cars.

(11) To paragraphs 10, 11, 12, 14, 16, 17, and 19:

(a) Because it is not alleged or shown that defendant's watchman knew when he directed plaintiff to cross said tracks alleged that plaintiff would cross so near to the standing cars upon the tracks as to be struck and injured when the engine moved upon or coupled to them.

(b) Because it is not alleged or shown that the watchman knew when he directed plaintiff to cross the tracks as alleged that the engine which was moving on said tracks would strike the two stationary cars (which had just been left on said tracks as set forth in paragraphs 5, 6, and 7) with such violence as to suddenly cause said standing cars to be knocked over and upon the plaintiff while he was crossing the tracks at a distance of 5 to 10 feet therefrom as alleged in paragraph 10.

(12) To subdivision 5 of paragraph 19, which alleged that petitioner was in a place of danger known to said defendant because it is not alleged how the defendant knew that the plaintiff was in a place of danger or through what agent, officer, or employee defendant had such knowledge.

(13) To the allegations of paragraphs 13, 15, 16, 17, and 18, and to subdivisions 6, 7, and 8 of paragraph 19 of the petition, because no actionable negligence as to the plaintiff is alleged in said paragraphs against this defendant.

—Statement by editor.

H. W. Johnson, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error.

O'Neal & Kravitch and Oliver & Oliver, all of Savannah, for defendant in error.

STEPHENS, J. [1] 1. The allegations in a petition are sufficient to charge the defendant with having wantonly injured the plaintiff after his perilous position as a trespasser upon the defendant's tracks had become known to the servants of the defendant operating and controlling the movements of an approaching train, where the petition alleges that the plaintiff, in approaching the defendant's railroad tracks at a public crossing, detoured and attempted to cross the defendant's tracks at a place near the crossing in the switchyards of the defendant, and that the plaintiff's presence there was known to the defendant's watchman stationed at the crossing, whose duty it was to signal the defendant's trains and thereby control their movements and to cause them to stop when necessary; that the watchman signaled to the plaintiff to cross in front of some box cars of a shifting train which had come to a stop, thus assuring him that he could cross the tracks in safety; that the plaintiff in thus attempting to cross was suddenly put in a perilous situation by a sudden starting of the train and was knocked down and run over and injured; and that such perilous situation of the plaintiff was known to the watchman.

[2, 3] 2. Although an allegation in the petition that the watchman when he directed the plaintiff to cross the tracks of the defendant knew or in the exercise of ordinary care should have known that the plaintiff's safety would be endangered is subject to special demurrer as being duplicitous, such defect is immaterial, since the petition elsewhere unequivocally charges that the watchman knew of the plaintiff's presence in the switchyard and of his perilous situation when attempting to cross the tracks, and clearly seeks to recover alone upon the theory that the plaintiff's presence in the switchyard and his dangerous and perilous position were known to those operating and controlling the train, and does not seek to recover upon the ground that his presence or perilous position could have been known by the exercise of due care upon the part of those operating and controlling the train.

[4] 3. Although a failure to observe statutory requirements as to duties required of those in charge of a train when approaching a crossing is not negligence per se as to one not at the crossing, yet a failure to perform any of the acts required by the statute may, independently of the statute, under the circumstances of the particular case, amount to negligence. Where a trespasser on the tracks of a railroad company is in a perilous situation a short distance beyond a crossing, and such perilous situation has become known to those operating the train, a failure on the part of the railroad company to ring a bell or to give warning to the trespasser or to perform any act which happens to be required by the statute may nevertheless at the time and place be negligence as a matter of fact as respects the trespasser.

[5] 4. In a suit for damages alleged to have been caused by the negligence of a particular railroad company brought against Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads of the United States government, the petition, which alleges that he is operating and controlling a certain named railroad company, sufficiently alleges negligence against the defendant when it alleges negligence on the part of the railroad company.

[8-14] 5. The petition was not subject to any of the other special grounds of demurrer interposed.

6. The motion to dismiss the plaintiff's case because of no process against the defendant not being based upon fact, was properly dismissed.

Judgment affirmed.

YOUNG-JONES HARDWARE CO. v. DEWEY. (No. 11823.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2, March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error \S 1015(3) — Opinion of judge who did not preside at trial on motion for new trial does not have same weight as in other cases.

Where the judge who heard the motion for a new trial was not the judge who presided at the trial of the case, the rule with reference to the weight of the opinion of the trial judge upon the facts does not have the same broad application. Monahan v. National Realty Co., 4 Ga. App. 681(8), 62 S. E. 127; Ford v. Harris, 4 Ga. App. 467, 61 S. E. 881.

2. Sales \S 168½(4) — Right of buyer to "return" not exercised by notifying seller.

Where a contract gives the purchaser of personalty sold under an express warranty the right upon compliance with specified conditions, to return it to the seller, a mere notice to the latter that the property is held subject to his order is not a compliance with the terms of the contract. Nor was a statement by the purchaser that "the machine was down at his farm and that he [the seller] could go down there and get it" a compliance with the terms of the contract to "return" the machine to the seller. Malsby v. Young, 104 Ga. 205(3), 30 S. E. 854; Case Threshing Machine Co. v. Cook, 7 Ga. App. 635, 67 S. E. 890.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Return.]

3. Sales \S 168½(3) — If buyer retains property beyond time allowed for trial, sale is absolute.

Where, in a contract of sale of a machine, it was stipulated that the purchaser should have until a definite time to try the machine, in order to determine if it came up to the express warranty, the definite time of trial was of the essence of the contract, and if the purchaser retained possession of the machine beyond the time limited, this amounted to an approval of the machine and made the sale absolute. O'Donnell v. Wing, 121 Ga. 720, 49 S. E. 720; International Filter Co. v. La Grange Ice & Fuel Co., 22 Ga. App. 167, 95 S. E. 736.

4. New trial \S 70 — Improperly granted when verdict demanded.

Upon a review of all the evidence the verdict for the plaintiff, which was directed by the trial judge, was demanded, and the judge who heard the motion for a new trial erred in granting another trial.

NICHOLS v. ATLANTIC ICE & COAL CORPORATION. (No. 12176.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2, March 26, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Master and servant \S 204(1) — Injury from known defect in machinery not actionable.

Where suit is brought by a servant against his master for injuries resulting from defective machinery, it must appear, before there can be a recovery, that the servant injured did not know, and had not equal means of knowing, of the defective condition of the machinery alleged to have caused his injury, and by the exercise of ordinary care could not have known thereof. Civ. Code 1910, § 3131.

2. Master and servant \S 217(19) — Risk of operating rip-saw with knowledge of defects and lack of helper assumed.

It affirmatively appearing, from the allegations in the petition, that the alleged defect in the rip-saw, and the insufficient assistance constituting the ground of negligence for which the damages were claimed, were not only known but fully realized by the plaintiff, and that, notwithstanding this knowledge and realization, he undertook the risk of operation, it must follow that he assumed the risk of any danger consequent to such operation, and was therefore not entitled to recover damages. Flury v. Hightower, etc., Co., 132 Ga. 300,

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by J. E. Nichols against the Atlantic Ice & Coal Corporation. Judgment dismissing the petition on demurrer, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Nichols sued the Atlantic Ice & Coal Corporation for damages on account of an injury alleged to have been received while he was running a ripsaw for the defendant at its plant in Atlanta. The allegations of his petition are substantially as follows: Except in a general way, he was unfamiliar with the operation of ripsaws, and did not know when they were in a defective condition. The ripsaw which he was operating was defective, in that it had no shield over it for the protection of any one who might be operating it, and also had a wobble or kink in it, which caused it to wobble when it was being used. While he knew of this defective condition and knew that it was difficult to saw wood with the ripsaw in that condition, he did not know that it was dangerous. He had a helper employed to assist him in the operation of the saw, but the day before he was injured this helper was taken away from him by the defendant, and on the day of the injury he was ordered to saw a board about four inches wide and about three-quarters of an inch thick with the saw, and, having no helper with him, it was necessary for him to hold both ends of the board and work the board through the saw, and while he was engaged in doing this the wobble or kink in the saw caused it to catch and jerk up the board, thus catching his hand in the saw and cutting off his fingers. The specific negligence alleged was: First, that the defendant did not provide the saw with a shield; second, that the plaintiff had been put to work with this saw in its defective and dangerous condition without proper warning; third, that the plaintiff's helper was taken away over his protest at a time when the services of the helper would have prevented the accident; and, fourth, that the plaintiff was not provided with a safe place and safe instrument for work.

A demurrer was filed on the following grounds: First, no cause of action is set forth; second, the plaintiff was injured by an assumed risk; third, that the petition does not allege that the plaintiff did not know of the defective condition of the saw and had not equal opportunity with the master of knowing thereof; fourth, that the petition discloses that the plaintiff did know of the defective condition of the saw, and with this knowledge assumed the risk of its condition; and, fifth, that the petition discloses that the plaintiff knew that his helper had been removed and that the removal of the helper increased the danger in the work, and, with the knowledge of such increased danger, he nevertheless continued at the work, and therefore assumed the risk of such increased danger. The demurrer was sustained and the petition dismissed, and the plaintiff excepted.

TUGGLE v. FISK RUBBER CO. OF NEW YORK. (No. 11752.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Appeal and error \S 302(3)—Ground of motion for new trial, complaining of admission of certain contract, not considered.

A ground of a motion for a new trial, assigning error in the admission in evidence over defendant's objection of "a certain contract dated November 13, 1917," cannot be considered on appeal.

2. Evidence \S 178(2)—Copies of invoices admissible, when defendant given notice to produce originals, and they had been destroyed.

Copies of sale invoices accompanying the goods involved in a suit were admissible on behalf of plaintiff, where defendant had been served with notice to produce the originals, and it appeared that they had been destroyed by fire.

3. Appeal and error \S 882(8), 1053(3)—Admission of evidence held harmless, where adverse party testified to same matter, and judge limited issues.

On the question of whether goods shipped defendant were sold or only consigned, the admission of evidence of orders showing other recent purchases did not require a reversal, where defendant testified to such purchases, and the judge clearly limited the jury to the one definite issue in dispute.

W. S. Dillon, of Atlanta, and L. B. Norton, of Lithonia, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, P. J. Certain goods shipped by the plaintiff to the defendant were destroyed by fire without fault on the part of the defendant. The sole issue on the trial was whether the goods had been sold or consigned. If they were sold, the defendant was liable for the purchase price as sued for; but, if consigned, the plaintiff could not recover. The jury found for the plaintiff. Held,

1. The verdict was authorized by the evidence.

[1] 2. A ground of the motion for a new trial assigning error as follows:

"Because movant alleges the court erred in admitting in evidence, over defendant's objection, a certain contract dated November 13, 1917"

—cannot, under previous rulings, be considered by this court. Bacon v. Dannenberg Co., 24 Ga. App. 540, 541 (8), 101 S. E. 699; Webb v. Slaton, 24 Ga. App. 188 (1), 100 S. E. 227.

[2] 3. The plaintiff was entitled to introduce copies of the sale invoices accompanying the goods involved in the suit, after having served defendant with notice to produce the originals, it appearing that the originals had been destroyed by fire.

[3] 4. The ground complaining of the introduction of such copies is therefore without merit. Whether or not the court erred in allowing the introduction of original orders, showing other recent previous purchases by the defendant from the plaintiff of similar articles (see Jones v. Teasley, 105 S. E. 46 [3], 47), the defendant having himself testified to just such purchases (see Swift Mfg. Co. v. Cunningham, 24 Ga. App. 170 [5], 100 S. E. 225; Copeland v. Ruff, 20 Ga. App. 217 [1], 92 S. E. 955), and the judge by his charge having clearly limited the jury to the one definite issue in dispute, the verdict will not be set aside on the ground that the court erred in allowing a witness for the plaintiff to testify with respect to the orders and invoices.

Judgment affirmed.

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Judges \S 45—Disqualified when wife's grandmother and grandmother of party's officer were sisters.

Where the grandmothers of a judge's wife and an officer and stockholder of the plaintiff corporation were sisters, the judge and the officer were related by affinity within the third degree, under the rule of the canon law, and the judge was disqualified.

2. Judgment \S 261, 359—Motion to arrest and to vacate improperly denied, when judge disqualified.

Where defendant's counsel denied the judge's qualification and stated the facts, which were not controverted, but the judge proceeded with the case, a motion to arrest, vacate, or set aside the judgment, supported by uncontroverted proof, should have been granted.

3. Judgment \S 336—Motion to set aside judgment held not to require brief of evidence.

A motion to set aside the judgment in a foreclosure suit, where the plea had been stricken and no verdict was rendered or was required under Civ. Code 1910, \S 3283; was not in terms or effect a motion for new trial based upon a verdict, and no brief of the evidence was required.

JENKINS, P. J. [1] 1. Where a judge is related by affinity to one who is an officer and stockholder of a plaintiff corporation, by reason of the grandmother of the judge's wife and the grandmother of such officer having been sisters, the relationship is in the third degree, under the rule of the canon law, and falls within the inhibition of section 4642 of the Civil Code (1910). Such a judge is disqualified from sitting in a case between the corporation and an individual defendant, except with the consent of both parties at interest. Short v. Mathis, 101 Ga. 287, 288, 28 S. E. 918; Smith v. State, 2 Ga. App. 574, 575, 59 S. E. 311; Olliff v. State, 1 Ga. App. 553, 555, 57 S. E. 941.

[2] 2. In the instant case the plaintiff foreclosed a mortgage on realty and on the trial of the case the defendant's counsel denied the qualification of the judge, and, in support of his objection, stated in his place the facts of disqualification, which were not controverted; but the judge proceeded thereafter to hear the case and to enter a judgment of foreclosure against the defendant and the defendant at the same term of court filed a motion to arrest, vacate, or set aside the judgment upon the ground of such disqualification, and supported his allegations by uncontroverted proof at a hearing, after due notice to the opposite party. Held, the court erred in overruling the motion and in failing to set aside the judgment thus complained of. Gillespie v. Farkas, 19 Ga. App. 158, 91 S. E. 244; State Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Walton, 142 Ga. 765, 766 (3), 83 S. E. 656; *Shuford v. [3] 3. While "a motion to set aside a verdict, based on matters not appearing on the face of the record, is in effect a motion for a new trial, and is subject to all the rules of law governing such motions," so as to require a brief of the evidence (Ga. Ry. & Electric Co. v. Hamer, 1 Ga. App. 673, 58 S. E. 54), yet where, as in the instant case, the motion was neither in terms nor effect a motion for new trial based upon a verdict, but was a motion to set aside a judgment in a case where the plea had been stricken and where no verdict had been rendered or was required (Ray v. Atlanta Banking Co., 110 Ga. 305, 306 (4), 35 S. E. 117; Civil Code 1910, § 3283), a brief of the evidence was unnecessary.

MAYO v. BOWEN. (No. 12059.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Deeds §111—Conveyance held by the tract and not by the acre.

A deed described the land conveyed as follows: "All that certain tract or parcel of land situate, lying, and being in the 1192d district, G. M., of Toombs county, Georgia, containing 56 acres, more or less, and bounded as follows: On the north by lands of W. Y. Bowen, on the east by lands of D. C. Newton & Son, on the south by land of W. J. Hall, and on the west by lands of Mrs. M. M. James." Held, that this was a conveyance of land by the tract, and not by the acre. Kendall v. Wells, 126 Ga. 343, 55 S. E. 41.

2. Provisions of statute; "more or less."

In a conveyance of land by the tract the qualifying words "more or less" "will cover any deficiency not so gross as to justify the suspicion of willful deception or mistake amounting to fraud; in this event the deficiency is apportionable." Civil Code 1910, § 4122; Estes v. Odom, 91 Ga. 600, 18 S. E. 355.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, More or Less.]

3. Vendor and purchaser §341(4)—Whether deficiency justifies suspicion of willful deception or mistake is generally for the jury.

Whether or not a deficiency in the quantity of land sold by the tract, with the qualifying words "more or less," is so "gross as to justify the suspicion of willful deception or mistake amounting to fraud" is, as a general rule, a question of fact to be decided by the jury in the light of all the circumstances of the particular case, and not one of law for determination by the court. Perkins Mfg. Co. v. Williams, 98 Ga. 388, 25 S. E. 556; Estes v. Odom, supra.

4. Vendor and purchaser §341(4)—Deficiency of 23½ acres in tract described as 56 acres held question for jury.

The deed in the instant case described the quantity of land as being "56 acres, more or less." The survey of the land conveyed disclosed the fact that there were 32½ acres, a deficiency of 23½ acres. It was a question for the jury whether, under all the circumstances of the particular case, this deficiency was so gross as to justify the suspicion of fraud, in which event the vendee would be entitled to an apportionment of the price according to relative value. Owens v. Durham, 9 Ga. App. 179, 70 S. E. 989; Bryan v. Yates, 7 Ga. App. 712, 67 S. E. 1048.

5. Vendor and purchaser §178—Rules as to deficiency in acreage applies whether conveyance is for life, in remainder, or in fee.

The rules of law stated above are applicable to all conveyances of land, whether the estate conveyed in the land described is for life, in remainder, or in fee simple.

6. Verdict improperly directed.

Under the facts in evidence the case falls within the general rule, and the trial court committed error in directing a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount of the suit.

HALL v. GRANT et al. (No. 11810.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 26, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Sales \S 411—Petition in buyer's action for breach of contract held to state cause of action.

A petition which alleged a contract of purchase containing a provision that time should be of the essence thereof, and which alleged a part payment of the purchase money in cash and the execution of a promissory note for the balance, a tender of payment of the note and a refusal by the defendants to accept payment, a failure and refusal of the defendants to deliver to the plaintiff the personalty bought, and consequent damage to plaintiff, set forth a cause of action as against a general demurrer.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. Sales \S 196—Provision that time should be of essence held waived, when tender after time fixed was refused on different ground.

Where a contract for the sale of a truck provided for part payment in cash and the remainder on a specified date, a note being executed, but, after maturity of the note, the buyer tendered payment and the sellers refused to accept payment, saying that they did not have any truck at that time, but would deliver one later, and that the note could then be paid, a provision that time should be of the essence of the contract was waived.

Error from City Court of Albany; Clayton Jones, Judge.

Action by Alfred Hall against L. P. Grant and others. Judgment dismissing the petition on demurrer, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The petition alleged that the plaintiff traded with the defendants, a partnership, on or about March 15, 1920, for a described truck, giving in payment a secondhand truck and his note for the difference between the price of the new and the old truck, the defendants contracting to deliver the new truck to plaintiff on or about April 15, 1920; that the plaintiff tendered to the defendants the sum due on the promissory note, and that the defendants refused to accept the same, and refused to deliver the new truck to the plaintiff in accordance with the terms of the trade. The suit was for damages because of this action on the part of the defendants. The petition was amended, so as to allege that the defendants still retained the secondhand truck mentioned and the note, and had never tendered or offered to return them to plaintiff and that a tender of payment of the note was made by the plaintiff to one of the members of the partnership on April 22, 1920, and that payment was refused; the said member stating that he did not have a truck at that time to deliver, but would deliver one later, and then the note could be paid.

The defendants demurred generally and specially to the petition, and on the hearing thereon tendered in evidence, without objection, the contract signed by the plaintiff on March 15, 1920, for the new truck, in which it was stated that the plaintiff had that day received the new truck traded for, describing it, and that a portion of the purchase price was paid in cash and the remainder would become due on April 15th following, and which contained, among other provisions, a provision that the title to said new truck should remain in the defendants until paid for, time being of the essence of the contract. The trial judge sustained the general demurrer and dismissed the petition.

Milner & Farkas, of Albany, for plaintiff in error.

Lippitt & Burt, of Albany, for defendants in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). It is a well-settled rule of law that for every breach of a contract the wrongdoer must respond to the injured party in damages to the extent and in satisfaction of the injury received.

"In statutes or other legal instruments giving compensation for 'damages,' the word always refers to some actionable wrong—some loss, injury, or harm which results from the unlawful act, omission, or negligence of another." Austin v. Augusta Terminal Ry. Co., 108 Ga. 874, 34 S. E. 853, 47 L. R. A. 755.

"Where the understanding of the parties to a contract are concurrent, and one is ready and willing, and offers to perform, and the other is not, the first is discharged from the performance of his part, and may maintain an action against the other." Biggers v. Pace, 5 Ga. 172.

"For failure of the seller to deliver, the buyer's form of remedy is an action for breach of contract for nondelivery. * * * In general, the allegations, in an ordinary case for nondelivery, are the making of the contract whereby the defendant sold, or agreed to sell and deliver, to the plaintiff certain goods, to be delivered (at a certain place and time) for the payment of a certain price; that plaintiff duly performed, or was and is ready to perform, his part of the contract; that defendant did not deliver the goods, and that plaintiff has been damaged thereby." 23 Standard Ency. Proc. 289.

[2] A reading of the contract in question discloses that under its terms an immediate delivery of the new truck was contemplated upon it being signed. But the petition alleged that no delivery of such truck had ever been made. The inclusion of the provision that time should be of the essence of the contract was evidently based upon the proposition of immediate delivery of the property therein described upon the signing thereof. The petition, as amended, admits that the note was not paid on the date when due, but alleges that shortly thereafter the plaintiff tendered payment of the note to the defendants, and that the defendants declined acceptance of payment at that time, "stating that they did not have a truck at that time to deliver but would deliver one later and then the note could be paid." We are of the opinion that this is an allegation of waiver on the part of the defendants of the provision in the contract that time should be of the essence of the contract. The petition alleged that the plaintiff had tendered to the defendants the sum due on the note and the defendants refused to accept the same.

[1] We are of the opinion that the petition as amended set forth a cause of action as against the general demurrer, and that the trial judge erred in sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the petition.

Judgment reversed.

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Action \Leftrightarrow 50(6) — Pleading \Leftrightarrow 64(2) — Petition by vendor against vendee for fraud held duplicitous, multifarious, and to contain distinct causes of action.

In a vendor's action against the vendees for fraud inducing the sale, petition held subject to demurrer, under Civ. Code 1910, § 5631, as duplicitous, multifarious, and containing distinct causes of action, where it was against both defendants for fraud, against one of them as a tenant in common, and, by amendment, against one of them as partner, for violation of the fiduciary relationship.

2. Partnership \Leftrightarrow 213(1) — Petition held insufficient to show partnership as between parties.

Under Civ. Code 1910, §§ 3156, 3157, relative to partnerships, a petition alleging that plaintiff and one of the defendants were partners in the purchase of real estate, and alleging several uncompleted transactions relating to the business of the partnership, and one transaction in another state, but not alleging any contract of partnership, was insufficient to show a partnership between the parties.

Maddox, McCamy & Shumate, of Dalton, for plaintiff in error.

C. D. McCutchen and F. K. McCutchen, both of Dalton, for defendants in error.

HILL, J. Stroup sued J. A. Crawford and W. S. Crawford for $250 alleging, in substance, the following facts:

Plaintiff and defendants bought a described house and lot in Dalton as tenants in common. While plaintiff was in Florida, the defendant W. S. Crawford wired him, asking for the lowest price for his interest in said house and lot. After some correspondence he offered to sell for $1,500, and this offer was accepted. The deed was made to J. A. Crawford. Plaintiff charges that J. A. Crawford and W. S. Crawford misled and deceived him as to the purpose in purchasing his interest in the lot. He thought, and had reason to believe, that the lot was desired as a house for W. S. Crawford, and he would not have sold it to J. A. Crawford for the purpose of speculation. Plaintiff alleges that, when W. S. Crawford offered to pay him the $1,500 for his interest in the lot, he and his father, defendant J. A. Crawford, had agreed to sell the lot for the sum of $3,500. When plaintiff and defendant J. A. Crawford bought the property, they intended to hold it as an investment, for the purpose of realizing a profit out of it. He reposed confidence in the honesty of defendant J. A. Crawford, and, because of their joint ownership of the property, it was J. A. Crawford's duty to fully acquaint him with all the facts in relation to the sale of his interest in the property; but both defendants concealed the facts from him, intending to defraud him, and did by these deceitful means defraud him of the sum of $250.

The plaintiff amended his petition, alleging that J. A. Crawford and himself were partners in the purchase of real estate, alleging several transactions relating to the business of the partnership, which were not completed, and one transaction in the purchase and sale of a piece of real estate by them in the state of Tennessee. On general and special demurrer the plaintiff was required by the court to amend his petition by "alleging whether or not there was an express contract of copartnership, and whether verbal or written," and, on his refusal to do so, the court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the petition; and the plaintiff excepted. Held, there was no error in the judgment sustaining the demurrer.

[1] 1. (a) The original petition was against both defendants, for fraud and deceit, (b) and against one of the defendants as a tenant in common. (c) The amendment was against only one of the defendants as a partner in real estate transactions, and charged fraud arising from a violation of his fiduciary relationship. (d) The petition was therefore subject to the objection pointed out by the demurrer, that it contained distinct causes of action and against different parties, and was duplicitous and multifarious. Civil Code (1910) § 5631; Price v. Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co., 136 Ga. 175, 71 S. E. 4; Orr v. Cooledge, 117 Ga. 195 (3), 43 S. E. 527.

[2] 2. The allegations of the petition as amended were wholly insufficient to show a partnership inter se. Civil Code (1910) §§ 3156, 3157.

Judgment affirmed.

DUNAWAY v. J. B. COLT CO. (No. 11787.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2, March 26, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Sales \S 340—On buyer's refusal to accept seller may retain goods for buyer and sue for price.

Where an executory contract of purchase and sale has been breached prior to the delivery of the goods, by reason of the purchaser's anticipatory refusal to accept them, the seller, under section 4131 of the Civil Code of 1910, has the choice of one of three remedies: (1) He "may retain them and recover the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time and place for delivery"; or (2) "he may sell the property, acting for this purpose as agent for the vendee, and recover the difference between the contract price and the price on resale," provided he does so after notice to the vendee and within a reasonable time (Robson & Evans v. Hale & Sons, 139 Ga. 753, 755, 78 S. E. 177); or (3) "he may store or retain the property for the vendee and sue him for the entire price" (Maddox v. Washburn-Crosby Mill Co., 135 Ga. 539, 69 S. E. 821; Southern Flour & Grain Co. v. St. Louis Grain Co., 11 Ga. App. 401, 403, 75 S. E. 439).

2. Sales \S 342—Seller's tender after buyer's cancellation held not waiver of right to retain for buyer and recover price.

Where a purchaser of goods renounces the contract of sale prior to their delivery, by notifying the seller to cancel the order, and the seller then delivers the goods to a railroad company for transportation to the purchaser, and, after their arrival in the railroad depot at destination, the purchaser still refuses to accept the goods, and the seller then has them returned to the place of shipment and there holds them in a warehouse for the purchaser, such a mere ineffective tender on the part of the seller would not, ipso facto, amount to a waiver on his part of his rights, under the Code section cited, and he would ordinarily be still entitled to pursue one of the remedies there provided, and to sue for the purchase price of the goods thus stored or retained for the purchaser.

3. Trial \S 141—Verdict for plaintiff properly directed when case as established was undisputed.

There was no evidence of any probative value tending in any way to dispute the plaintiff's case as established by its testimony, and the court therefore did not err in directing a verdict in the plaintiff's favor.

Error from Superior Court, Wilkes County; B. F. Walker, Judge.

Action by the J. B. Colt Company against W. L. Dunaway. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The J. B. Colt Company sued W. L. Dunaway for the purchase price of certain property stored or retained for him. The undisputed evidence shows the following facts: On June 13, 1918, defendant gave an order for the goods in question, which order the plaintiff accepted on June 17, 1918. On June 29, 1918, the defendant notified the plaintiff that owing to war conditions, he would not take the goods, and to consider his order as canceled. On July 17, 1918, the defendant shipped the goods by railroad from its factory at Chicago, Ill., addressed to the defendant at Tignall, Ga. The goods arrived at destination on August 9, 1918, but the defendant refused to accept them. On the plaintiff's instructions they were returned to the plaintiff at Chicago, and there placed in a warehouse and held for the defendant.

Clement E. Sutton, of Washington, Ga., for plaintiff in error.

I. T. Irvin, Jr., of Washington, Ga., for defendant in error.

JENKINS, P. J. (after, stating the facts as above). [1] This is not a suit for the purchase price of goods sold and delivered on open account. If such were its purport, then under the facts disclosed by the record, it could not have been maintained. Maddox v. Wagner, 111 Ga. 146, 36 S. E. 609; Bridges & Murphy v. McFarland, 143 Ga. 581, 583, 85 S. E. 856; Dilman Bros. v. Patterson Produce Co., 2 Ga. App. 213, 58 S. E. 365. The nature of the present action, which is for goods stored or retained, distinguishes it from these cases and the cases of Oklahoma Vinegar Co. v. Carter, 116 Ga. 140, 146, 42 S. E. 378, 59 L. R. A. 122, 94 Am. St. Rep. 112, and Rounsaville & Bro. v. Leonard Mfg. Co., 127 Ga. 735 (4), 56 S. E. 1030. In none of the cases cited were the goods at any time stored or retained for the vendee. As was said by the Supreme Court in the Oklahoma Vinegar Co. Case, 116 Ga. 146, 42 S. E. 381, 59 L. R. A. 122, 94 Am. St. Rep. 112:

"While * * * the seller might have stored and retained the property for the buyers after notice by the buyers that they would not receive the goods, it is sufficient to say that it did not do so, but without so doing sought to recover the price agreed on. Had it done so it might have brought an action against the buyers for the entire price of the goods. On the contrary, instead of storing and retaining the goods after the notice, it delivered them to the carrier, doubtless under the well-recognized general rule that, in ordinary transactions of bargain and sale of goods, a delivery to the carrier is a delivery to the seller."

The basis of that holding was that, inasmuch as the plaintiff's petition "treated the contract as an executed one on its part," its only remedy under the facts was "an action to recover damages for the breach." In the Rounsaville Case the seller sought, by its delivery to the carrier, to treat the contract as executed on its part, and to sue for the purchase price of the goods, which the court, following the Oklahoma Vinegar Company Case, held could not be done. After the refusal of the goods, the plaintiff, in delivering to the carrier, chose to regard it solely as the defendant's agent, abandoned the goods, and, as the court said (127 Ga. 742, 56 S. E. 1033):

"They were not stored in the railroad's warehouse by the plaintiff, nor at the instance of the plaintiff. They never have been held and stored by the plaintiff for the defendants, so as to bring the facts of the case within the provisions of the statute. * * *"

The instant case is also distinguishable from that of Linder v. Cole Bros. Co., 10 Ga. App. 102, 72 S. E. 719, where the seller alleged and relied upon a delivery to the purchaser.

In the case before us, however, the plaintiff did not abandon the goods, and does not claim or stand upon a delivery, but has continuously maintained its dominion and control over them, has evidently paid all transportation and storage charges while in the hands of the railroad, and still retains for the defendant in its warehouse the identical goods ordered. The petition is planted solely on the remedy provided under section 4131 of the Civil Code for the contract price of goods stored or retained for the purchaser. The allegations and the proof conform to all the requirements of the statute in a suit of this character. American Mfg. Co. v. Champion Mfg. Co., 13 Ga. App. 552, 554, 79 S. E. 485; Southern Flour & Grain Co. v. St. Louis Grain Co., 11 Ga. App. 401, 403, 75 S. E. 439; Tuggle v. Green, 25 Ga. App. 647, 104 S. E. 85, 87.

[2, 3] It is contended, however, that the mere shipment and tender of the goods to the defendant at Tignall, 'in the plaintiff's unsuccessful effort to get the defendant to comply with his contract by accepting them, amounted to an election by the plaintiff not to store or retain the goods, and operated as a complete waiver of the right of procedure subsequently resorted to. When the defendant canceled his order and renounced his contract of purchase, such notice to the plaintiff was "not only a repudiation of the contract but also a revocation of the carrier's agency to receive them" for him. Oklahoma Vinegar Co. v. Carter, supra, quoting Unexcelled Fireworks Co. v. Polites, 130 Pa. 536, 18 Atl. 1058, 17 Am. St. Rep. 788; Rounsaville v. Leonard Mfg. Co., supra. Since the railroad company remained throughout the transaction the agent of the plaintiff, and has been continuously so treated by it in the giving of shipping instructions and in the payment of charges, the possession of the goods in the hands of the carrier was, in effect, the act of the plaintiff. The mere proposal by way of tender cannot therefore be taken as such an election of remedies as would of itself preclude the plaintiff from thereafter resorting to the remedy given it under the statute law. It would not seem reasonable and just to hold that the rights or remedies of the plaintiff would be ipso facto destroyed merely because of its tender of the goods in an effort to obtain a compliance with the terms of the contract. Such act on his part was wholly nugatory, in so far as it affected his remedies under the provisions of the Code; and no effort has been made by the defendant to show that such procedure resulted in any sort of actual injury to him. So far as the pleadings and evidence show, it was an act which neither injured the defendant nor benefited the plaintiff. In so tendering them it was not acting within the scope of its legal remedies, nor was any effort made to enforce the terms of such proposal. The doctrine of election of remedies or estoppel would not therefore seem to apply. Commercial City Bank v. Mitchell, 25 Ga. App. 838, 105 S. E. 57.

The ruling in the instant case is not in conflict with what was held in Phillips-Jones Co. v. Blackstock, 23 Ga. App. 574, 576, 99 S. E. 48, 49. There, after delivery to the carrier, the plaintiff, in ordering the return of the goods to its factory from the place of destination, lost a part of them in transit, and its evidence failed to disclose what portion was lost and what remained, so that, as was there said:

"The evidence thus fails to prove the case as laid, in that it shows that at least a portion of the goods as ordered is not now and was not at the time the suit was instituted stored for the vendee."

Judgment affirmed.

LOYD v. STATE. (No. 11843.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Jan. 28, 1921. Rehearing Denied
March 2, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Homicide \S 310(2)—Under indictment for assault with intent to murder instruction on shooting at another held not error.

Under an indictment charging an assault with intent to murder, evidence that accused, who had sworn out a warrant for another, shot prosecutor, a deputy sheriff, as he was signing a criminal recognizance for the other, but with intent only to prevent the signing and not to murder, authorized an instruction on shooting at another.

2. Criminal law \S 1177—Imposing misdemeanor or sentence under indictment for assault with intent to murder not reversible error.

Where the judge charges, in effect, that the jury shall fix a maximum and minimum sentence in event of assault with intent to murder or shooting at another, but fails to instruct them to fix such punishment if they recommend he be punished as for a misdemeanor, and the judge imposes a misdemeanor sentence, the charge to this effect cannot be complained of by accused.

3. Homicide \S 169(2)—Evidence as to what a warrant which accused had issued contained inadmissible.

In a prosecution under an indictment for assault with intent to murder, in which it was shown that accused shot prosecutor to prevent him from signing a recognizance for one whom accused had arrested, it was not error to reject evidence as to what the warrant for arrest charged.

4. Criminal law \S 815(11) — Instruction held not to ignore statement by accused.

An instruction that jury are to take the law as given by the court and apply that law to the facts as they find them, and in that sense the jury are the judges of the law and the facts, held not erroneous as ignoring the statement made by accused.

5. Criminal law \S 762(1) — Instruction held not an expression of opinion.

A charge that no one has the right to shoot a human being with a pistol unless the act is justified or excused by some rule of law held not erroneous as an expression of opinion forbidden by Pen. Code 1910, § 1058.

6. Criminal law \S 761(12) — Instruction held not to assume that accused shot prosecutor.

An instruction that no one has a right to shoot a human being with a pistol unless the act is justified or excused by some rule of law held not erroneous as assuming that accused shot prosecutor.

7. Homicide \S 310(1) — Instruction held not argumentative.

A charge that no one has a right to shoot a human being with a pistol unless the act is justified or excused by some rule of law, and that the intentional shooting and wounding of a human being, whether a white man or negro, with a pistol, is unlawful unless done under circumstances of justification or excuse, according to the principles of the Penal Code, held not argumentative.

8. Criminal law \S 761(12), 762(1)—Homicide \S 300(4, 12)—Instruction that signing a recognizance for one whom accused had arrested was no defense to shooting signer held not erroneous.

In a prosecution under an indictment for assault with intent to murder, in which it was shown that accused shot prosecutor, a deputy sheriff, as he was signing a recognizance for one for whom accused had sworn out a warrant, an instruction that signing of a bond or attempt to sign a bond as security for one under arrest is no provocation in law and will not justify the shooting of a human being with a pistol held not erroneous as cutting off right to self-defense, or as an expression of opinion, or as argumentative, or as ignoring statement made by accused, or as assuming that accused shot prosecutor.

9. Criminal law \S 815(11) — Homicide \S 293—Instruction held not erroneous as not being a fair statement of defendant's case or as ignoring statement.

In a prosecution under an indictment charging assault with intent to murder, in which it was shown that accused shot prosecutor as he was signing a recognizance for one whom accused had arrested, an instruction if jury should not find beyond a reasonable doubt defendant intentionally and unlawfully shot prosecutor, a human being, with a pistol, as alleged, or if jury have reasonable doubt of his guilt, verdict of not guilty should be returned, held not erroneous as not being a fair statement of defendant's contentions, or as ignoring defendant's statement at the trial.

10. Criminal law \S 789(8) — Instruction on reasonable doubt held not objectionable.

Charge that the state is not required to prove guilt beyond all doubt, moral and not mathematical certainty is all that can be expected in legal investigation, and the doubt of a jury to justify acquittal should be reasonable and not mere vague conjecture or possibility of innocence of accused, held not objectionable.

11. Criminal law \S 798½—Not error to give jury written forms of verdict.

It is not error for the court in a criminal case to give to the jury written forms of verdicts which they would be authorized to find.

Error from Superior Court, Bleckley County; E. D. Graham, Judge.

Tom Loyd was convicted of cheating and swindling, and he brings error. Affirmed.

The approved grounds of the amended motion for a new trial were as follows:

(2) Because the court erred in declining to admit the following testimony of the state's witness W. H. Jones, brought out on cross-examination: "Q. What was the charge in the warrant? A. Cheating and swindling. I served the warrant for cheating and swindling."

* * *

The defendant maintains before the court

that the crime with which this defendant was charged, cheating and swindling, was admissible because it shed light upon the whole transaction, that is, the negro had beat the defendant out of his money. This was the cause of the whole trouble, and should have been permitted to go to the jury for what it was worth. The negro's name was Newsome.

(3) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "As I said, you have been impaneled, gentlemen, to try the issue formed on this bill of indictment, and you have been sworn to try this case according to the evidence. The law you are required to take from the court. You are the judges of both the facts and the law in this sense: You are to take the law as given you by the court, and apply that law to the facts as you find them, and in that sense you are the judges of the law and of the facts."

The defendant excepts to this charge for the reason that the court confined the jury to a consideration of the evidence in making up their verdict, and thereby excluded from their consideration the defendant's statement. * * *

(4) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "No one has the right to shoot a human being with a pistol unless the act is justified or excused by some rule of law. The intentional shooting and wounding of a human being, whether a white man or a negro, with a pistol, is unlawful unless it is done under circumstances of justification or excuse, according to the principles of the Penal Code of this state."

The defendant excepts to this charge for the reason that the said charge was an expression of opinion by the presiding judge on the facts in the case, which is forbidden by section 1058 of the Penal Code of 1910. The defendant further excepts to the charge upon the ground that the court assumed in its charge to the jury that the defendant shot Tobe Harrell, the human being. This great question was a question for the jury to decide without any expression of opinion from the court. The charge was argumentative, and gave the contentions of the state very strongly, and ignored again the defendant's side of the case as contained in his statement. * * *

(5) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "Refusing to pay an account or debt, or the signing of a bond, or attempt to sign a bond, as security for a person under arrest, is no provocation in law, and will not under any circumstances justify or excuse the shooting and wounding of a human being with a pistol."

The defendant excepts to this charge for the reason that it cut the defendant off from his right of self-defense, and cut the defendant off from any defense whatever that he may have put up in his statement to the jury. This charge was also an expression of opinion by the court on the facts proven in the case, which is forbidden by section 1058 of the Penal Code of Georgia. The defendant further excepts to this charge because it was argumentative and stated the state's side of the case too strongly, at the same time ignoring the defendant's side of the case. The defendant excepts to the charge further because the charge assumed that the defendant shot the prosecutor in the case, a human being. * * *

(6) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "If you find beyond a reasonable doubt that in this county, within four years prior to the finding of the indictment, the defendant, Tom Loyd, unlawfully and intentionally shot and wounded Tobe Harrell, a human being, with a pistol, the following rules should control you in arriving at a verdict: If the pistol as used by the defendant was a weapon likely to produce death, and the defendant intentionally shot and wounded said Tobe Harrell with said pistol with deliberate intent to kill him, solely for the reason that said Tobe Harrell failed or refused to pay a debt or an account, or solely because the said Harrell was signing or attempting to sign a bond as surety, the defendant would be guilty of the offense of assault with intent to murder."

The defendant says that this charge is error for the same reasons assigned in the foregoing grounds. * * *

(7) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "If you should find beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is guilty of the offense of assault with intent to murder, you would not be authorized to find him guilty of the offense of unlawfully shooting at another. If, however, you should not find that the defendant is guilty of the offense of assault with intent to murder, but should find beyond a reasonable doubt that in this county, prior to the finding of the indictment, the defendant unlawfully and intentionally shot and wounded Tobe Harrell, a human being, with a pistol, within the range such pistol would carry, not in his, the said Tom Loyd's, own defense, and not under circumstances of justification according to the principles of the Penal Code of this state, he would be guilty of the offense of unlawfully shooting at another."

The defendant excepts to this charge upon the ground that there is no unlawful shooting at another in this case. According to the state's case and the contentions of the state before the jury, the defendant was guilty of the offense of assault with intent to murder, and according to the defendant's statement in the case, he was guilty of no offense whatever, but was justified. There was no middle ground, no room for a compromise verdict by the jury, and it was error for the presiding judge to instruct the jury on the law of unlawful shooting at another, because that branch of the law was not involved in this case, and it gave the jury an opportunity, which they took advantage of, of finding the defendant guilty of unlawfully shooting at another. * * *

(8) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows, to wit: "If you should not find beyond a reasonable doubt that in this county, within four years prior to the finding of the indictment, the defendant intentionally and unlawfully shot and wounded Tobe Harrell, a human being, with a pistol, as alleged, or if you have a reasonable doubt of his guilt, you should return a verdict of not guilty."

This was not a fair statement of the defendant's contentions. This charge ignored the defendant's statement. This charge was so worded that the jury could not understand it. The court should have charged the defendant's contentions in this immediate connection as stated in his statement to the jury and left it to the jury to say whether the defendant had provocation or not. The defendant contends, for all these reasons, the foregoing charge was error.

(9) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "The state, however, is not required to prove the guilt of a defendant beyond all doubt. Moral and not mathematical certainty is all that can be expected in legal investigation. The doubt of a jury to justify an acquittal should be reasonable, and not mere vague conjecture or possibility of the innocence of the accused."

The defendant excepts to this charge because the court failed to charge the jury in this connection that if they had any reasonable doubt about the defendant's guilt they should acquit, and the defendant excepts to that part of the charge, "The state, however, is not required to prove the defendant's guilt beyond all doubt."

(10) Because the verdict of the jury in said case was contrary to the following charge of the court: "Under our law, as it stands now—I refer to an act passed recently—whenever the jury finds the defendant guilty of a felony which is punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of years, and the offense is not reduced to a misdemeanor by their recommendation, it devolves upon the jury to fix the sentence in their verdict. In such cases the law requires the jury to fix a minimum and a maximum sentence; that is, in their verdict they should fix a punishment of not less than so long and not more than so long in the penitentiary of the state, stating the time that they fix. In such cases, however, you will understand that they would have to remain within the period fixed by law for the punishment of a defendant in such cases."

The defendant contends that the jury did not fix the punishment in this case. * * *

(11) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "If you find the defendant guilty of the offense of unlawfully shooting at another, and should not wish to recommend that he be punished as for a misdemeanor, then the form of your verdict should be, 'We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of unlawfully shooting at another, and fix his punishment at not less than so long and not more than so long, stating the time.' You will remember that that offense is punished by the law by confinement in the penitentiary from one to four years."

The defendant excepts to this charge for the same reason that he excepts in the foregoing ground of the amended motion for a new trial. The jury found the defendant guilty of unlawfully shooting at another, which was a compromise verdict in this case, and the court fixed the punishment in this case, and not the jury, which is contrary to the act of the Legislature of 1919 (Laws 1919, p. 387). The jury should fix the punishment in the penitentiary in a felony case, but the jury did not do it, and the judge fixed the punishment, which is forbidden by law now since the act was passed. So the charge authorizing the jury to find such a verdict is error.

(12) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "If you should find the defendant guilty of shooting at another, and wish to recommend that he be punished as for a misdemeanor, then the form of your verdict should be, 'We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of unlawful shooting at another, and recommend that he be punished as for a misdemeanor.'"

The defendant excepts to this charge for the reason that there was no middle ground in the case, and not room for a compromise verdict by the jury by finding the defendant guilty of the offense of unlawfully shooting at another.

* * *

The defendant further excepts to this charge for the reason that the court did not give the jury instructions to fix the punishment in the penitentiary, but told the jury that they could recommend that he be punished as for a misdemeanor. Under this charge, the jury accepted the invitation of the presiding judge, and recommended that he be punished as for a misdemeanor, and therefore gave the court the right to fix the punishment in this case, which is forbidden by the act of the Legislature of 1919. This defendant was charged with a felony, with assault with intent to murder, in one count, and the defendant contends that the presiding judge had no right, under the law, to give the jury an opportunity to find the defendant guilty of a lower grade of crime and to fail to fix the punishment in the penitentiary and leave it to the presiding judge to fix the punishment. * * *

(13) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows, to wit: "I have written out some forms of verdict corresponding with the charge that I have given you, and they will be handed to you, and you can select from these forms that form of verdict which coincides with your finding."

The defendant excepts to this charge for the reason that the court had no right to write the forms of the verdict for the jury on paper, and send them out with the jury in order to let the jury select from these forms the verdict which they could find. The jury should be left alone to make their verdict from their memory of what occurred on the trial of said case, and they should not be aided by any writing of the presiding judge purporting to be the form of the verdict. For these reasons the defendant assigns the charge as error.

—Statement by editor.

John R. Cooper and W. O. Cooper, Jr., both of Macon, and C. A. Weddington, of Cochran, for plaintiff in error.

W. A. Wooten, Sol. Gen., of Eastman, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. [1] 1. The evidence in this case shows conclusively that while Tobe Harrell was sitting in a chair in the sheriff's office in the courthouse preparing to sign a criminal recognizance for a man against whom Loyd had sworn out a warrant, Loyd shot Harrell three times with a 32-caliber pistol, hitting him once in the shoulder, once in the neck, and once near the heart. Loyd, in his statement on his trial, said, "I just wanted to keep him (Harrell) from signing that bond and beating me out of my money;" and, further, that he had no intention of murdering Harrell. Loyd was charged with assault with intent to murder and was convicted of shooting at another, with a recommendation that he be punished as for a misdemeanor, and was sentenced by the court as for a misdemeanor. The court did not err in charging the law of shooting at another, nor was the verdict finding defendant guilty of the lesser offense, with a recommendation that he be punished as for a misdemeanor, contrary to law.

[2] 2. Where the judge charges the jury in effect that the jury should fix a maximum and minimum sentence in the event of a conviction for either assault with intent to murder or shooting at another, but he fails to instruct them to fix such sentence if they recommend that he be punished as for a misdemeanor, and the judge himself imposes a misdemeanor sentence, the charge to this effect furnishes no ground of complaint on the part of the defendant.

[3-11] 3. There is no merit in any of the approved grounds of the motion for a new trial, and the evidence amply sustains the verdict.

Judgment affirmed.

Error from Superior Court, Marion County; John B. Hutcheson, Judge.

Proceedings on the claim of Blanchard, Humber & Co. to property levied on under a fi. fa. in favor of the Hagan Gas Engine & Manufacturing Company. Judgment for the plaintiff in fi. fa., and the claimant brings error. Affirmed.

This is a claim case. The evidence in substance is as follows: The defendant in fi. fa. bought certain personal property from the Woodruff Machinery Manufacturing Company, giving therefor promissory notes containing a retention of title to the personality until paid for, which were duly recorded. He paid the notes, and an entry of payment was duly made on the record, and possession of the property was delivered to him by the payee. The execution against him was obtained on April 25, 1916, and on July 8, 1919, was levied on the personality in question, which was then in his possession. On the part of the claimants it was testified that the property in question was their property at the date of the levy. The claim was based on the following facts: The claimants lent to the defendant in fi. fa. the money to pay his notes for the property and paid the notes and took possession of the property. Subsequently, on August 4, 1919, a transfer of the notes, which had previously been marked paid and delivered to the defendant in fi. fa., was made by the Woodruff Machinery Manufacturing Company to the claimants, at the request of the defendant in fi. fa., while the property was in the possession of the levying officer. The defendant in fi. fa. testified that he had never repaid to the claimant the money borrowed to pay the note. The court, at the conclusion of the evidence, directed a verdict for the plaintiff in fi. fa., and the claimants excepted.

T. B. Rainey, of Buena Vista, and Geo. C. Palmer, of Columbus, for plaintiff in error.

W. B. Short and W. D. Crawford, both of Buena Vista, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). The direction of a verdict for the plaintiff in fi. fa. was demanded. No other legal verdict could have been rendered. The property levied on was in the possession of the defendant in fi. fa. at the time of the levy. The title thereto reverted to him when he paid the title retention notes. The fact that the claimants had loaned to the defendant in fi. fa. the money with which to pay these notes did not give the claimants any title to the property as against the lien of plaintiff's fi. fa., in the absence of a written transfer of the notes. Swann Davis Co. v. Stanton, 7 Ga. App. 668, 67 S. E. 888; Burch v. Pedigo & Lyons, 113 Ga. 1157, 39 S. E. 493, 54 L. R. A. 808. The testimony of the claimant that the property levied upon at the date of the levy was their property was merely a conclusion of the witness and without any probative value, the facts clearly showing that at that time the title was in the defendant in fi. fa., the title-retention notes having been paid by him and delivered up to him by the payee.

Judgment affirmed.

WOLFE v. CITIZENS' BANK OF DUBLIN.
(No. 11799.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 16, 1921.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Appeal and error §195 — Objection that amendment to plea was not allowed by order of court cannot be first raised in brief.

Where an amendment to a plea is filed in the clerk's office at the trial term, and considered by the court in the decision of the case, and specified as a part of the record to be sent up to this court, it is too late to raise for the first time, in the brief of counsel for the defendant in error, the point that the amendment was not allowed by an order of the trial court and therefore cannot be considered.

2. Set-off and counterclaim §28(1) — "Mutual demands" import reciprocal obligations.

The words "mutual demands," as applied to debts which may be the subject of set-off, necessarily import that there must be reciprocal obligations between the parties (citing Words and Phrases, Mutual Debts).

3. Usury §101 — Former contract must be between same parties to permit set-off of usury.

"Usury paid on a former contract may be pleaded as a set-off to the existing debt, provided it be not barred by the statute of limitations," and provided further that the "former contract," on which the usury was paid, was between the same parties as those to the "existing debt."

4. Bills and notes §376—Usury §101—Only "usury" in particular note may be urged against bona fide holder; usury in earlier notes cannot be set off against transferee of renewal note.

The defense of "usury," which is good even against a bona fide holder for value of a negotiable promissory note who acquired title to the same before maturity, means the usury with which the note in question is infected, and does not include usury in other notes made by the defendant to other persons; and in a suit by the holder of the first note, against the maker thereof, he will be allowed to set off only the usury in that note.

Error from City Court of Dublin; R. D. Flynt, Judge.

Action by the Citizens' Bank of Dublin against J. A. Wolfe. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The Citizens' Bank of Dublin sued J. A. Wolfe, maker of a promissory note, alleging that the note was made payable to the order of the City National Bank of Dublin, and by it indorsed and transferred to the petitioner. The defendant, in a plea filed at the appearance term, admitted the execution of the note sued on, and alleged that the plaintiff was the successor of the City National Bank, a banking corporation under the laws of the United States, and, as the successor of the said national bank, had taken the note sued on with full notice of all the equities between the defendant and the national bank, and further alleged that the note contained usurious interest which the national bank had received, charged, and reserved from the defendant when the note was originally made, and that this usurious interest should be allowed the defendant as a set-off against the note. The defendant alleged that he had made, previous to the date of that note, other notes to the national bank, in which there was a large amount of usury reserved and taken by that bank at the time the notes were made, aggregating the usurious sum of $1,400, and this amount the defendant insisted should be allowed him as a set-off against the principal of the note in suit. Allowing the sums claimed as a set-off, the defendant alleged that there only remained due on the note the sum of $690, which sum he had tendered to the plaintiff before the return day, and that the tender was a continuous tender and unconditional.

At the trial term of the case the defendant filed an amendment to his plea, in which amendment he alleged that the note sued on was a renewal note and had been renewed for a number of times; that at each renewal thereof interest was charged in the face of the note at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum, and that he was entitled to set off the usury with which the note was infected. He further alleged that previous to this note he made other notes payable to the "plaintiff," on which he paid usury aggregating the sum of $1,090, which he asked to be allowed him as a set-off to the principal of the note in suit. And as to the note sued on, amounting to $2,090, the defendant alleged that it was given by him to "plaintiff" in renewal of all his previously existing indebtedness to the national bank, and that this note was infected with usury which was charged and collected when the note was made. The allegation in this amended plea that the notes in question were made by the defendant to the "plaintiff" was not supported by the evidence. The evidence indisputably shows that the note in suit and all the other notes were originally made by the defendant to the national bank; that the note in suit was the last note made by him, and that it was made to the national bank; and the evidence further shows that all the notes in question, except the note sued on, were fully paid by the defendant—principal and interest—to the national bank, the statement being made that the bank at the time of the execution of the notes in question "charged and reserved" the usurious interest. The first plea filed by the defendant was abandoned as being under the national bank law and therefore not applicable, and the second plea was filed under the state law. The second plea was not formally allowed by any order of the trial court. It was filed in the clerk's office at the trial term and was specified in the bill of exceptions as a part of the record to be sent up to this court by the clerk. The defendant in error insists here for the first time that this amended plea should not be considered by this court, because it appears that no order was passed in the trial court allowing such plea to be filed.

The case was heard by the judge below without the intervention of a jury, and he rendered a judgment for the plaintiff for the amount of the note sued on, with legal interest, after deducting therefrom the usurious interest embraced in the particular note; but he did not allow as a set-off the usury alleged to have been paid by the defendant on the previous notes made by him to the national bank; and the question for decision by this court, on the merits of the case, arises on the exception to the judgment refusing to allow the defendant a set-off of the usurious interest paid by him to the national bank on the previous notes.

Robt. L. Berner, of Macon, and S. W. Sturges, of Dublin, for plaintiff in error.

M. H. Blackshear, of Dublin, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The objection that there was no order of the court allowing the amendment to the plea to be filed at the first term was too late, having been made for the first time in this court. In Smith v. West, 134 Ga. 11, 67 S. E. 405, the court says:

"In specifying the parts of the record to be sent up to this court, the additional answer is mentioned. * * * It is too late for the defendant in error for the first time, in his brief filed in this court, to raise the point that this amendment was not duly allowed, and therefore cannot be considered."

[2-4] 2. Should the trial court have allowed the set-off of the usurious interest "charged and reserved" by the national bank on the previous notes against the note in suit, or should he have limited the ruling on that point to the amount of the usury paid on the particular note in suit? It is clearly inferable from the evidence that all of the usurious interest on all the notes in question, including the one in suit, was charged and reserved by the national bank when the notes were first made and when they were renewed from time to time by the defendant, and the evidence shows that the principal of all of the previous notes and the interest, including the usurious interest, had been fully paid by the defendant to the national bank. The defendant insists that upon the note in suit he was entitled to a credit of the aggregate amount of all the sums of usury paid by him, within the statute of limitations, on the previous notes as well as the note in suit. He bases his contention upon the law of set-off under the Code. Section 4340 of the Civil Code (1910) provides that as "between the parties themselves any mutual demands, existing at the time of the commencement of the suit, may be set-off"; and the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error insists that the excess of interest in the previous notes, as well as in the note in suit, constitutes a demand which may be recovered either by a plea or a separate suit. Was the usury which the national bank charged and reserved on the previous notes, and which the evidence showed was paid in full to the national bank by the defendant, a mutual demand existing at the time of the commencement of the suit between the plaintiff and the defendant? What is the meaning of the words "mutual demands," in the section referred to?

"The word 'mutual,' as applied to debts which may be the subject of set-off, necessarily imports that there must be reciprocal obligations between the parties." 5 Words and Phrases (1st Ed.) p. 4649. An obligation existed on the part of the plaintiff to exact from the defendant the legal demands which he could make on the note in suit, and the defendant had the right to demand of the plaintiff that he should have a credit of the usury in the said note. But where was there any obligation on the part of the plaintiff to allow the defendant a credit on the previous notes, which the evidence does not show that the plaintiff had ever held as transferee or otherwise, and upon which usurious interest had been fully paid by the defendant to another party? Under the national bank law, as he had fully paid the usury to the national bank, he might have had the right, in a separate suit, to sue for and recover the amount actually paid to that bank. Haseltine v. Central Bank of Springfield, 183 U. S. 132, 22 Sup. Ct. 50, 46 L. Ed. 118. But even as to the national bank, having actually paid the usurious interest to that bank, he could not set it off in a suit brought by the bank against him, but he would be confined to the remedy of a direct suit for the debt. In Zelgler v. Scott, 10 Ga. 389, 54 Am. Dec. 395, it is said:

"Usury paid on a former contract may be pleaded as a set-off to the existing debt, provided it be not barred by the statute of limitations."

In that case it appears that the former contract infected with usury was between the same parties as in the suit to which it was held that the set-off could be pleaded. And in the case of Angler v. Smith, 101 Ga. 844, 28 S. E. 167, it was held that the defense of usury was good even against a bona fide holder for value of a negotiable promissory note who acquired the title to the note before its maturity, but in that case the usury was in the note which had been transferred for value and which was in suit. The taint of usury in a note remains in it even after it has been transferred to a bona fide holder for value before due, but it cannot be the law that the amount of usury in one note, or in a dozen notes, paid by the defendant to other persons, can be set off by him as a legitimate claim, when he is sued by another on a different note. To illustrate by the facts of the present case: If, as a matter of law, the defendant has the right as against the plaintiff to set off the amounts of usury contained in the notes which he had previously made and paid in full to the national bank, it would allow him to collect from the plaintiff, a stranger to all the other contracts, more than half of the principal of the note of which he was the bona fide holder. We are therefore of the opinion that the learned trial judge did not commit any error in limiting the set-off to which the plaintiff in error was entitled to the amount of the usury which was contained in the note in suit, and in refusing to allow him as a set-off the usurious interest which he had paid to the City National Bank of Dublin on the other notes.

LAMB v. FULTON BAG & COTTON MILLS.
(No. 12037.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2
March 26, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Master and servant \Leftrightarrow 316(1)—“Independent contractor” defined.

When a person is employed to do specific work and is in the exercise of a distinct and independent employment, and in the execution of this specific work is not under the immediate supervision and control of his employer, and the manner of doing the work and the employment, payment, and control of the labor is left entirely to the employee, the relation of master and servant does not exist; the party employed being an independent contractor. Moll on Independent Contractors and Employers' Liability, §§ 13, 14, 15, and 16.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Independent Contractor.]

2. Master and servant \Leftrightarrow 316(2)—Building repairer held independent contractor, liable for minor's unlawful employment.

The defendant corporation, the owner of cotton mills, made a contract for the repair of the roof of its buildings with one who was specially engaged in that line of work. By the terms of the contract the defendant agreed to pay a fixed sum to the contractor and was to furnish a portion of the material to be used in the doing of the work. All the particulars in connection with the doing of the work, the employment, payment, and control of the labor, and the direction and supervision of the work, were left entirely to the contractor. A minor under 14 years of age was employed by the contractor to help make the repairs, for which he was to be paid by the contractor a certain wage. The defendant had nothing to do with the selection of the minor, had no authority to discharge him, and did not direct him in the manner of doing his work. While engaged in this work he fell off the roof of the building and was killed. Held, the minor was not a servant of the defendant corporation at the time of his death, and the defendant was not responsible for his wrongful employment, and not liable in damages to his widowed mother for his death. Civ. Code 1910, §§ 4414, 4415, subd. 5; Harris v. McNamara, 97 Ala. 181, 12 South. 103; Casement v. Brown, 148 U. S. 615, 13 Sup. Ct. 672, 37 L. Ed. 582.

3. Master and servant \Leftrightarrow 332(3) — Nonsuit properly granted on ground of employment by independent contractor.

The evidence substantially stated above showing clearly that the plaintiff's minor son was not the servant of the defendant corporation at the time of his death, but was the servant of the independent contractor, and this being the controlling question in the case, there was no error in the award of a nonsuit.

4. Decision of other questions unnecessary.

The existence of the relation of master and servant between the plaintiff's minor son at the time of his death and the defendant corporation being a condition precedent to the right to recover either for the loss of the minor's services during his minority or for the value of his life, arising from his wrongful employment or from negligence, and it being proved by the plaintiff's evidence that this relation did not exist, it is unnecessary to decide the questions raised by the assignments of error as to the sustaining of the demurrers to the first and third counts of the petition.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by Mrs. D. A. Lamb against the Fulton Bag & Cotton Mills. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Suit was brought in the city court of Atlanta by Mrs. Lamb against the Fulton Bag & Cotton Mills seeking to recover damages for the wrongful death of her minor son. The declaration contained four counts. A demurrer was filed to all of the counts, which was sustained by the court as to counts 1, 3, and 4, and overruled as to count 2. Exceptions pendente lite were preserved as to the judgment sustaining the demurrer as to counts 1 and 3. No exception was taken to the judgment on the demurrer as to count 4. The case went to trial on count 2, and at the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence on motion of the defendant a nonsuit was granted. The substantial allegations on count 2, to which the evidence applied, were that John Lamb, who was the minor son of the plaintiff, his widowed mother, was employed by the defendant without her knowledge or consent and was placed at work at a dangerous employment at which he was killed. This count contained no allegation of negligence and seeks to recover the value of the child's services up to the age of 21. The suit is based upon the theory that the defendant, having employed the plaintiff's minor son without her consent, is liable in any event for the loss of his services resulting to her by reason of his homicide, and the issue determined on the suit was as to whether the minor, at the time of his death, was employed by the defendant as its servant, and the judgment of nonsuit is based upon the conclusion of the court that the evidence did not disclose the existence of this relation, and therefore there can be no recovery against the defendant based upon the theory of master and servant set up under the second count.

Incidentally it may be remarked in passing that the allegation in this count that the plaintiff's minor son was put at dangerous work without her consent is not supported by any evidence. The issue as to whether or not the plaintiff's minor son was employed by the defendant as its servant depends upon the construction of the evidence, and the evidence as to this issue, substantially stated, is as follows:

The plaintiff testified that at the time of her son's death he was working, as she thought, for Mr. C. R. Henry, and not for the defendant. She testified further that, while she knew that her son was working for Henry, she had not limited the character of services to be performed by her minor son while in the employment of Henry. He made $1.50 per day while working for Henry, which sum he turned over to her. One Mathers, another witness for the plaintiff, testified that at the time of Lamb's death he, the witness, was employed by C. R. Henry, who was engaged in the general tin business, doing all kinds of sheet metal work, roofing, guttering, etc.; that he, acting for Henry Bros., which was the trade-name of C. R. Henry, made a contract to do certain described work for the defendant, the Fulton Bag & Cotton Mills, this contract being between C. R. Henry, in the business name of Henry Bros., and the Fulton Bag & Cotton Mills; that Mathers made the contract with the Fulton Bag & Cotton Mills for Henry Bros. to do the work for $1.75 per hour for a man and his helper, which were to be supplied by Henry Bros.; that the Fulton Bag & Cotton Mills showed the witness Mathers, representing Henry Bros., the work which the latter was to do, consisting of putting up gutter pipes, down spouts, etc.

The Fulton Bag & Cotton Mills had some material which it agreed to turn over to Henry Bros. to be used in the work. Henry Bros. were to do the work in their own way, using their own skill, and without any direction from the Fulton Bag & Cotton Mills except that when Henry Bros. had finished doing the work on one building the Fulton Bag & Cotton Mills showed them the next building on which to work, but the work contracted to be done was one entire job. Mathers, representing Henry Bros., selected John Lamb, the plaintiff's son, who was employed by Henry Bros., to help him do the work to be done by Henry Bros. under their contract with the defendant corporation. Lamb appeared to be about 16 or 17 years old at the time of his employment by Henry Bros., and stated that he was 16, and he had been working for Henry Bros. about a year and a half doing the same character of work as was to be done for the defendant corporation by Henry Bros. Ninety-five per cent. of the work which Lamb, the minor, did was roofing work. Lamb was paid $1.50 per day by Henry Bros. for nine hours' work, and Mathers was paid $5 per day by Henry Bros. for nine hours' work, while Henry Bros. received from the defendant corporation under the contract $1.75 per hour. Henry Bros. selected Mathers and Lamb, who were employed by them generally, to do the special work under the contract for the Fulton Bag & Cotton Mills. The Fulton Bag & Cotton Mills showed Mathers the work which was to be done under the contract made by it with Henry Bros., which consisted of putting up gutter pipes, down spout, etc. The Fulton Bag & Cotton Mills loaned to Mathers a negro to help him in doing the work generally under the contract with Henry Bros., the duty of the negro being to pull about, from place to place as might be needed, the scaffold. This was a voluntary act on the part of the defendant, and it was under no obligation under the contract to supply any help to Henry Bros. When Lamb, the minor son of plaintiff, fell off of the building, Mathers did not know why he was on the roof or that he was then doing any work at all on the roof. The contract between the defendant and Henry Bros. did not specify the number of hours they were to work for the defendant corporation, but Henry Bros. regulated their own hours. Mathers and Lamb, the employees of Henry Bros., while doing the work embraced in the contract, went in and out the mill of the defendant corporation at pleasure, and, when the minor Lamb was killed, Mathers, acting for Henry Bros. hired another man to finish the work which Lamb was doing. The payment for the work was made directly to Mr. C. R. Henry, doing business as Henry Bros. The Fulton Bag & Cotton Mills had no control over Henry Bros., Mathers, or Lamb, but they could order the latter two off of the premises. "They did not have the right to fire either Mathers or Lamb at any time because they were working for C. R. Henry." The Fulton Bag & Cotton Mills had no knowledge as to what pay either Mathers or Lamb were getting from Henry Bros. for their work. A letter was introduced from the Fulton Bag & Cotton Mills confirming the contract made with Henry Bros. through Mathers; this letter further showing that the defendant corporation was to pay for any material that was used in doing the work, and also was to pay Henry Bros. $1.75 per hour to cover the time of both men on the job.

This is a substantial statement of the evidence for the plaintiff on the issue as to whether the deceased minor son, at the time of his death, was the employee of the defendant corporation or was employed by Henry Bros., an independent contractor, to do the work for the Fulton Bag & Cotton Mills.

DECATUR LUMBER CO. v. FULTON.
(No. 11780.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Master and servant \Rightarrow 235(12) — Servant not required to inspect appliances to discover concealed dangers.

"As a general rule, a servant is under no obligation to inspect the appliances about which he works or that part of the plant by which his safety may be affected, for the purpose of discovering concealed dangers which would not be disclosed by superficial observation." Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Dukes, 121 Ga. 787(2), 49 S. E. 788; Austin v. Appling, 88 Ga. 54, 57, 13 S. E. 955; Cochrell v. Langley Mfg. Co., 5 Ga. App. 317, 320, 63 S. E. 244.

2. Master and servant \Rightarrow 235(4)—Reliance on master's care permissible.

"When machinery, though not perfect in all respects, can be and has been used with safety under given circumstances, a servant using such machinery is warranted in acting upon the assumption that the master has fulfilled, and will continue to fulfill, his duty to see that the circumstances are such that the machinery can be used with safety, unless it is apparent to the servant that the master has failed to fulfill his duty in this respect, or such failure can be ascertained by the servant's using that degree of care which the law imposes upon him." Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Dukes, supra.

3. Master and servant \Rightarrow 217(3) — Master's knowledge of latent defect greater.

Not only is it true that "the duty of inspecting for defects which would not be disclosed by superficial observation is not primarily imposed upon a servant" who is employed merely to operate a machine or to see that it is operated; but, "except where the injured employee is an inspector, the master's means of knowledge of latent defects in the machinery furnished are primarily to be considered as greater than those of the servant." Hubbard v. Macon Ry. & Light Co., 5 Ga. App. 223, 62 S. E. 1018; Southern States Portland Cement Co. v. Helms, 2 Ga. App. 308, 58 S. E. 524. See, also, Burton v. Wadley So. Ry. Co., 25 Ga. App. 380, 103 S. E. 881; Beard v. Georgian Mfg. Co., 8 Ga. App. 618(2), 70 S. E. 57; Hines v. Little, 105 S. E. 618.

4. Master and servant \Rightarrow 261(4)—Allegation as to lack of knowledge of defect held equivalent to statutory requirement.

A petition by a servant against his master for injuries resulting from defective machinery is not deficient under section 3131, of Civil Code 1910, as failing to allege that the servant injured did not know, and had not equal means of knowing, of such defect, "and by the exercise of ordinary care could not have known thereof," where the petition alleges that the defect was "unknown to" petitioner, "and could not have been known to him upon inspection or the exercise of care, but same was known, or should have been known, to the defendant"; such allegations being taken as the equivalent of the requirement set forth by the Code. Charleston & Western Carolina Ry. Co. v. Miller, 115 Ga. 92(2), 41 S. E. 252.

5. Master and servant \Rightarrow 258(12)—Petition held sufficient.

The petition was good as against general demurrer. Cedartown Cotton & Export Co. v. Miles, 2 Ga. App. 79, 81-83, 58 S. E. 239; Southern States Portland Cement Co. v. Helms, supra; Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Gladman, 1 Ga. App. 259, 260(8), 58 S. E. 249; Cochrell v. Langley, supra.

Error from City Court of Bainbridge; H. B. Spooner, Judge.

Action by Ralph Fulton against the Decatur Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Ralph Fulton sued the Decatur Lumber Company for damages for personal injuries, alleging the following facts: Plaintiff was employed by defendant in its sawmill as a butting saw operator; that at the time of his injury he was operating such a saw "suspended from rafters or crossbeams in the top of the mill shed, so that the saw was about the height of an average man's chest from the ground"; that this saw "was suspended in such manner that it would swing from side to side in a semicircular manner as the pendulum of a clock, and was so adjusted by the use of a cable, to which there was attached a heavy iron; that when the saw was not being used it would be drawn by means of said rope or cable and weight out of plaintiff's way and danger;" that when it was necessary to use such instru-mentality he would grasp "the handhold attached to the bars or beams sustaining the saw, and pull the same across the log or timber for the purpose of cutting the same"; that plaintiff, while thus acting in the employ of defendant, in accordance with his previous instructions and custom, reached out and took "hold of the handlepiece to pull the saw through a piece of timber for the purpose of cutting the same," and then, in accordance with such instructions and his custom, turned "the same loose, so that it might be drawn by the cable and weight" back to where it was supposed to stay. He alleges that, "after the saw had been thus pulled back by the cable and weight at a considerable angle away from" petitioner, "the rope or cable to which the weight was attached broke, and the saw, which was circular in nature and revolving at great rapidity, swung" against him, "causing the injuries for which he sues."

He further alleges that he himself was without fault; "that it was not his duty to examine the rope and cable, nor could he have ascertained from an examination of the same that it was defective or might break;" that it "was the duty of the defendant to have and maintain safe appliances for the operation of such a dangerous instrument as a circular saw, and that they were negligent in not so doing; that the cable and weight were insecurely and negligently swung; that the same was unknown to your petitioner, and could not have been known to him upon inspection or the exercise of care, but same was known or should have been known to the defendant;" and that the defendant was further "negligent, in (a) not providing and furnishing" petitioner "a safe place within which to work, and (b) in not providing and furnishing your petitioner with safe appliances with which to work, and (c) that said rope and cable were negligently fixed."

2. Judgment ~~§~~441—New trial ~~§~~29—Motion not proper remedy when attorney consents to verdict and judgment fraudulently, etc.

Where an attorney consents to a verdict and judgment against his client fraudulently or collusively, or in violation of instructions, the proper remedy is not by motion for new trial, but by equitable petition or motion to set aside the judgment.

Error from City Court of Carrollton; James Beall, Judge.

Action by the Coweta Fertilizer Company against A. F. Johnson. Defendant's motion for a new trial was granted, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The Coweta Fertilizer Company sued A. F. Johnson on a promissory note. At the appearance term the defendant filed a plea in which he alleged that he had made a payment of $85 on the note, which was not credited thereon, and when the case was reached for trial the attorneys for both plaintiff and defendant agreed on a consent verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount of the note, less a credit of $42.50. Judgment was entered accordingly. During the term at which the verdict and judgment were rendered the defendant made a motion for a new trial on the usual general grounds and on the grounds: (1) That when the verdict was rendered against him he was confined to his home with an attack of appendicitis and was unable to attend court on the day of trial, and had so notified his attorney by sending him a certificate of his physician; and (2) that his attorney had no authority to permit the verdict and judgment to be taken against him, except in accordance with his plea allowing him a credit of $85, that the agreement by his counsel for a verdict for less than this amount of credit, to wit, a credit of $42.50, was without the knowledge and consent of the movant, and that he objected as soon as he was informed of it, and insisted that the payment set up in his plea was made by him, and that he did not owe the plaintiff the $85 or any part thereof. The movant's affidavit as to his sickness and the affidavit of his physician were attached to the motion for a new trial. The judge granted the motion, and the plaintiff excepted.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] Verdicts and judgment rendered by consent of counsel in good faith and without any fraud or violation of express instructions given by the client to the attorney and known to the adverse party or his attorney are binding upon the client, the consent of counsel being in law the consent of the parties they represent. Civil Code 1910, § 4955. In the case of Davis v. First National Bank of Blakely, 139 Ga. 703, 78 S. E. 193, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 750, Mr. Justice Lumpkin, in quite a lengthy and learned decision reviewing the English rule on the subject and some of the decisions of the courts of the United States, said:

"It may be stated that the Code and the decisions generally follow the English rule, at least in part, and that the decisions hold that, if an attorney at law consents to the taking of a compromise decree in a case in which he is employed, it is binding upon his client, in the absence of fraud or of violation of express directions given by his client and known to the adverse party or his attorney."

In this case it will be noted in the affidavit of the movant that his attorney who agreed to the verdict acted in good faith, and did so thinking he had authority to accept a credit of half the sum of his payment, and the client does not charge that there was any fraud by his attorney in the making of this agreement, or that there was any violation of express instructions given to his attorney on the subject. In fact, it is not alleged in his affidavit that he had given his attorney any instruction at all on the subject. In Perkerson v. Reams, 84 Ga. 298, 10 S. E. 624, it was held:

"Where counsel appear for parties before the court, and there is no question as to their authority for making such appearance or acting in behalf of the parties, all that counsel do before the court is binding upon their clients, especially when such action on the part of counsel leads to judgments and orders of the court. Such orders will not be set aside at the instance of clients upon the ground that their counsel had no authority to agree thereto."

We do not think that section 4956 of the Civil Code of 1910 is applicable to the facts of the present case. That section provides as follows:

"Without special authority, attorneys cannot receive anything in discharge of a client's claim but the full amount in cash."

[2] In the present case the attorney of the defendant was not endeavoring to collect or enforce his client's claim, but was resisting a suit or claim against his client and consented to the credit in favor of his client. We are of the opinion that, where a settlement of a suit is made by an attorney accepting less than the full amount of the claim in cash, the agreement binds the client if the settlement is carried out by a consent verdict and judgment and the settlement was made without fraud on the part of the attorney or any instruction of the client to the contrary. This being true, we think the trial judge had no right to grant a new trial. Indeed, if the movant had any rights at all under the facts of this case he was certainly not entitled to a new trial. New trials are granted because of errors of the trial court occurring during the trial or on the ground of newly discovered evidence. No error of the court is alleged, and certainly the evidence did not fall within the classification of newly discovered evidence. If there had been any fraud alleged and shown, or any violation of instructions given by the client to the attorney, or any collusion of any sort between the attorneys for the plaintiff and the defendant, either an equitable petition setting up the facts and asking that the judgment be vacated, or a motion to set aside the judgment, would have been the proper remedy, not a motion for a new trial. But, regardless of this, we are satisfied that the verdict and judgment should stand; there being in this case no allegation or evidence of any fraud, or any violation of instructions given by the defendant to his attorney, but, on the contrary, a distinct allegation by the defendant of good faith on the part of his attorney in consenting to the verdict and judgment, although such consent was made without his (the defendant's) knowledge or consent.

Judgment reversed.

BIBB MFG. CO. v. SNOW. (No. 11791.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error \S 1004(1)—Damages \S 132(13)—Amount of damages not disturbed unless indicating bias or gross mistake; $2,000 for loss of three fingers held not excessive.

The amount of damages found by the jury will not be interfered with by this court unless so small or so large as to justify the inference of gross mistake, undue bias, or prejudice. An inference in the present case that the amount of damages is excessive is not justified by the evidence.

2. Appeal and error \S 1066—Trial \S 256 (10), 295(7)—Instruction as to assumption of risk, correct in general, must be met by more specific instruction; inapplicable charge on comparative negligence held not prejudicial.

The excerpts from the charge of the court on which error is assigned stated correctly the principles of law applicable to the evidence, and were sufficient in the absence of timely requests for more specific instructions.

3. No error and evidence sufficient.

No material error of law appears in the trial, and the evidence supports the verdict.

Error from Superior Court, Newton County; John B. Hutcheson, Judge.

Action by Newtie Snow, by next friend, against the Bibb Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Snow, a minor more than 14 years of age, by his mother, as next friend, sued the Bibb Manufacturing Company for damages in the sum of $5,000, alleging, in substance, that July 19, 1918, he entered into the employment of the defendant, under a contract of employment made with his mother, she being a widow; that, while he was engaged in the performance of his duty in the operation of what is known as a carding machine, it became necessary for him to lift a certain lid, described in his petition; and that, while he was lifting this lid, his hand slipped off and went into the cylinder of the machine, and the steel teeth of the same cut off and badly mangled three fingers of his right hand. The petition alleges that the machine was defective and not a machine equal in kind to that in general use, and not reasonably safe for persons to operate with ordinary care and diligence; the particular defect in the machine being that it was not equipped with a handle or knob by which the operator could take hold of the said lid when necessary to do so and thus prevent his hand from slipping off. It is further alleged that at the time of the injury the said minor was 16 years of age, and had been working on that particular job only a few days prior to his injuries, and that he did not appreciate the dangers in the machine and did not have equal means with the master of knowing of said dangers. The defendant, in addition to the general denial of the allegations in the petition, alleged that the said minor was warned of all the dangers incident to the running of the said machine; that his injury was the result of his own fault; that the defendant was in no wise negligent as to warnings required of it; that the machine on which the plaintiff was injured was equal in kind to the machines in general use, and was equipped with a knob or handle whereby the lid was to be raised; and that the plaintiff was injured by his own negligence, while engaged, out of his line of duty in raising the lid. By amendment the plaintiff alleged that after his employment the defendant put him at work at a more dangerous and hazardous employment than that for which he had been originally employed. This allegation was denied by the defendant, and the affirmative defense was set up that contributory negligence on the part of the minor was the proximate cause of the injury. The jury, on the trial of the case, returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $2,000.

Rogers, & Tuck, of Covington, and J. O. Knox, of Monroe, for plaintiff in error.

King & Johnson, of Covington, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above).

[1] 1. The first ground in the motion for a new trial complained of the amount of the verdict, alleging that it was excessive. The Code of this state (Park's Code, § 4399) provides that, the question of damages being one for the jury, the courts should not interfere unless the damages found were so small or so excessive as to justify the "inference of gross mistake or undue bias," and it has been uniformly held by the Supreme Court and this court that a verdict giving damages alleged to be excessive will not be set aside unless the amount reasonably indicates that the finding resulted from bias or gross mistake. The evidence on this point showed that three fingers of the plaintiff's right hand were cut off by the machine, that on account of the injuries he was confined, under the care of a physician, for over 11 weeks, suffering great pain, and that the deformed condition of his hand would not only diminish his capacity to labor, but would cause him great humiliation and mortification for the remainder of his life. In view of very wide discretion given by our law to the jury in the assessment of damages for pain and suffering, the loss of time occasioned by the injuries, and the diminution of capacity to labor caused by the loss of three fingers of the right hand, the conclusion is justified, in the opinion of this court, that the jury, in fixing the amount of damages, was not influenced by bias or prejudice or gross mistake.

[2] 2. The plaintiff in error excepts to the charge of the court that a minor assumes the ordinary risks of employment of which he undertakes, in so far as those risks are or ought to be known or appreciated by the minor, whether the source of his knowledge be his own observation and experience, or instructions which he received from his employer or his employer's representative; the error assigned being that the charge was applicable only to minors under the age of 14 years, and that a servant over the age of 14 years assumes all ordinary risks of his employment, barring only extraordinary and unusual risks and risks brought about by the negligence of the master. We think the general principle of the assumption of risks by a minor employee is correctly stated in this excerpt, and, if the defendant desired a more specific application of the principle to minors over the age of 14, proper instructions should have been requested. Besides, there was evidence that the minor in question, who was not quite 16, had never worked on the particular machine whereon he was hurt until a few days before the injury, and that he was put to work on the machine without any warning or instruction as to its dangerous character, and that the dangerous character of the machine was not so manifest as to make unnecessary such instructions or warnings. The verdict may have resulted from this view of the evidence, which indicated negligence on the part of the defendant, regardless of the age of the minor.

3. The third and fifth grounds of the motion for a new trial complain of excerpts from the charge of the court, wherein the jury were instructed that a servant's knowledge of a defect in a machine is a bar to his suit only when it appears that he understood and appreciated the risk created by that defect, and that, when deciding that question, the jury would be authorized to consider the mentality, the experience, or the lack of experience of the servant. The complaint as to these instructions was that they excluded from the minds of the jury the question whether the master had used due and proper care in ascertaining the mentality and experience, or lack of experience, of the servant at the time of his employment. In this connection the court fully instructed the jury that, if the minor comprehended the risk involved, he could not recover, and that he was bound to exercise his own skill and diligence to protect himself, in the exercise of proper care and diligence in discovering the risk of his employment, and also specifically instructed the jury that, if the danger was manifest and obvious, and as easily known to the servant as to the master, the latter would not be liable for any failure to give warning of the danger or instructions to the employee. The charge, therefore, on this subject, as a whole, sufficiently submitted to the jury the law relating to the facts of the case. The excerpts objected to in these grounds of the motion, we think, could not have misled the jury, and, so far as they went, were sound. If they were not full enough, and more specific and particular instructions were desired, a proper request should have been made.

4. The charge of the court on the subject of contributory negligence and the doctrine of comparative negligence was, in the abstract, correct, but we do not think that it was applicable to the facts in the case. This question was not involved either in the pleadings or the evidence. The case was tried on the issues that the machine upon which the plaintiff was put to work was defective, and not a machine equal in kind with those in general use; that the plaintiff was inexperienced in the use of such a machine and was unacquainted with its dangerous character, which was not manifest and apparent; and that the defendant failed to warn him of such dangers. Therefore the charge on the subject of comparative negligence was not applicable. But we fail to see how it was prejudicial in any respect to the defendant.

[3] We conclude, therefore, that none of the exceptions contain any substantial merit; that the case was fairly tried, and the verdict is supported by the evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

COBB COUNTY v. ABERNATHY.
(No. 11976.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 26, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Bridges \S 43, 46(8)—Hole held efficient cause of injury from fright of mule; question properly left to the jury.

It appearing from the petition that the plaintiff's mule, in crossing a bridge on a public highway, took fright at a hole in the bottom of the bridge and "jumped and shied and fell down upon said bridge," causing injuries to the plaintiff, who was riding the mule, and that the county was negligent in permitting the hole to remain in the bridge after notice, and that such negligence was the real cause of the injury, the plaintiff had a cause of action; the jury being the judge of these matters as questions of fact.

2. Bridges \S 43—Where defect and fright of animal combine to cause injury, county is liable.

Where two causes combine to produce an injury, both of which are in their nature prox-that the crime with which this defendant was charged, cheating and swindling, was admissible because it shed light upon the whole transaction, that is, the negro had beat the defendant out of his money. This was the cause of the whole trouble, and should have been permitted to go to the jury for what it was worth. The negro's name was Newsome.

(3) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "As I said, you have been impaneled, gentlemen, to try the issue formed on this bill of indictment, and you have been sworn to try this case according to the evidence. The law you are required to take from the court. You are the judges of both the facts and the law in this sense: You are to take the law as given you by the court, and apply that law to the facts as you find them, and in that sense you are the judges of the law and of the facts."

The defendant excepts to this charge for the reason that the court confined the jury to a consideration of the evidence in making up their verdict, and thereby excluded from their consideration the defendant's statement. * * *

(4) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "No one has the right to shoot a human being with a pistol unless the act is justified or excused by some rule of law. The intentional shooting and wounding of a human being, whether a white man or a negro, with a pistol, is unlawful unless it is done under circumstances of justification or excuse, according to the principles of the Penal Code of this state."

The defendant excepts to this charge for the reason that the said charge was an expression of opinion by the presiding judge on the facts in the case, which is forbidden by section 1058 of the Penal Code of 1910. The defendant further excepts to the charge upon the ground that the court assumed in its charge to the jury that the defendant shot Tobe Harrell, the human being. This great question was a question for the jury to decide without any expression of opinion from the court. The charge was argumentative, and gave the contentions of the state very strongly, and ignored again the defendant's side of the case as contained in his statement. * * *

(5) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "Refusing to pay an account or debt, or the signing of a bond, or attempt to sign a bond, as security for a person under arrest, is no provocation in law, and will not under any circumstances justify or excuse the shooting and wounding of a human being with a pistol."

The defendant excepts to this charge for the reason that it cut the defendant off from his right of self-defense, and cut the defendant off from any defense whatever that he may have put up in his statement to the jury. This charge was also an expression of opinion by the court on the facts proven in the case, which is forbidden by section 1058 of the Penal Code of Georgia. The defendant further excepts to this charge because it was argumentative and stated the state's side of the case too strongly, at the same time ignoring the defendant's side of the case. The defendant excepts to the charge further because the charge assumed that the defendant shot the prosecutor in the case, a human being. * * *

(6) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "If you find beyond a reasonable doubt that in this county, within four years prior to the finding of the indictment, the defendant, Tom Loyd, unlawfully and intentionally shot and wounded Tobe Harrell, a human being, with a pistol, the following rules should control you in arriving at a verdict: If the pistol as used by the defendant was a weapon likely to produce death, and the defendant intentionally shot and wounded said Tobe Harrell with said pistol with deliberate intent to kill him, solely for the reason that said Tobe Harrell failed or refused to pay a debt or an account, or solely because the said Harrell was signing or attempting to sign a bond as surety, the defendant would be guilty of the offense of assault with intent to murder."

The defendant says that this charge is error for the same reasons assigned in the foregoing grounds. * * *

(7) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "If you should find beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is guilty of the offense of assault with intent to murder, you would not be authorized to find him guilty of the offense of unlawfully shooting at another. If, however, you should not find that the defendant is guilty of the offense of assault with intent to murder, but should find beyond a reasonable doubt that in this county, prior to the finding of the indictment, the defendant unlawfully and intentionally shot and wounded Tobe Harrell, a human being, with a pistol, within the range such pistol would carry, not in his, the said Tom Loyd's, own defense, and not under circumstances of justification according to the principles of the Penal Code of this state, he would be guilty of the offense of unlawfully shooting at another."

The defendant excepts to this charge upon the ground that there is no unlawful shooting at another in this case. According to the state's case and the contentions of the state before the jury, the defendant was guilty of the offense of assault with intent to murder, and according to the defendant's statement in the case, he was guilty of no offense whatever, but was justified. There was no middle ground, no room for a compromise verdict by the jury, and it was error for the presiding judge to instruct the jury on the law of unlawful shooting at another, because that branch of the law was not involved in this case, and it gave the jury an opportunity, which they took advantage of, of finding the defendant guilty of unlawfully shooting at another. * * *

(8) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows, to wit: "If you should not find beyond a reasonable doubt that in this county, within four years prior to the finding of the indictment, the defendant intentionally and unlawfully shot and wounded Tobe Harrell, a human being, with a pistol, as alleged, or if you have a reasonable doubt of his guilt, you should return a verdict of not guilty."

This was not a fair statement of the defendant's contentions. This charge ignored the defendant's statement. This charge was so worded that the jury could not understand it. The court should have charged the defendant's contentions in this immediate connection as stated in his statement to the jury and left it to the jury to say whether the defendant had provocation or not. The defendant contends, for all these reasons, the foregoing charge was error.

(9) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "The state, however, is not required to prove the guilt of a defendant beyond all doubt. Moral and not mathematical certainty is all that can be expected in legal investigation. The doubt of a jury to justify an acquittal should be reasonable, and not mere vague conjecture or possibility of the innocence of the accused."

The defendant excepts to this charge because the court failed to charge the jury in this connection that if they had any reasonable doubt about the defendant's guilt they should acquit, and the defendant excepts to that part of the charge, "The state, however, is not required to prove the defendant's guilt beyond all doubt."

(10) Because the verdict of the jury in said case was contrary to the following charge of the court: "Under our law, as it stands now—I refer to an act passed recently—whenever the jury finds the defendant guilty of a felony which is punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of years, and the offense is not reduced to a misdemeanor by their recommendation, it devolves upon the jury to fix the sentence in their verdict. In such cases the law requires the jury to fix a minimum and a maximum sentence; that is, in their verdict they should fix a punishment of not less than so long and not more than so long in the penitentiary of the state, stating the time that they fix. In such cases, however, you will understand that they would have to remain within the period fixed by law for the punishment of a defendant in such cases."

The defendant contends that the jury did not fix the punishment in this case. * * *

(11) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "If you find the defendant guilty of the offense of unlawfully shooting at another, and should not wish to recommend that he be punished as for a misdemeanor, then the form of your verdict should be, 'We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of unlawfully shooting at another, and fix his punishment at not less than so long and not more than so long, stating the time.' You will remember that that offense is punished by the law by confinement in the penitentiary from one to four years."

The defendant excepts to this charge for the same reason that he excepts in the foregoing ground of the amended motion for a new trial. The jury found the defendant guilty of unlawfully shooting at another, which was a compromise verdict in this case, and the court fixed the punishment in this case, and not the jury, which is contrary to the act of the Legislature of 1919 (Laws 1919, p. 387). The jury should fix the punishment in the penitentiary in a felony case, but the jury did not do it, and the judge fixed the punishment, which is forbidden by law now since the act was passed. So the charge authorizing the jury to find such a verdict is error.

(12) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "If you should find the defendant guilty of shooting at another, and wish to recommend that he be punished as for a misdemeanor, then the form of your verdict should be, 'We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of

The defendant excepts to this charge for the reason that there was no middle ground in the case, and not room for a compromise verdict by the jury by finding the defendant guilty of the offense of unlawfully shooting at another.

* * *

The defendant further excepts to this charge for the reason that the court did not give the jury instructions to fix the punishment in the penitentiary, but told the jury that they could recommend that he be punished as for a misdemeanor. Under this charge, the jury accepted the invitation of the presiding judge, and recommended that he be punished as for a misdemeanor, and therefore gave the court the right to fix the punishment in this case, which is forbidden by the act of the Legislature of 1919. This defendant was charged with a felony, with assault with intent to murder, in one count, and the defendant contends that the presiding judge had no right, under the law, to give the jury an opportunity to find the defendant guilty of a lower grade of crime and to fail to fix the punishment in the penitentiary and leave it to the presiding judge to fix the punishment. * * *

(13) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows, to wit: "I have written out some forms of verdict corresponding with the charge that I have given you, and they will be handed to you, and you can select from these forms that form of verdict which coincides with your finding."

The defendant excepts to this charge for the reason that the court had no right to write the forms of the verdict for the jury on paper, and send them out with the jury in order to let the jury select from these forms the verdict which they could find. The jury should be left alone to make their verdict from their memory of what occurred on the trial of said case, and they should not be aided by any writing of the presiding judge purporting to be the form of the verdict. For these reasons the defendant assigns the charge as error.

—Statement by editor.

John R. Cooper and W. O. Cooper, Jr., both of Macon, and C. A. Weddington, of Cochran, for plaintiff in error.

W. A. Wooten, Sol. Gen., of Eastman, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. [1] 1. The evidence in this case shows conclusively that while Tobe Harrell was sitting in a chair in the sheriff's office in the courthouse preparing to sign a criminal recognizance for a man against whom Loyd had sworn out a warrant, Loyd shot Harrell three times with a 32-caliber pistol, hitting him once in the shoulder, once in the neck, and once near the heart. Loyd, in his statement on his trial, said, "I just wanted to keep him (Harrell) from signing that bond and beating me out of my money;" and, further, that he had no intention of murdering Harrell. Loyd was charged with assault with intent to murder and was convicted of shooting at another, with a recommendation that he be punished as for a misdemeanor, and was sentenced by the court as for a misdemeanor. The court did not err in charging the law of shooting at another, nor was the verdict finding defendant guilty of the lesser offense, with a recommendation that he be punished as for a misdemeanor, contrary to law.

[2] 2. Where the judge charges the jury in effect that the jury should fix a maximum and minimum sentence in the event of a conviction for either assault with intent to murder or shooting at another, but he fails to instruct them to fix such sentence if they recommend that he be punished as for a misdemeanor, and the judge himself imposes a misdemeanor sentence, the charge to this effect furnishes no ground of complaint on the part of the defendant.

[3-11] 3. There is no merit in any of the approved grounds of the motion for a new trial, and the evidence amply sustains the verdict.

Judgment affirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Evidence ¶568(1)—Execution ¶179, 196—Verdict properly directed in claim case when evidence clearly shows person lending money with which to pay title retention notes has no title preventing levy; testimony that property was witness' property is a conclusion.

In a claim case where the evidence clearly showed that at the date of the levy of the execution the defendant in fi. fa. had both title to, and possession of, the property levied on, it was proper for the court to direct a verdict for the plaintiff in fi. fa.

Error from Superior Court, Marion County; John B. Hutcheson, Judge.

Proceedings on the claim of Blanchard, Humber & Co. to property levied on under a fi. fa. in favor of the Hagan Gas Engine & Manufacturing Company. Judgment for the plaintiff in fi. fa., and the claimant brings error. Affirmed.

This is a claim case. The evidence in substance is as follows: The defendant in fi. fa. bought certain personal property from the Woodruff Machinery Manufacturing Company, giving therefor promissory notes containing a retention of title to the personalty until paid for, which were duly recorded. He paid the notes, and an entry of payment was duly made on the record, and possession of the property was delivered to him by the payee. The execution against him was obtained on April 25, 1916, and on July 8, 1919, was levied on the personalty in question, which was then in his possession. On the part of the claimants it was testified that the property in question was their property at the date of the levy. The claim was based on the following facts: The claimants lent to the defendant in fi. fa. the money to pay his notes for the property and paid the notes and took possession of the property. Subsequently, on August 4, 1919, a transfer of the notes, which had previously been marked paid and delivered to the defendant in fi. fa., was made by the Woodruff Machinery Manufacturing Company to the claimants, at the request of the defendant in fi. fa., while the property was in the possession of the levying officer. The defendant in fi. fa. testified that he had never repaid to the claimant the money borrowed to pay the note. The court, at the conclusion of the evidence, directed a verdict for the plaintiff in fi. fa., and the claimants excepted.

T. B. Rainey, of Buena Vista, and Geo. C. Palmer, of Columbus, for plaintiff in error.
W. B. Short and W. D. Crawford, both of Buena Vista, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). The direction of a verdict for the plaintiff in fi. fa. was demanded. No other legal verdict could have been rendered. The property levied on was in the possession of the defendant in fi. fa. at the time of the levy. The title thereto reverted to him when he paid the title retention notes. The fact that the claimants had loaned to the defendant in fi. fa. the money with which to pay these notes did not give the claimants any title to the property as against the lien of plaintiff's fi. fa., in the absence of a written transfer of the notes. Swann Davis Co. v. Stanton, 7 Ga. App. 668, 67 S. E. 888; Burch v. Pedigo & Lyons, 113 Ga. 1157, 39 S. E. 493, 54 L. R. A. 808. The testimony of the claimant that the property levied upon at the date of the levy was their property was merely a confusion of the witness and without any probative value, the facts clearly showing that at that time the title was in the defendant in fi. fa., the title-retention notes having been paid by him and delivered up to him by the payee. March 16, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨195 — Objection that amendment to plea was not allowed by order of court cannot be first raised in brief.

Where an amendment to a plea is filed in the clerk's office at the trial term, and considered by the court in the decision of the case, and specified as a part of the record to be sent up to this court, it is too late to raise for the first time, in the brief of counsel for the defendant in error, the point that the amendment was not allowed by an order of the trial court and therefore cannot be considered.

2. Set-off and counterclaim ⇨28 (1) — "Mutual demands" import reciprocal obligations.

The words "mutual demands," as applied to debts which may be the subject of set-off, necessarily import that there must be reciprocal obligations between the parties (citing Words and Phrases, Mutual Debts).

3. Usury ⇨101 — Former contract must be between same parties to permit set-off of usury.

"Usury paid on a former contract may be pleaded as a set-off to the existing debt, provided it be not barred by the statute of limitations," and provided further that the "former contract," on which the usury was paid, was between the same parties as those to the "existing debt."

4. Bills and notes ⇨376—Usury ⇨101—Only "usury" in particular note may be urged against bona fide holder; usury in earlier notes cannot be set off against transferee of renewal note.

The defense of "usury," which is good even against a bona fide holder for value of a negotiable promissory note who acquired title to the same before maturity, means the usury with which the note in question is infected, and does not include usury in other notes made by the defendant to other persons; and in a suit by the holder of the first note, against the maker thereof, he will be allowed to set off only the usury in that note.

Error from City Court of Dublin; R. D. Flynt, Judge.

Action by the Citizens' Bank of Dublin against J. A. Wolfe. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The Citizens' Bank of Dublin sued J. A. Wolfe, maker of a promissory note, alleging that the note was made payable to the order of the City National Bank of Dublin, and by it indorsed and transferred to the petitioner. The defendant, in a plea filed at the appearance term, admitted the execution of the note sued on, and alleged that the plaintiff was the successor of the City National Bank, a banking corporation under the laws of the United States, and, as the successor of the said national bank, had taken the note sued on with full notice of all the equities between the defendant and the national bank, and further alleged that the note contained usurious interest which the national bank had received, charged, and reserved from the defendant when the note was originally made, and that this usurious interest should be allowed the defendant as a set-off against the note. The defendant alleged that he had made, previous to the date of that note, other notes to the national bank, in which there was a large amount of usury reserved and taken by that bank at the time the notes were made, aggregating the usurious sum of $1,400, and this amount the defendant insisted should be allowed him as a set-off against the principal of the note in suit. Allowing the sums claimed as a set-off, the defendant alleged that there only remained due on the note the sum of $690, which sum he had tendered to the plaintiff before the return day, and that the tender was a continuous tender and unconditional.

At the trial term of the case the defendant filed an amendment to his plea, in which amendment he alleged that the note sued on was a renewal note and had been renewed for a number of times; that at each renewal thereof interest was charged in the face of the note at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum, and that he was entitled to set off the usury with which the note was infected. He further alleged that previous to this note he made other notes payable to the "plaintiff," on which he paid usury aggregating the sum of $1,090, which he asked to be allowed him as a set-off to the principal of the note in suit. And as to the note sued on, amounting to $2,090, the defendant alleged that it was given by him to "plaintiff" in renewal of all his previously existing indebtedness to the national bank, and that this note was infected with usury which was charged and collected when the note was made. The allegation in this amended plea that the notes in question were made by the defendant to the "plaintiff" was not supported by the evidence. The evidence indisputably shows that the note in suit and all the other notes were originally made by the defendant to the national bank; that the note in suit was the last note made by him, and that it was made to the national bank; and the evidence further shows that all the notes in question, except the note sued on, were fully paid by the defendant—principal and interest—to the national bank, the statement being made that the bank at the time of the execution of the notes in question "charged and reserved" the usurious interest. The first plea filed by the defendant was abandoned as being under the national bank law and therefore not applicable, and the second plea was filed under the state law. The second plea was not formally allowed by any order of the trial court. It was filed in the clerk's office at the trial term and was specified in the bill of exceptions as a part of the record to be sent up to this court by the clerk. The defendant in error insists here for the first time that this amended plea should not be considered by this court, because it appears that no order was passed in the trial court allowing such plea to be filed.

The case was heard by the judge below without the intervention of a jury, and he rendered a judgment for the plaintiff for the amount of the note sued on, with legal interest, after deducting therefrom the usurious interest embraced in the particular note; but he did not allow as a set-off the usury alleged to have been paid by the defendant on the previous notes made by him to the national bank; and the question for decision by this court, on the merits of the case, arises on the exception to the judgment refusing to allow the defendant a set-off of the usurious interest paid by him to the national bank on the previous notes.

Robt. L. Berner, of Macon, and S. W. Sturgis, of Dublin, for plaintiff in error.

M. H. Blackshear, of Dublin, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above).

[1] 1. The objection that there was no order of the court allowing the amendment to the plea to be filed at the first term was too late, having been made for the first time in this court. In Smith v. West, 134 Ga. 11, 67 S. E. 405, the court says:

"In specifying the parts of the record to be sent up to this court, the additional answer is mentioned. * * * It is too late for the defendant in error for the first time, in his brief filed in this court, to raise the point that this amendment was not duly allowed, and therefore cannot be considered."

[2-4] 2. Should the trial court have allowed the set-off of the usurious interest "charged and reserved" by the national bank on the previous notes against the note in suit, or should he have limited the ruling on that point to the amount of the usury paid on the particular note in suit? It is clearly inferable from the evidence that all of the usurious interest on all the notes in question, including the one in suit, was charged and reserved by the national bank when the notes were first made and when they were renewed from time to time by the defendant, and the evidence shows that the principal of all of the previous notes and the interest, including the usurious interest, had been fully paid by the defendant to the national bank. The defendant insists that upon the note in suit he was entitled to a credit of the aggregate amount of all the sums of usury paid by him, within the statute of limitations, on the previous notes as well as the note in suit. He bases his contention upon the law of set-off under the Code. Section 4340 of the Civil Code (1910) provides that as "between the parties themselves any mutual demands, existing at the time of the commencement of the suit, may be set-off"; and the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error insists that the excess of interest in the previous notes, as well as in the note in suit, constitutes a demand which may be recovered either by a plea or a separate suit. Was the usury which the national bank charged and reserved on the previous notes, and which the evidence showed was paid in full to the national bank by the defendant, a mutual demand existing at the time of the commencement of the suit between the plaintiff and the defendant? What is the meaning of the words "mutual demands," in the section referred to?

"The word 'mutual,' as applied to debts which may be the subject of set-off, necessarily imports that there must be reciprocal obligations between the parties." 5 Words and Phrases (1st Ed.) p. 4649. An obligation existed on the part of the plaintiff to exact from the defendant the legal demands which he could make on the note in suit, and the defendant had the right to demand of the plaintiff that he should have a credit of the usury in the said note. But where was there any obligation on the part of the plaintiff to allow the defendant a credit on the previous notes, which the evidence does not show that the plaintiff had ever held as transferee or otherwise, and upon which usurious interest had been fully paid by the defendant to another party? Under the national bank law, as he had fully paid the usury to the national bank, he might have had the right, in a separate suit, to sue for and recover the amount actually paid to that bank. Haseltine v. Central Bank of Springfield, 183 U. S. 132, 22 Sup. Ct. 50, 46 L. Ed. 118. But even as to the national bank, having actually paid the usurious interest to that bank, he could not set it off in a suit brought by the bank against him, but he would be confined to the remedy of a direct suit for the debt. In Zeigler v. Scott, 10 Ga. 389, 54 Am. Dec. 395, it is said:

"Usury paid on a former contract may be pleaded as a set-off to the existing debt, provided it be not barred by the statute of limitations."

In that case it appears that the former contract infected with usury was between the same parties as in the suit to which it was held that the set-off could be pleaded. And in the case of Angier v. Smith, 101 Ga. 844, 28 S. E. 167, it was held that the defense of usury was good even against a bona fide holder for value of a negotiable promissory note who acquired the title to the note before its maturity, but in that case the usury was in the note which had been transferred for value and which was in suit. The taint of usury in a note remains in it even after it has been transferred to a bona fide holder for value before due, but it cannot be the law that the amount of usury in one note, or in a dozen notes, paid by the defendant to other persons, can be set off by him as a legitimate claim, when he is sued by another on a different note. To illustrate by the facts of the present case: If, as a matter of law, the defendant has the right as against the plaintiff to set off the amounts of usury contained in the notes which he had previously made and paid in full to the national bank, it would allow him to collect from the plaintiff, a stranger to all the other contracts, more than half of the principal of the note of which he was the bona fide holder. We are therefore of the opinion that the learned trial judge did not commit any error in limiting the set-off to which the plaintiff in error was entitled to the amount of the usury which was contained in the note in suit, and in refusing to allow him as a set-off the usurious interest which he had paid to the City National Bank of Dublin on the other notes.

Judgment affirmed.

LAMB v. FULTON BAG & COTTON MILLS.
(No. 12037.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 28, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Master and servant §316(1)—“Independent contractor” defined.

When a person is employed to do specific work and is in the exercise of a distinct and independent employment, and in the execution of this specific work is not under the immediate supervision and control of his employer, and the manner of doing the work and the employment, payment, and control of the labor is left entirely to the employee, the relation of master and servant does not exist; the party employed being an independent contractor. Moll on Independent Contractors and Employers' Liability, §§ 13, 14, 15, and 16.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Independent Contractor.]

2. Master and servant §316(2)—Building repairer held independent contractor, liable for minor's unlawful employment.

The defendant corporation, the owner of cotton mills, made a contract for the repair of the roof of its buildings with one who was specially engaged in that line of work. By the terms of the contract the defendant agreed to pay a fixed sum to the contractor and was to furnish a portion of the material to be used in the doing of the work. All the particulars in connection with the doing of the work, the employment, payment, and control of the labor, and the direction and supervision of the work, were left entirely to the contractor. A minor under 14 years of age was employed by the contractor to help make the repairs, for which he was to be paid by the contractor a certain wage. The defendant had nothing to do with the selection of the minor, had no authority to discharge him, and did not direct him in the manner of doing his work. While engaged in this work he fell off the roof of the building and was killed. Held, the minor was not a servant of the defendant corporation at the time of his death, and the defendant was not responsible for his wrongful employment, and not liable in damages to his widowed mother for his death. Civ. Code 1910, §§ 4414, 4415, subd. 5; Harris v. McNamara, 97 Ala. 181, 12 South. 103; Casement v. Brown, 148 U. S. 615, 13 Sup. Ct. 672, 37 L. Ed. 582.

3. Master and servant §332(3) — Nonsuit properly granted on ground of employment by independent contractor.

The evidence substantially stated above showing clearly that the plaintiff's minor son was not the servant of the defendant corporation at the time of his death, but was the servant of the independent contractor, and this being the controlling question in the case, there was no error in the award of a nonsuit.

4. Decision of other questions unnecessary.

The existence of the relation of master and servant between the plaintiff's minor son at the time of his death and the defendant corporation being a condition precedent to the right to recover either for the loss of the minor's services during his minority or for the value of his life, arising from his wrongful employment or from negligence, and it being proved by the plaintiff's evidence that this relation did not exist, it is unnecessary to decide the questions raised by the assignments of error as to the sustaining of the demurrers to the first and third counts of the petition.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by Mrs. D. A. Lamb against the Fulton Bag & Cotton Mills. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Suit was brought in the city court of Atlanta by Mrs. Lamb against the Fulton Bag & Cotton Mills seeking to recover damages for the wrongful death of her minor son. The declaration contained four counts. A demurrer was filed to all of the counts, which was sustained by the court as to counts 1, 3, and 4, and overruled as to count 2. Exceptions pendente lite were preserved as to the judgment sustaining the demurrer as to counts 1 and 3. No exception was taken to the judgment on the demurrer as to count 4. The case went to trial on count 2, and at the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence on motion of the defendant a nonsuit was granted. The substantial allegations on count 2, to which the evidence applied, were that John and did buy from him a certain lot of pine timber, consisting mostly of original forest or long leaf pine timber and partly of short leaf pine timber; that since said contract was made defendant has cut from the land, sawed into lumber, and hauled away the greater part of said timber, and the defendant has had free access at the timber now uncut, and could have cut it at almost any time since the summer of 1909, and now is at liberty to cut it at any time it may so desire."

The record does not show what the pleadings of the purchasers were in defense of the former suit, or that the cause was terminated by any judgment. It merely appears to have been compromised or adjusted in some way by the parties without going to judgment.

In October, 1918, Florence, Phillips & Co. brought against Newsome the present suit for $500 damages, alleging that he has refused and now refuses to allow them to enter his land and cut the remaining timber. The suit expressly pleads and relies upon the alleged contract as set forth by Newsome in his former suit against them, as above quoted. The gist of Newsome's defense was that, since the contract of sale did not prescribe when the timber was to be removed, the plaintiffs were required to cut and remove it within a reasonable time, which they had failed to do. The jury found for the defendant. The court denied a motion for new trial.

Error is assigned because, in admitting in evidence as an admission the third paragraph of Newsome's former petition, the court limited the consideration of this evidence by the jury to the sole purpose of establishing the fact that timber was sold by Newsome. Upon this the court ruled as follows:

"I am admitting it because it is admissible for one purpose only. It is admissible solely as a declaration upon the part of the defendant in this action that he sold some timber. Whether or not he sold this timber I do not know. It has probative value solely as a declaration upon the part of the defendant here that he sold some timber to these plaintiffs. It is not binding upon anybody. It is not an estoppel. The declaration he may have made in that suit is admissible for that purpose."

Counsel for plaintiffs thereupon agreed to such restriction by stating:

"That is what we are offering it for. If it had never gone to judgment or been tried, if it is shown to have been drawn at Mr. Newsome's instance, it is admissible. Its only probative value is to establish the one disputed issue here. Any declaration, statement, written court record, or anything else that is any suggestion at all or intimation that there was a contract between the parties, is admissible for the purpose of establishing the contract."

Error is also assigned on the court's charge with reference to this evidence:

"I merely tell you that the suit that Newsome brought against the plaintiff in this case could not be construed as alleging that the contract was that they might cut the timber at any time. That suit is admitted in evidence to the jury solely for the purpose of letting it have such probative effect as it might have as to the issue in the case as to whether or not Newsome actually sold the timber to the plaintiffs or not. You will look to the other evidence in the case to determine the terms and stipulations in the contract as to when the timber was to be cut, and not to that declaration."

Immediately following the language complained of in the final sentence quoted, the court, however, further said:

"You may consider everything in that petition as bearing and shedding light upon that issue, as to whether he should cut it within a reasonable time, indefinite time, or at any time, but that language is not an express allegation or admission that that was the original contract between the parties."

Plaintiffs also assigned error, "because all of the evidence offered on behalf of" Newsome "is insufficient to carry the burden imposed upon him by law of showing that" they "did not offer to cut the timber within a reasonable time."

M. C. Barwick, of Louisville, for plaintiff in error.

Phillips & Abbot, of Louisville, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, P. J. [1-3] 1. In a sale of timber growing on a described tract or parcel of land, where the deed or contract of sale expressly provides for its removal "at any time," an estate in fee passes to the vendee, with such an interest in the soil as will be sufficient for its growth, although the fee in the soil remains in the vendor; and such an estate is not terminated and forfeited by the failure of the vendee to remove the trees in a reasonable time. North Georgia Co. v. Bebee, 128 Ga. 563, 57 S. E. 873. But where such a conveyance or contract is silent as to the time within which the timber shall be removed, an implication arises that such right is to be exercised within a reasonable time from the date of the sale; and on failure so to do the interest of the vendee in the timber ceases. McRae v. Stillwell, Millen & Co., 111 Ga. 65 (1a), 36 S. E. 604, 55 L. R. A. 513; Goette v. Lane, 111 Ga. 400, 36 S. E. 758; Shippen Bros. Lumber Co. v. Gates, 136 Ga. 37(1), 70 S. E. 672; Mills & Williams v. Ivey, 3 Ga. App. 557(2), 60 S. E. 299. In such a case what amounts to a reasonable time is a question of fact for the jury, to be decided in the light of all the facts and circumstances of the transaction. Allison v. Wall, 121 Ga. 822, 49 S. E. 831; Branch v. Johnson, 9 Ga. App. 699, 700, 71 S. E. 1123, and cases cited supra.

[4-6] 2. When a person has assumed a certain position in a litigation, and has succeeded in maintaining it through a judgment or decision of the court, or through the acquiescence of the opposite party, to his detriment, he will not be permitted to assume a contrary position in a subsequent suit between the same parties relating to the same subject-matter. Haber-Blum-Bloch Hat Co. v. Friesleben, 5 Ga. App. 123, 62 S. E. 712; Luther v. Clay, 100 Ga. 236, 28 S. E. 46, 39 L. R. A. 95; Davis v. Wakelee, 156 U. S. 689, 15 Sup. Ct. 555, 39 L. Ed. 578; section 5736, Civil Code. Thus, where, under a suit on a contract, the plaintiff obtains a judgment or relief amounting to an adjudication in his favor, and is afterwards himself sued for a subsequent breach upon his own part of the same contract, he cannot be heard to deny the essential terms of the contract, as pleaded in the former petition and under which he had recovered. In the instant case, however, this principle does not have proper application, for the reason that the specific allegation contained in the former petition, upon which the present plaintiffs now rely as establishing one of the terms of the original contract, was not so pleaded in the former suit, and the trial judge was therefore correct in holding that the doctrine of estoppel did not apply, but properly allowed the previous allegations to be considered by the jury as in the nature of a possible admission, shedding light in this way upon the question as to what constituted the true agreement in respect to the feature of the contract now in dispute. Printup v. Patton & Jackson, 91 Ga. 422, 18 S. E. 311; Lamar v. Pearre, 90 Ga. 377, 17 S. E. 92; St. Paul Fire Ins. Co. v. Brunswick Grocery Co., 113 Ga. 786 (2), 39 S. E. 483; Sons & Daughters of Job v. Wilson, 4 Ga. App. 235 (1), 61 S. E. 134; Tison v. South Ga. Ry. Co., 8 Ga. App. 91(2), 68 S. E. 651; Civil Code 1910, §§ 5775, 5776.

3. The jury in the instant case having been authorized to find that the original contract of sale did not provide that the vendee was privileged to remove the timber at any time, and the trial judge having fairly submitted to the jury the question as to what amounted to a reasonable time under the facts and circumstances of the present case, and their verdict in favor of the defendant being authorized by the evidence, the court did not err in refusing the grant of a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

CRAWFORD v. ENGLISH. (No. 11966.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 26, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Petition in action for commissions held not subject to demurrer.

The allegations of the petition set forth a cause of action, and there was no error in over-ruling the demurrer on all of the grounds, general and special.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. Brokers §56(3)—Owner cannot defeat right to commissions by making sale personally to purchaser procured by broker.

Under Civ. Code 1910, § 3587, providing that a broker's commissions are earned when he finds a purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy and offering to buy on the owner's terms, and that placing property in the hands of a broker does not prevent a sale by the owner, the owner cannot deprive the agent of commissions by making a personal sale to a customer procured through the activities of the agent.

3. Brokers §55(1)—Right to commissions not inconsistent with fiduciary relationship to another broker formerly employing plaintiff, whose contract was terminated.

Where P. had an exclusive agency for the sale of land and employed plaintiff to assist in selling the land, and, after the expiration of the contract, the owner contracted with plaintiff to procure a purchaser, and he procured one with whom he had come in touch while working for P., his entire right to commissions was not inconsistent with his fiduciary relationship with P.

4. Brokers §82(1)—Petition in action for commissions held not to show contract unilateral.

In a broker's action for commissions, the petition, alleging that it was expressly agreed that described property was to be sold for a specified price net to the owner, that plaintiff undertook to sell it by a specified date for a specified commission, and that all of such terms were agreed to by defendant, and that plaintiff had fully performed the contract, was not demurrable as showing that the contract was unilateral.

5. Brokers §82(1)—Petition in action for commissions held sufficiently to describe land.

The petition in a broker's action for commissions sufficiently describes the land sold as 1,400 acres located in two named counties on which defendant then resided, and which he subsequently sold to M., and being land on a specified public road through which the line between such two counties passed, which M. now owns and is in possession of.

6. Brokers §43(3)—Description of land need not be as complete as in deed.

The description of property placed in the hands of a broker for sale need not be as definite and complete as that which should be given in deeds of conveyance.

Error from City Court of Americus; W. M. Harper, Judge.

Action by W. L. English against John Crawford. Judgment overruling all demurrers to the petition except one, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

W. L. English sued John Crawford for commissions on the sale of certain real estate placed in his hands by Crawford. The original petition alleges, in substance, that on June 30, 1919, Crawford entered into a contract with J. H. Purvis (a copy of which is attached to the petition) in which he gave to Purvis the exclusive right to sell 1,400 acres of land in Sumter and Schley counties, at an agreed price and upon stated terms; that Purvis employed the petitioner to aid him in his efforts to sell the land in pursuance of the terms of the contract, and also employed for the same purpose one P. D. Willford, and the three of them worked together from the date of the contract with Purvis until the date of its expiration on September 30th; that the petitioner, while associated with Purvis, had frequent communications with one R. L. McMath with reference to the purchase of the property, and took him over it on several occasions; and that after September 30th, when the contract with Purvis expired by its terms, the petitioner had several conferences with Crawford, who wanted him to continue his efforts to sell the property, as he was quite anxious to dispose of it, under the same terms as contained in the contract with Purvis, but he refused to do this, and advised Crawford that he would do all in his power to sell the property, on condition that Crawford would pay him the usual commission of 5 per cent. for making the sale.

By an amendment to his petition the plaintiff alleged that on the expiration of the Purvis contract the defendant made a specific written contract with him, in which the defendant employed him to sell the property in question at $50 per acre net cash, and agreed to pay him 5 per cent. commission, the property which he placed in his hands for sale being described as "1,400 acres of land located in Sumter and Schley counties, Ga., on which the said John Crawford then resided, and which he subsequently sold to R. L. McMath, and being the place in said two counties on the Bumphead public road and the Sumter and Schley county line passing through same, which the said R. L. McMath now owns and is in possession of."

The petition alleges the following understanding and agreement with John Crawford: That the petitioner continued to keep the said R. L. McMath as a customer, whom he had first interested in the property under the Purvis contract, and advised Crawford that R. L. McMath was interested, and that he felt sure that he could sell him the property; that he was in constant communication with the said McMath, had frequent conferences with him up to the day immediately prior to the closing of the deal between Crawford and the said McMath, and that he had a conference with the son of the said McMath in reference to the sale to McMath on the day before the closing of the sale by Crawford to McMath, and that, while the petitioner was not present when the papers were actually drawn and had not been notified by Crawford to be present; he had procured the purchaser who actually bought and paid for the said property in cash under the terms given to the petitioner by Crawford; that the property was sold by Crawford to the petitioner's purchaser, and the suit is brought to recover the 5 per cent. upon the purchase price according to the stipulations of the contract made by the petitioner with Crawford.

The defendant filed general and special demurrers, contending that the allegations of the petition do not clearly and distinctly set forth a cause of action, that the contract attached to the petition is not a contract in the petitioner's own name, and that there is no assignment of it, and that the plaintiff has no contractual rights thereunder as against the defendant; that the suit seeks to recover on an express contract and at the same time seeks to recover on a quantum meruit, and these are not such rights as can be pleaded in one and the same suit; that the contract attached to the suit is not a valid contract, in that its terms are too indefinite to be the basis of a suit, there being no definite terms stated in the contract giving to Purvis the right to sell the property alleged to have been sold, and no description of the property placed with Purvis for sale; that there is no description of the property alleged to have been sold either in the contract attached to the petition or in the petition itself; that the terms on which the property is to be sold by the plaintiff are not alleged; that the suit is duplicitous and seeks to recover on an express and an implied contract; and that the paragraphs of the petition are so intermingled, referring to both express and implied contracts, that it is impossible to distinguish the one from the other.

After the amendment to the petition had been filed, the defendant renewed the demurrer as amended, on the same grounds and on the additional ground that the contract set out in the amendment was unilateral and not binding on the defendant, in that there were no corresponding obligations resting upon the plaintiff; that there was no consideration shown for the making of the contract; that there is a misjoinder of causes of action, in that the original petition seeks to recover on an implied contract and the amendment seeks to recover on an express contract; and that the original petition shows that one Purvis had the exclusive contract of sale of the land and that the defendant was working under Purvis and under Purvis' contract, and no right of recovery was shown in the plaintiff. The court sustained the demurrer as to paragraph 11, which was demurred to as being an effort to recover in the same action on both an express and implied contract, and overruled all the other grounds of demurrer.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [2] 1. Where property is placed in a broker's hands for the purpose of sale, the broker's commissions are earned when, during the agency, he finds a purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy, and who actually offers to buy, on the terms stipulated by the owner. This is a right given to brokers by statute, which has so frequently been emphasized by the decisions of the Supreme Court and this court that it seems that citation of authorities is unnecessary. Civil Code 1910, § 3587; Harvil v. Wilson Bros., 11 Ga. App. 156, 74 S. E. 845. The right of an owner to sell property which has been placed in the hands of a broker for sale, unless it be otherwise agreed, is also recognized by statute, and this right has also been upheld by decisions of this court and of the Supreme Court. But this right of the owner does not authorize him to take advantage of the work of his agent in procuring a purchaser for the property, nor to breach his contract with the agent and deprive the agent of commissions which have been earned under the contract, by himself making a personal sale to the customer who has been procured by the activities of the agent; in other words, where the agent has procured a customer or purchaser by his efforts in that behalf, the owner cannot deprive him of his commissions by completing the sale of which the agent was the producing cause. The law contemplates that the owner shall assert his right to sell his property only on condition that he will do so without a breach of the contract made with his agent. Brown & Peeples v. Stokes, 25 Ga. App. —, 103 S. E. 423; Doonan v. Ives & Krouse, 73 Ga. 295.

[3] 2. The objection is made by the demurrer that the plaintiff had no right to sell the property for his own benefit, because the previous contract made with Purvis to sell the same property and his employment by Purvis to aid him in such sale are in conflict with the allegations of the petition on this subject. These allegations showed that the contract made with Purvis by the defendant had expired by its express limitation before the contract made with the plaintiff; that after the expiration of the Purvis contract the defendant made a different contract with the plaintiff for the sale of the property, and it is manifest that reference to the Purvis contract is only by way of inducement to show how the plaintiff came in touch with R. L. McMath, who subsequently became the purchaser of the property as the result of the negotiations with him by the petitioner, which were commenced under the Purvis contract and which were completed under the petitioner's individual contract with the defendant. There is no allegation in the petition which justifies the criticism made by the demurrer that the plaintiff's alleged right to recover his commissions was inconsistent with his fiduciary relationship with Purvis under his (Purvis') contract, for the allegations of the petition as to this point and the express terms of the Purvis contract show that the Purvis contract had expired by its own limitations, and that the plaintiff's services were rendered under his own contract, made with the defendant after the expiration of the Purvis contract.

[4] 3. There is no merit whatever in the criticism, made by the supplemental demurrer, that the contract was unilateral. Both the contract with Purvis and the special contract subsequently made with the plaintiff, under which his rights accrued, are explicit as to the terms and conditions. It was expressly agreed, according to these allegations, that the described property was to be sold for the express price of $50 per acre cash to the owner net, and that the plaintiff undertook to do this by the 1st day of January thereafter for the agreed commission of 5 per cent., and the allegation is expressly made that all of these terms were agreed to by the defendant after they had been proposed by the plaintiff, and that, after the contract had been thus agreed on, the plaintiff had fully performed his part thereof and had earned his commissions as therein stipulated.

[5, 6] Nor is there any merit in the criticism of the demurrer that the property to be sold was not sufficiently described. Indeed, we think that the description of the property was entirely sufficient to identify the property placed with the agent for sale even without the aid of allunde evidence. We do not think that the description of property placed in the hands of a broker for sale needs to be as definite and complete as that which should be made in deeds of conveyances.

[1] After giving to all the grounds of the demurrer careful consideration, in connection with the allegations of the petition that are specified, with the exception of the one sustained by the trial judge, we are of the opinion that none had merit. The allegations of the petition clearly, distinctly, and sufficiently set forth a cause of action and a right of recovery, if proved, under the rules of law embodied in the Code section referred to in this opinion and the repeated rulings of the Supreme Court and this court in relation thereto.

Judgment affirmed.

GREENBERG & BOND CO. v. YARBROUGH. (No. 11774.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 28, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Master and servant \S 301(4) — Servant, hired for particular employment to third person, is his servant.

Where a person hires his servant to another for a particular employment, the servant, for anything done in that particular employment, must be dealt with as the servant of the person to whom he is hired, although he remains the general servant of the person who hired him.

2. Master and servant \S 301(4)—Undertaker hiring automobiles with chauffeurs held liable for their negligence.

Where an undertaker is employed to conduct a funeral and to furnish automobiles in that service, and he hires from a taxicab company the automobiles, with chauffeurs furnished by the taxicab company, and the undertaker has the exclusive right to direct the mode and manner in which the chauffeurs shall perform the special service in connection with the funeral, and as to the funeral the chauffeurs are under the exclusive control of the undertaker, the chauffeurs become particular servants of the undertaker, and he is liable for their acts of negligence.

3. Master and servant \S 330(3), 332(4) — Liability of hirer for chauffeur's negligence sufficiently defined and shown.

The instructions of the trial judge as to the test by which the jury could determine who was the master at the time the act of negligence was performed by the servant were correct, and the verdict for the plaintiff, if it was not demanded, was amply supported by the evidence.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; John B. Hutcheson, Judge.

Action by Mrs. L. T. Yarbrough against the Greenberg & Bond Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. L. Anderson and Westmoreland & Smith, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Hewlett & Dennis, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. Greenberg & Bond Company was employed by two brothers to conduct the funeral of their mother, to furnish the coffin and robes and automobiles, and in general to see that the funeral was properly conducted. Greenberg & Bond Company did not itself own automobiles but was in the habit of hiring them, in connection with its business, from the Smith Taxicab Company and others. There is some conflict in the evidence on the question as to whether the automobiles used in the funeral were engaged by Greenberg & Bond Company at the request and as the agent of the two brothers when they made the contract with the former for the funeral services; Greenberg & Bond Company insisting that these automobiles were hired by it as agent of the brothers, who had instructed it to do so, and this was all well known by them when the contract was made as it had ordered the automobiles at their request and while they were in their offices arranging for the funeral. The two brothers, on the contrary, testified that they knew nothing whatever about the automobiles ordered by the Greenberg & Bond Company, or that it had hired them from other parties, and that they had no knowledge whatever on the subject, and had never heard of the Smith Taxicab Company furnishing automobiles to Greenberg & Bond Company until some time after the funeral. The plaintiff below was a relative of the deceased mother and a sister of the two brothers who had made the contract for the funeral services, and she occupied one of the automobiles to the cemetery, and from the cemetery after the burial services were completed. While she was in the automobile, in company with several others, on the way back from the funeral, she was injured by the negligent driving of the chauffeur, who negligently ran into a telephone pole on the side of the road while he was exceeding the statutory speed limit. The verdict was for the plaintiff, and case is before this court on exceptions to the overruling of the defendant's motion for a new trial. The controlling question is whether, under the evidence, the driver of the automobile was the servant of Greenberg & Bond Company at the time of the injury caused by his negligence, or whether he was the servant of the Smith Taxicab Company, who had furnished the automobile and the chauffeur to the undertakers for the funeral in question. The motion for a new trial contains several specific grounds, but in the view we take of the case they are not material, for the case turns upon the question above stated: Who was the master of the chauffeur at the time of the injury? The trial judge submitted this question, under instructions, to be determined by the jury, and the question is raised by the plaintiff in error as to the soundness of these instructions, which will be considered later in this opinion.

[1] It is well established that—

"The fact that an employee is the general servant of one employer does not, as matter of law, prevent him from becoming the particular servant of another, who may become liable for his acts. And it is true as a general proposition that when one person lends his servant to another for a particular employment (or hires him), the servant, for anything done in that particular employment, must be dealt with as the servant of the man to whom he is lent (or hired), although he remains the general servant of the person who lent him (or hired him)." 18 R. C. L. 784.

Wood, in his work on Master and Servant, § 317, quoted with approval by the Supreme Court of this state in Brown v. Smith & Kelly, 86 Ga. 277, 12 S. E. 411, 22 Am. St. Rep. 456, says:

"The real test by which to determine whether a person is acting as the servant of another is to ascertain whether at the time when the injury was inflicted he was subject to such person's orders and control, and was liable to be discharged by him for disobedience of orders or misconduct."

Labatt, in his treatise on the subject of Master and Servant (2d Ed.) § 52, says:

"One person may be taken to have been the servant of another in respect of a given transaction, although he did not occupy that position for all purposes. In order to establish the relationship, it is merely necessary to show that he was a servant as regards the particular piece of work in which he was engaged at the time when he sustained or inflicted the injury complained of. * * * The special master is alone liable to third persons for injuries caused by such wrongful acts as the special servant may commit in the course of his employment."

And in Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 162, it is said:

"If the hirer is vested for the time with the exclusive right to discharge the servants and employ others, he alone is responsible for their defaults."

In the case of Byrne v. K. C., F. S. & M. R. Co., 61 Fed. 607, 9 C. C. A. 669, 24 L. R. A. 690, Judge Taft uses the following language:

"The question is one of agency. The result is determined by the answer to the further questions. Whose work was the servant doing? and, Under whose control was he doing it?"

In that case the railway company rented its engine to a bridge company for use in the performance of certain services, the bridge company paying the railway company $10 a day for its use and the expense of the fuel and supplies used in the running of the engine. In the conduct of the work done by the engine it was under the control of the superintendent of the bridge company. As this superintendent expressed it, "The bridge company rented the crew along with the engine from the railway company." The engine, while being thus operated, ran over and killed Nason, whose administrator, Byrne, brought suit against the railway company for damages, Judge Taft, speaking for the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, said:

"On this state of facts we are clearly of the opinion that the court was right in holding that 106 S.E.—40 the railway company was not responsible for the acts of the engineer and fireman in running the engine which killed Nason. They were, it is true, general servants of the railway company, but at the time of the accident they were engaged in the work of the bridge company, were subject to the orders of the bridge company's officers, and in what they did or failed to do were acting for the bridge company."

There are a great many other decisions in point. Indeed the trouble has not been in the principle of law, which seems to be uniform, but in the application of the particular facts to the principle which has given rise to the great number of conflicting decisions on the question under consideration. Judge Lurton quotes with approval the language of Chief Justice Cockburn in Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co., 2 C. P. Div. 205, as follows:

"When one person lends his servant to another for a particular employment, the servant, for anything done in that particular employment, must be dealt with as the servant of the man to whom he was lent, although he remains the general servant of the person who lent him."

See, also, Powell v. Va. Construction Co., 88 Tenn. 692, 13 S. W. 691, 17 Am. St. Rep. 921. The relation of master and servant exists only when the person whom it is sought to charge as master for the act of the servant either employed or controlled him, or had the right of control over him, at the time the injury sued for happened. To make the master responsible he must not only have the power to select the servant, but to direct the mode of executing the work and so to control him in his acts in the course of his employment as to prevent injury to others. He who has the choice, direction, and control of the servant is deemed to be the master, and whether or not the relation of master and servant exists so as to render the rule of respondeat superior applicable depends mainly on whether the employer retains the direction and control of the work, or has given it to another person. Brown v. Smith, 86 Ga. 274, 12 S. E. 411, 22 Am. St. Rep. 456.

[2] Applying these principles to the facts in this case, was the negligent chauffeur, at the time of his act of negligence which caused the injury to the plaintiff, the servant of Greenberg & Bond Company, or was he the servant of the Smith Taxicab Company? Unquestionably he was the general servant of the Smith Taxicab Company. Was he the special servant of Greenberg & Bond Company? It is insisted by counsel for the plaintiff in error that he was not the servant of Greenberg & Bond Company at the time of the injury because all that Greenberg & Bond Company did by way of control of the chauffeur, in the performance of his duty as chauffeur was to give him general directions to take certain persons to the funeral, and, after the funeral services at the cemetery, to take them back home or where they desired to go, and that this was not sufficient control and direction to raise the relation of master and servant at that time, and they invoke the well-known rule applied in what are known as the "carriage cases," mention of which is made in 24 L. R. A., cited supra. In the decision rendered by Judge Taft he distinguished those cases from the case then under consideration. He said:

"If a man lets out a carriage on hire to another, he in no sense places the coachman under the control of the hirer, except that the latter may indicate the destination to which he wishes to be driven. The coachman does not become the servant of the person he is driving, and, if the coachman acts wrongfully, the hirer can only complain to the owner of the carriage. If the hirer actively interferes with the driving, and an injury occurs to any one, the hirer may be liable, not as the master, but as the procurer and cause of the wrongful act complained of. In the present case the defendants parted for the time with control over the work of the man in charge of the crane, and their responsibility for his acts ceased for the time."

And Mr. Justice Field, in Little v. Hackett, 116 U. S. 366, 6 Sup. Ct. 391, 29 L. Ed. 652, said, in connection with these carriage cases:

"It is manifest, therefore, that they have no application whenever it appears that the master has parted to another for a time with control over his servant, to be used in the work of that other."

[3] Now the question in the present case is: Did the Smith Taxicab Company surrender to Greenberg & Bond Company the direction and control of the chauffeur and the automobile while engaged in and during the conduct of the funeral? The question is not whether Greenberg & Bond Company did exercise any other control than the giving of directions to go to the cemetery and to return therefrom, but whether it had the right, during the conduct of the funeral, to control the mode and manner in which the chauffeur was to exercise the duty for which he had been hired. Could it discharge him from that particular service for any misconduct on his part? After he had left the Smith Taxicab Company and gone into the service temporarily of Greenberg & Bond Company what control as to that service did the Smith Taxicab Company have over him? It did have a general control as to all other services that he might render it as his general master. But after hiring this chauffeur and the car to the Greenberg & Bond Company did the taxicab company have any further control over him? Could it have taken him back from the undertaker's until after the services had been completely performed?

We think not. The test is as to who controlled his services as to the particular service that he was performing when his negligent act was committed. Did not Greenberg & Bond Company at that time have the exclusive control of his movements, not only giving him general directions, but ordering him how to go, and what to do; and, if he in any wise misconducted himself in the performance of that service, could they not have discharged him therefrom? The contract for the funeral was made exclusively with the Greenberg & Bond Company by the two brothers of the deceased mother. The Greenberg & Bond Company agreed to furnish everything necessary to conduct the funeral as desired by its employers. These employers had no contractual relation whatever with the Smith Taxicab Company, and, according to their evidence, had no knowledge about the automobiles; and as to this the verdict of the jury must be accepted as the truth. But we do not deem it necessary to discuss this phase of the question further. It must be conceded that, under the facts of this case and in light of the decisions cited above, the negligent chauffeur was, at the time of the commission of his act of negligence, in the service of the Greenberg & Bond Company. The trial judge left this question to the determination of the jury, under instructions which, we think, presented the correct test as to when the relationship of master and servant arises. His instructions were as follows:

"If you should find that the defendant hired the automobile in question from the auto company, or any other person, who furnished a driver with the machine, and that the Smith Auto Company, or person from whom they hired it, did completely surrender to the defendant, Greenberg & Bond Company, the control of the driver so that the Smith Auto Company or other party hiring it could not exercise any control whatever over him, the driver in that case would be the servant of the defendant, and the defendant would be responsible for the negligence of the driver, if you find there was any negligence. But, on the other hand, if you should find that the Smith Auto Company, or whoever hired the machine in question to the defendant, furnished with the machine the driver, but did not completely surrender to the defendant the control of the driver of the machine, except that it simply gave to the defendant the right to direct where the machine was to be driven, then, in that event, the driver would be the servant of the Smith Auto Company, and the defendant would not be responsible for any negligence, if you find there was any negligence."

The evidence, applied to the issue as above indicated, fully authorized the verdict against the undertaker; for as to the particular service, to wit, the employment by Greenberg & Bond Company of the chauffeur in charge of the car, the taxicab company had fully and completely, surrendered, temporarily, all control of its servant to the undertaker.

Judgment affirmed.

SUSSEX COUNTY v. JARRATT.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
April 6, 1921.)

1. Taxation ⚡297 — Commissioner without authority to lay levy.

A commissioner cannot lay a levy of any sort, his duties being to make assessments consequent upon a properly ordered levy whether made by the General Assembly, county board of supervisors, or city council.

2. Taxation ⚡300—Statute relating to omitted taxes held not to permit board of supervisors to make levies for past years.

Code 1904, § 508, as amended by Acts 1916, c. 491, relating to omitted taxes, levies, etc., and assessments thereof, relates to assessing officers only, and is intended to increase their powers of assessment so as to include antecedent years, but does not confer upon boards of supervisors the power to make levies for years that have passed.

3. Taxation ⚡300—Statute held not to authorize nunc pro tunc levies for past years.

Code 1904, § 508, as amended by Acts 1916, c. 491, relating to omitted taxes, does not afford to the commissioners the power to make a nunc pro tunc levy of taxes for past years; the loose use of the word "levies" in several places in the body of the act, in connection with the powers and duties of assessing officers, not being sufficient to support such construction.

4. Taxation ⚡362—Statute construed as referring to act of officers collecting under assessment, but not to levying an assessment.

Under Code 1904, § 508, as amended by Acts 1916, c. 491, proviso No. 2, relating to omitted taxes, a levy or collection of assessments plainly refers, not to the legislative act of imposing a tax, but to the act of an officer collecting the tax tickets that are issued pursuant to an assessment for "taxes alleged to have been omitted from the assessments prior to 1912," but does not permit a levy.

5. Taxation ⚡362 — Commissioners not empowered by statute to tax property not assessed by proper tribunal.

Code 1904, § 508, as amended by Acts 1916, c. 491, does not empower commissioners to assess property not charged with a tax by some proper tribunal.

6. Constitutional law ⚡29 — Constitutional mandate that taxes shall be levied does not in itself impose a tax.

The mere mandate of the Constitution that taxes shall be laid on certain property by the General Assembly or board of supervisors does not of itself impose the tax, though failure to do so may be a breach of official duty, so that some positive action to that end must be taken by the legislative body to levy a tax.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Sussex County.
Upon petition for rehearing. Petition denied.

For former opinion, see 106 S. E. 384.

SAUNDERS, J. In this case the plaintiff in error, the county of Sussex, has filed a petition to rehear in which it is suggested that in reaching its conclusions announced in the opinion in this case, the court overlooked, or disregarded, the statute of 1910 (Laws 1916, c. 491) relating to omitted taxes, levies, etc. This statute is not mentioned eo nomine in the opinion, but it was neither overlooked nor disregarded.

[1] Under familiar law, a commissioner cannot lay a levy of any sort. His duties are to make the assessments consequent upon a properly ordered levy, whether the levy was made by the General Assembly, the board of supervisors of a county, or the council of a city. This principle is recognized by the petition when it says:

"County and district levies are fixed and ordered by the board of supervisors, in obedience to legislative enactments. No tax, state or local, for current or antecedent years can be assessed, or levied, without legislative authority."

[2] So much of the act as is relied upon by the petition to rehear is as follows:

"Sec. 508. Omitted Taxes, Levies, etc., How Assessed.—If the commissioner of the revenue, examiner of records, or other assessing officer, commission or board, designated by law to assess persons, property (real, personal and mixed), taxes, levies, et cetera, ascertain that any person, or any real or personal property, or income, or salary, or license tax has not been assessed for taxation for any year by the state, county, district, city or town, or that the same has been assessed at less than the law required, for any year, or that the taxes, levies, et cetera, thereon, for any cause, have not been realized, it shall be the duty of the commissioner of the revenue, examiner of records, or other assessing officer, to list the same, and assess persons, property (real, personal and mixed), and levies at the rate prescribed for that year, adding thereto interest at the rate of six per centum per annum.

"Provided however—

"(1) That all assessments of intangible personal property, money and incomes for state taxes prior to the year nineteen hundred and three shall be conclusively presumed to be full, true and correct.

"(2) No municipal, county or district tax shall be levied or collected on any assessment of intangible personal property, money or incomes for taxes alleged to have been omitted from the assessments for the years prior to nineteen hundred and twelve."

The heading of the section is, "Omitted Taxes, Levies, etc., How Assessed." The act relates to assessing officers only, and is intended to increase their powers of assessment, so as to include antecedent years. Plainly, however, this statute does not confer upon the boards of supervisors the power to make levies for the years that have passed. This power might be afforded by the General Assembly, but it should be clearly given, not derived by doubtful implication.

[3] The petition to rehear insists that this statute does afford to the supervisors the power to make a nunc pro tunc levy, as will appear from the following citations from the petition:

"We respectfully submit that section 508, as amended by the act of March 22, 1916 (Acts 1916, p. 826), both authorizes and requires a levy, if necessary, to enforce the payment of omitted county and district levies for antecedent years back to and including the year 1912. * * *

"That it also authorizes the board (i. e., the board of supervisors) to make a further levy for those years (1912, 1913, 1914) if a further levy were necessary. * * *

"That the body of the act (Act 1916) without reference to the second clause of the proviso authorizes such acts by the board of supervisors as may be necessary to give effect to the obvious purpose of the statute."

We did not and do not find anything in the statute to justify these contentions. It is true that the word "levies" is used at several places in the body of the act, but it is in relation to and in connection with the powers and duties of assessing officers. These words so used, and used somewhat loosely and inaccurately, are not sufficient to support the construction that the General Assembly intended thereby to empower the boards of supervisors—the legislative bodies of the counties—to impose taxes upon property that had not been included in the levies of antecedent years. Hence, whatever may have been the intent of the orders of the board of Sussex county, of date December 20, 1917, and January 7, 1918, they are not "new orders laying levies upon bank stock for the years 1912-13-14."

[4] Petitioner seeks to find support for his contention, supra, in proviso No. 2 of the act. The language used in this proviso is singularly inapt, if it was intended by such language to give the power to order a levy to any official, or tribunal. It is true that the word "levy" is used, but it plainly refers, not to the legislative act of imposing a tax, but to the act of an officer collecting the tax tickets that are issued pursuant to an assessment. An officer holding such tickets levies same upon the property of delinquent taxpayers. The language of the proviso is that—

"No municipal, county, or district tax shall be levied or collected on any assessment of intangible personal property," etc., "for taxes alleged to have been omitted from the assessments prior to 1912."

Taxes are not "levied on assessments"; assessments are consequent upon levies, using the word "levies" to refer to the legislative act of imposing a tax. Obviously this proviso means that if intangible personal property, alleged to have been omitted from the assessments for the years prior to the year 1912, is assessed, and tax tickets are made out pursuant to such assessments, such tickets shall not be levied and collected.

[5] The power of commissioners of the revenue to assess for omitted taxes in antecedent years is conceded in the opinion, in this case, but it was not considered that the act of 1916 empowered these officials to assess property not charged with a tax by some proper tribunal; and it is not now so considered.

[6] Petitioner to rehear renews its original contention that the word "may," in section 1040a of the Code of 1904, is mandatory, and should be read "must." For the purposes of this case, this contention was conceded in the opinion, but the mere mandate of the Constitution that taxes shall be laid on certain property by the General Assembly, or a board of supervisors, does not by itself impose the tax, though failure to do so may be a breach of duty by the officials charged therewith. Some positive action to that end must be taken by the legislative body, in this instance the board of supervisors. Hence we entered upon the inquiry whether as a matter of fact bank stock was locally taxed for the years in question. The court concluded, for reasons given in the opinion, and which need not now be repeated, that this stock was not taxed for county purposes during these years. Hence, in our view of the statute of 1916, this stock could not be either taxed, or assessed thereafter, by the local officials of Sussex county under authority, either of that, or any other, act.

The questions raised by the petition to rehear have been given careful consideration, but the conclusions heretofore reached in this case are believed to be sound, and to rest on reason and authority.

The petition is denied.

DAMECKI v. BILLS. (No. 4102.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 22, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Lis pendens ¶24(4)—One purchasing pending action of detainee is bound by judgment against his vendor.

One who purchases from a party to a pending action of detainee the subject-matter involved in the litigation takes it subject to the final disposition of the case, and is bound by the judgment that is entered against the party from whom he derived title.

2. Judgment ¶678(1), 682(2)—Binding on privies as well as parties; judgment in detainee binding on one subsequently purchasing property.

A judgment rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, after service of process upon the parties to be affected thereby, is conclusive, not only upon those who are actually parties thereto, but also upon all who are in privity with them.

3. Detainee ¶26—Sheriff's return showing payment of alternative value does not prevent recovery of property when plaintiff refuses to accept value.

In an action of detainee to recover specific property, a sheriff's return on a writ of distringas, showing execution by taking the alternative value of the property, does not preclude a plaintiff, who declines to accept such alternative value, from obtaining the specific property under another writ subsequently issued.

4. Detainee ¶26—Plaintiff not required to accept alternative value until reasonable efforts to obtain property have failed.

A plaintiff in detainee is entitled to insist on having the specific property, if obtainable, and is not required to accept the alternative value of the property recovered, on a tender made by the sheriff, until reasonable efforts to obtain the specific property have failed; but he cannot have both the property and its alternative value.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. Detainee ¶5—Judgment may be rendered for defendant entitled to possession, though possession not obtained legally.

In detainee, where it appeared that defendant was the owner of the property and justly entitled to the possession, the court might award it to him, though it appeared that he obtained possession under an alias execution on a judgment in a former suit given for enforcement to one not an officer of the circuit court.

Error to Circuit Court, Harrison County.

Action by Mikola Damecki against Joe Bills. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Harvey W. Harmer and W. M. Conaway, both of Clarksburg, for plaintiff in error.

Clarence B. Sperry, of Clarksburg, for defendant in error.

LYNCH, J. Mikola Damecki, plaintiff below and in error here, complains of a judgment for defendant in an action of detainee instituted by him to recover possession of a Jersey cow held by the defendant. At the time of the institution of the action, April 3, 1919, plaintiff filed the affidavit and bond required by law as conditions precedent to taking immediate possession of the property claimed, but defendant likewise gave the bond authorized by statute and was permitted to retain the property pending final determination of the case. In addition to the general issue plea, defendant tendered and was permitted to file a special plea setting up the defense of res adjudicata, to which plaintiff filed a special replication, followed by defendant's rejoinder. On these pleadings the case was heard and determined by the court and judgment rendered for the defendant.

The facts set forth by the special plea, replication, and rejoinder respecting the issue of res adjudicata are these: On October 25, 1917, a year and a half prior to the bringing of the present suit, defendant Bills, instituted, before a justice of the peace, an action of detainee against Melvin Monroe to recover possession of the same cow. The trial therein had resulted in a judgment for plaintiff. From that ruling Monroe appealed to the circuit court, and on January 27, 1919, a jury again found for plaintiff, Bills, and the court February 7th, pronounced judgment in the form usual in actions of this character and in accordance with the verdict, to wit, that the plaintiff recover possession of the property, if recovery thereof can be had, and, if the property may not be had, then to recover its value, fixed at $30, and the costs of the action amounting to $112.75. On the 14th execution issued, following the alternative form of the judgment, and was placed in the hands of a deputy sheriff for levy. Five days later he returned the execution with the following indorsement:

"The within execution returned with $142.75, principal and costs, the within described property not found. This the 19th day of February, 1919. Robert McClung, Deputy for Lloyd D. Griffin, Sheriff."

Upon Bills' refusal to accept the money in lieu of the cow, the officer deposited it with the clerk of the circuit court, where, presumably, it still remains. In the meantime, according to the allegations of the special plea, which are not denied in this respect, plaintiff Damecki "obtained possession of said property through an alleged purchase thereof subsequent to the institution of said suit of Joe Bills against Melvin Monroe before R. E. Kidd, justice of the peace, and subsequent to the rendition of the judgment in favor of the said Joe Bills by the said justice; and the said purchase, or pretended purchase, was from the said Melvin Monroe * * * or some other person to whom the said Monroe had sold or pretended to have sold said property." Having learned that plaintiff was in possession of the cow, Bills caused a second execution to issue March 28th, which he placed in the hands of R. M. Noon, a constable, but not an officer of the circuit court, who four days later returned the cow to Bills, with the following return:

"Executed the within writ on the 1st day of April, 1919, by taking possession of animal, one dark red cow, described in said writ, and delivered the same personally into the possession of Joe Bills, the party described in said writ as entitled thereto"—properly signed.

Two days thereafter Damecki instituted the present action.

[1, 2] The facts set forth in the various pleadings respecting the issue of res adjudicata are, in our opinion, preclusive of plaintiff's right to maintain this action. They show that some time after the judgment for Bills was rendered by the justice in the case of Bills against Monroe the latter, directly or indirectly, sold or otherwise disposed of the cow to plaintiff. The exact date of its disposition, however, does not appear, and therefore we are unable to determine whether it was before or after the judgment of February 7, 1919, rendered by the circuit court on appeal. If prior thereto and while the case was pending, plaintiff, Damecki, purchased subject to the final determination of the cause, for the common-law doctrine of lis pendens has been held in this state to apply to actions or suits affecting personal property as well as to those concerning real estate. Osborn v. Glasscock, 39 W. Va. 749, 20 S. E. 702; Dent v. Pickens, 59 W. Va. 274, 53 S. E. 154; Bank v. Columbia Collieries Co., 75 W. Va. 309, 84 S. E. 914. See, also, Rardin v. Rardin, 85 W. Va. 145, 102 S. E. 295, for a general discussion of the common-law doctrine of lis pendens. On the other hand, if the cow was sold and acquired after final judgment in the former detinue action, the determination of its ownership is res adjudicata as to him. Claiming, as he does, under and by virtue of Monroe's right, title, and interest, he is in privity with him, and therefore bound by the adjudication adverse to the former's claim. 2 Black on Judgments (2d Ed.) § 549; 1 Freeman on Judgments (4th Ed.) § 162. See, also, Gerber Co. v. Thompson, 84 W. Va. 721, 100 S. E. 733, 7 A. L. R. 157.

[3, 4] But, contends plaintiff, because Bills sued out an execution on his former judgment, which the deputy sheriff executed by collecting the alternative value of the cow, he is bound by such action of the court's officer and agent, though he did not accept the sum so collected and cannot now claim the specific chattel itself. Is the prevailing party in an action of detinue thus estopped, by what an officer may do, to continue his efforts to locate and recover the specific subject-matter of the suit, to which the verdict and judgment entitle him? That there cannot, under the circumstances obtaining in this case, be an affirmative answer to that question, seems obvious. Bills promptly declined to accept the alternative value of the cow, and apparently used all reasonable means to locate and obtain possession of the animal itself. If the successful litigant be thus deprived of the right to enforce his claim to the specific property awarded him, that affords the unsuccessful claimant too great an opportunity, by way of concealment of the chattel from the levying officer, to compel the former to accept an ascertained cash value, often grossly inadequate compensation, instead of the chattel itself. The action of detinue thus would lose much of its force and value as a proceeding for the recovery of specific property. Of course, a plaintiff cannot have both the property and its value, but he cannot be compelled to accept the latter until he has had reasonable opportunity to enforce his primary right. Ex parte Vaughan, 188 Ala. 187, 53 South. 270; 18 C. J. 1023. The specific chattel may, for various reasons, be of infinitely greater value to the successful claimant than the alternative value placed upon it by court or jury. The opinion in Ex parte Vaughan, cited, a case very similar to this, contains the following statement with regard to enforcement of judgments in actions of detinue:

"This return of his [sheriff's], however, was not conclusive upon the plaintiff, so as to prevent her from subsequently obtaining the specified property under other appropriate writs to be thereafter issued. Plaintiff was not bound to accept the alternative value in lieu of the specific property, and thereby satisfy her judgment against defendant. * * * The plaintiff is not required in detinue suits to accept the alternative value, if tendered by the defendant or the sheriff. She may decline it, if offered, and insist upon having the specific property if it can be obtained, though she cannot, of course, have both. It is not for the defendant or the sheriff to say whether the plaintiff shall have the specific chattel or the alternative value as fixed by the judgment in detinue; but this is a question for plaintiff to decide."

[5] It is contended, however, that the alias execution was improperly given for enforcement to one who was not an officer of the circuit court, and therefore that defendant, Bills, unlawfully obtained possession of the cow in question. However that may be, the animal was before the court in the present case for such disposition as it deemed just and proper in the light of the pleadings. It had full control to award it to one or the other of the contestants, and it matters little how defendant, Bills, obtained such possession, since he has shown himself to be in fact the owner of the cow and therefore justly entitled to possess it.

For the reasons assigned, we affirm the judgment.

FINE et al. v. ZIRKLE et al. (No. 4068.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 22, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Mortgages ⇨346 — Trustee under deed by judicial proceedings may remove impediment to fair sale.

It is the right and duty of a trustee in a deed of trust securing payment of a debt, before selling the property conveyed by it, to cause removal of an impediment to a fair sale thereof, by appropriate judicial proceedings, when the circumstances are such as will likely prevent realization of a fair price therefor, and the other interested parties have not instituted such proceedings.

2. Mortgages ⇨338 — Sale by trustee without removing impediment to fair sale may be enjoined.

An attempted sale under such circumstances, without previous removal of the impediment, will be enjoined.

3. Mortgages ⇨346 — Facts held to show impediment to fair sale under junior deed of trust.

Sale of property incumbered by two deeds of trust, in a suit to enforce judgment liens thereon, to which the trustee and creditor in the junior deed of trust were not made parties, application of the proceeds of the sale on the debt secured by the senior deed of trust, and a subsequent conveyance of the property by the purchaser to strangers to all of the transactions, constitute an impediment to a fair sale thereof under the junior deed of trust.

4. Mortgages ⇨338 — Debtor under deed of trust held proper party to suit to enjoin sale thereunder.

In such case the debtor is a proper party to a suit instituted by the grantee in such subsequent conveyance to enjoin a sale of the property under the second deed of trust.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County.

Suit by Reuben Fine and others against John H. Zirkle, trustee, and others, to enjoin a sale under a deed of trust. Decree for complainants, and from an order refusing to dissolve the injunction, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. C. McIntire and John H. Zirkle, both of Martinsburg, for appellants.

C. N. Campbell, of Martinsburg, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. The appellants in this cause, one of whom is a trustee in a deed of trust involved and the other the trustee in bankruptcy of the creditor secured by that deed of trust, undertook to sell and cause to be sold the property therein conveyed, after it had been sold to persons under whom the appellees claim, by virtue of a decree in a suit to enforce judgment liens against the debtor, to which the trustee and his cestui que trust were not parties; and, on the bill of the appellees, the attempted sale under the deed of trust was temporarily enjoined and a motion to dissolve the injunction overruled. From the order refusing to dissolve it, this appeal was taken.

The property in question is an undivided one-fourth of a 200-acre farm situated in Jefferson county, W. Va., which was devised by William M. Shepherd, to four of his nephews, James H., Robert L., Francis H., and Alexander V. Shepherd. An undivided one-half interest therein was conveyed by Francis H. and Alexander V. Shepherd to George M. Beltzhoover and Clarence V. Martin, trustees, to secure a $1,200 debt to the Jefferson Security Bank, a corporation, by a deed of trust dated September 30, 1909. It is claimed by the Shepherds that this debt was the debt of Alexander V. Shepherd, and that Francis H. Shepherd was his surety therefor. On September 1, 1910, Alexander V. Shepherd executed a deed of trust by which he conveyed his undivided one-fourth of the tract of land to John H. Zirkle, trustee, to secure to the National Commercial Company, a corporation, a debt amounting to $464.71. Shortly after the execution of that deed of trust some small judgments were recovered against the grantor therein, and, in December 1910, O. Ferrari, one of the judgment creditors, instituted a suit in Jefferson county for enforcement of the lien of his judgment on the real estate of Shepherd, making the Jefferson Security Bank and its trustees parties. For some reason the National Commercial Company and its trustee were not made parties, although the deed of trust seems to have been recorded in Jefferson county. That suit was prosecuted to a decree of sale under which the debtor's cotenants, James H., Robert L., and Francis H. Shepherd, became the purchasers, at the price of $1,200, the exact amount of the debt of the Jefferson Security Bank, out of which the costs and commissions were paid, and the balance, $1,116.60, was credited on that debt. All of the judgments seem to have been paid by the debtor or some person for him before the sale, and the Jefferson Security Bank's debt was then the only one that had been decreed to be a lien on the property. By a deed dated April 22, 1919, Francis H., James H., and Robert L. Shepherd conveyed the entire 200-acre tract of land to the appellees Reuben Fine and C. V. Cline for and in consideration of the sum of $5 and other good and valuable considerations.

In 1917 the National Commercial Company became bankrupt, and A. C. McIntire was appointed its trustee in bankruptcy in the bankruptcy proceeding. At his instance the trustee in the deed of trust of September 1, 1910, advertised the one-fourth undivided interest of Alexander V. Shepherd in the 200-acre tract of land for sale at auction November 22, 1919. Thereupon the appellees herein, Reuben Fine and C. V. Cline, purchasers of the entire tract of land, instituted this suit to enjoin the sale, and an injunction was awarded on their bill November 18, 1919. A motion to dissolve it was made December 10, 1919, but it was continued to December 18, 1919. On December 10 Zirkle and McIntire, trustees, tendered their separate answers to the bill. On December 18 the motion was heard upon the papers previously filed, the affidavits of Reuben Fine, James H. Shepherd, and John H. Zirkle, and the petition of Alexander V. Shepherd, all of which were then filed, and continued. On March 2, 1920, it was overruled.

While there is some conflict in the pleadings and affidavits filed respecting the status of the National Commercial Company's debt, the relation thereto of the trustee, and his conduct with reference to said judicial sale, there is not much controversy, if any, respecting the other facts herein stated. Both of the answers of the trustees deny the validity of the sale in so far as it affects the rights of the National Commercial Company and the trustee in its deed of trust, and pray affirmative relief. Both admit the payment of $280 on account of the National Commercial Company's debt and interest. John H. Zirkle, trustee, in an affidavit filed by him denies the averment of Alexander V. Shepherd's petition that accounts were assigned to him as collateral security for the balance of the debt. He admits that certain accounts were placed in his hands as an attorney by Shepherd for collection, but denies that they were taken as collateral security for the debt in question, and also charges that they were practically worthless.

It is hardly necessary to observe that the proceedings in the suit instituted by O. Ferrari against Shepherd and others and the sale made therein to the brothers of the debtor did not extinguish the deed of trust in favor of the National Commercial Company nor the debt thereby secured. As to that company and the trustee in its deed of trust, those proceedings and the sale were admittedly void. Being void and not merely erroneous, they do not protect the appellees, Fine and Cline, in so far as their purchase of the 200-acre tract of land is dependent thereon. As to the National Commercial Company and its trustee, the court did not obtain jurisdiction, and, when there is a lack of jurisdiction, a purchaser is not protected. Simmons v. Simmons, 85 W. Va. 25, 100 S. E. 743.

[1, 2] It does not follow, however, that sale may be made under the deed of trust in the manner in which it was attempted. Though the judicial sale does not extinguish the debt nor the lien, it has created a situation that constitutes an impediment to a fair and just sale of the property. The title has been beclouded by the judicial sale, to say the least. There was a prior deed of trust which alone would not have constituted such an impediment. George, Trustee, v. Zinn, 57 W. Va. 15, 49 S. E. 904, 110 Am. St. Rep. 721. The sale probably did not extinguish that deed of trust nor the debt secured by it. By virtue of a sale made for satisfaction of that debt, the appellees, who originally were strangers to the debt as well as the land, claim title and may have at least an equity. If they should lose the land, they may be entitled to subrogation to the benefit of the prior deed of trust. They have acquired some rights. Their title is good against A. V. Shepherd and the Jefferson Security Bank. They may be able to invoke the protection of the prior deed of trust against these appellants. What has occurred affords ground for serious claims of right in the appellees. As interested parties, they are entitled to have their true status judicially ascertained and determined before a sale is made, not only that they may be the better able to protect their interests, but also that others, desiring to bid on the property, may know its legal status. There are few, if any, exceptions to the rule that property cannot be sold against the will of the owner or persons having interests therein, under circumstances that are likely to prevent a sale at a fair and reasonable price. An order of sale made under such conditions in a judicial proceeding is erroneous, and one attempted under a deed of trust will be enjoined. It is the right and duty of the trustee in a deed of trust to institute a suit to remove an impediment to a fair sale, and obtain an adjudication of the rights of the parties, before selling the property, when there is such an impediment, on failure of the other interested parties to do so. George v. Zinn, cited; Curry v. Hill, 18 W. Va. 370; Lallance v. Fisher, 29 W. Va. 512, 2 S. E. 775; Hogan v. Duke, 20 Grat. (Va.) 244; Rossett v. Fisher, 11 Grat. (Va.) 492.

[3] Enough has been indicated to make it manifest that the title to the land involved here as well as the interests of the parties concerned in it directly and indirectly are seriously embarrassed and beclouded by the judicial sale and the subsequent conveyance. A judicial proceeding participated in by all such parties is the only means of establishment of their rights and equities and extinguishment of unfounded claims and contentions, growing out of the complicated situation, necessary to an unembarrassed and unhampered sale of the property, a sale under circumstances likely to bring a fair price.

It may be that such a sale could have been made before a sale was effected under the decree in the creditors' suit, as was suggested in Laidley v. Hinchman, 3 W. Va. 423. But the sale made, payment of the purchase money, distribution thereof, conveyance to the purchasers, and their subsequent conveyance to strangers create an entirely different situation to which the observation relied upon, if sound, is not applicable.

[4] No reason for denial of right in Alexander V. Shepherd to make himself a party to this is perceived. As he is the debtor and claims to have satisfied the debt or to have assigned certain accounts to the creditor, for collection and credit on the balance due, he is a necessary as well as a proper party to this suit. Even though he may not be able to maintain his claims and contentions, he is entitled to be heard. If this suit had been instituted by one of the appellants, as it should have been, failure to make him a party would have been manifest error in procedure. He would have been a necessary party, even though he had disclosed nothing by way of defense, because he is interested.

For the reasons stated, the decree complained of will be affirmed.

COCHRAN v. CRAIG et al. (No. 4175.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 22, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Trial \S 89—Motion to strike out evidence, part of which was admissible, properly denied.

Motions made in the progress of a trial involving several issues to strike out certain portions of relevant, material, and probative evidence, appreciably tending to maintain some of the issues on the part of the adverse party, on the ground of its insufficiency for such purpose, are properly overruled.

2. Trial \S 89—Court cannot be required to test sufficiency of evidence of opposite party piecemeal.

A party to a trial before a jury has no right to require the court to pass upon or test the sufficiency of the evidence of the opposite party by piecemeal, unless, perhaps, in a case in which the evidence constituting the subject-matter of the motion to strike out or exclude is the only evidence tending to prove his opponent's case and is clearly insufficient. Ordinarily, he can require a judicial test of the sufficiency of evidence only by a motion to exclude all of it, a demurrer to evidence, or a motion for a new trial, made after verdict.

3. Trial \S 414—Introduction of evidence by defendant waiver of errors in overruling motion to exclude plaintiff's evidence.

If, after the overruling of a motion to exclude the plaintiff's evidence, interposed at the conclusion of the introduction thereof, the defendant introduces his evidence, he thereby waives the error in the ruling, if any, and cannot have a review thereof in the appellate court.

4. Assumpsit, action of \S 25—Proof sustaining substantial portion of estimated cost sued for admissible.

In an action to recover a sum of money equal to what certain work would have cost, if performed, upon the hypothesis of an agreement to pay such sum, proof of a substantial portion of such estimated cost is admissible, notwithstanding its insufficiency to establish the full or exact amount thereof, and the inability of the plaintiff to do so by other evidence.

5. Pleading \S 20—Party claiming alternative right of recovery may assert both claims in same action.

A party claiming an alternative right of recovery may assert and prosecute both claims in the same action, leaving it to the court and jury to determine which he is entitled to, if either, and proof of one of them constitutes no abandonment of the other.

6. Estoppel \S 83(3)—Representation that claim in action amounts to less than that sued for not an estoppel.

A representation that a claim in action amounts to a certain sum less than that sued for, not acted upon in any way, is not an estoppel. It is mere evidence to be taken by the jury for what it is worth.

7. Contracts \S 346(4½)—Recovery under quantum meruit admissible under declaration containing common counts as well as special counts.

If a declaration contains the common counts as well as a special count based upon an agreement therein alleged, evidence tending to prove a right of recovery on a quantum meruit is admissible, notwithstanding reliance in the trial upon evidence tending to prove the agreement alleged.

8. Evidence \S 542, 543(1)—Opinion as to value or quantity admissible if witness has more knowledge of subject than jurors.

To make the opinion of a witness as to value or quantity admissible in evidence, he need not be qualified in the highest degree, nor in any particular degree. It suffices that he has more knowledge of the subject-matter than jurors ordinarily have.

9. Evidence \S 151(2)—Plaintiff may testify he would not have made verbal contract if he had not understood it imposed certain obligations.

A plaintiff in an action to recover on a verbal contract may testify that he would not have made it if he had not understood it imposed a certain obligation upon the defendant.

10. Trial \S 253(5)—Instructions authorizing jury to ignore defendant's counterclaim erroneous.

An instruction given in an action in which the defendant has asserted a claim against the plaintiff by way of recoupment or set-off, supported by evidence and exceeding the amount of the demand of the plaintiff, in such terms as require a finding in favor of the latter, if the jury believe his demand to be well founded, is erroneous and presumptively prejudicial, because it authorizes the jury to ignore the defendant's claim in arriving at their verdict.

11. New trial \S 70—Trial \S 139(1)—When evidence sustains verdict for plaintiff, direction of verdict for defendant and motion to set aside properly denied.

When the evidence adduced in a trial, considered as a whole, is sufficient to sustain a verdict for the plaintiff, requests for peremptory instructions to find for the defendant and a motion to set aside a verdict for the plaintiff are properly denied and overruled.

12. Logs and logging \S 8(1)—Recovery of extra compensation under logging contract because of change in method held proper.

In an action to recover extra compensation for work done under a logging contract, upon the theory of a radical change in the method of doing the work, made by the contractee, after the commencement thereof, imposing very much greater cost of performance upon the contractor than would have been required if the work had been done as contemplated, and a modification of the contract so as to provide for such compensation, in view of such change, there may be recovery of the additional expense occasioned thereby, if the evidence is such as warrants a finding that the contract was made and subsequently altered agreeably to the theory and claim of the plaintiff, even though there was no agreement to pay for such extra cost, provided the declaration contains an appropriate common count.

13. Logs and logging \S 8(5)—Evidence sustaining finding as basis for recovery of increased cost under modified logging contract.

If, in such case, the contract was verbal, and adopted for the purposes of the enterprise, subject to slight modifications, a prior written contract made between the parties for the purposes of a like enterprise fully executed and terminated, by the terms of which the contractor was required to deliver the logs within 75 feet of railroads to be constructed by the contractee, and under which, evidence adduced tends to prove, he had constructed such railroads into the timber as were reasonably necessary for convenient and economical stocking thereof, and there is evidence strongly tending to prove intent and purpose on his part, at the date of the making of the new contract, to construct a railroad clearly necessary for the purposes of the enterprise, in such sense, known to the contractor at the time, and his subsequent abandonment thereof, in consequence of which the contractor, in the discharge of his obligation to stock the timber, was compelled to log it by a route and to a point not contemplated, at greatly increased cost, the jury are justified in finding that the contract imposed duty upon the contractee to build such railroad, and that, in accepting performance in a manner different from that contemplated and occasioned by his change of plans, he incurred an obligation to pay the resultant increased cost.

14. Exceptions, bill of \S 20—Paper held a bill of exceptions sufficient as to form.

A paper bearing the style of a case, entitled "Defendant's Bill of Exceptions," containing the evidence in such case, motions made and passed upon, and what purport to be instructions, bearing the initials of the trial judge and notations of objections, rulings, and exceptions, and certified by the judge, under the style of the case, as the bill of exceptions of the defendants therein, and made a part of the record of the case by a vacation order, is a sufficient bill of exceptions.

15. Exceptions, bill of \S 56(3)—Recitals held to make instructions incorporated in bill part thereof.

This recital in such certificate, "being the exceptions to the rulings and actions of the court in the progress of said trial, as shown above and above set out," makes the instructions so incorporated in such bill of exceptions parts thereof.

Error to Circuit Court, Pocahontas County.

Action by Robert Cochran against George F. Craig and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed and remanded.

W. A. Bratton, of Marlinton, and Price, Smith, Spilman & Clay, of Charleston, for plaintiffs in error.

F. R. Hill and L. M. McClintic, both of Marlinton, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. The judgment for $8,537.30, under review on this writ of error, was recovered in an action of assumpsit, as part of an amount claimed under an alleged modification of a logging contract fully performed by both parties; the work having been fully done and fully paid for, except in so far as this claim has been asserted upon the theory of a modification of the contract, allowing increased compensation to the contractor. In his declaration the plaintiff demanded $10,636.84, and the defendants interposed a claim for $18,481.48, by way of recoupment and set-off. The basis of this counterclaim is an alleged overpayment for the work done at the contract price. Nine of the fifteen assignments of error are based upon the overruling of motions of the defendants to strike out evidence and their objections to admission of evidence. Some of these, as well as the thirteenth and fourteenth assignments, the former based upon the rejection of peremptory instructions asked for by the defendants and the latter upon the motion to set aside the verdict, involve the sufficiency of evidence. The twelfth relates to rulings upon instructions given.

For the purposes of the stocking of the timber involved here, which was taken from a 3,500-acre tract of land known as the "Clark and McCullough tract," and amounted to about 33,833,361 feet, the parties verbally agreed, April 2, 1915, or near that date, that a written contract between them dated April 1, 1912, under which the plaintiff had stocked the remaining portion of timber on a 10,000-acre tract owned by the defendants, known as the "Hoffman tract," and lying on the opposite side of the Greenbrier river from the "Clark and McCullough tract," should govern and control their rights and duties in the cutting and logging of the timber here involved, except in two particulars. The written contract had provided for payment of $4.75 per thousand for the spruce timber and $5 per thousand for the hardwood timber, and it was agreed that these prices should be increased $1 per thousand, making the prices for all of the timber $6 per thousand for the hardwood, $5.75 for the spruce, and $4.25 for the hemlock; the last-named price being that specified in the written contract. If this verbal agreement was not modified so as to provide for extra compensation, in view of an alleged alteration of the plans of the defendants, as is claimed by the plaintiff, the logging was fully paid for by the defendants, and the transaction completed and ended early in May, 1917, by payment of $4,592.54 to the plaintiff.

Under the agreement thus made, it was the duty of the plaintiff to deliver the logs within 75 feet of the railroad tracks as constructed by the defendants. Before it was entered into, the defendants indicated the extent and locations of the railroad tracks they expected to construct. Lying along the northwestern side of the Greenbrier river, the tract of land was penetrated by four small streams, hollows, or ravines, known as the Arbogast, Reservoir, Waybright, and First Run. Railroads were to be and were built up those hollows from the main line running along the river. A part of the timber lay in the head of another hollow known as Bear Wallow hollow, which came to the river on an adjoining tract known as the "Boggs tract." The timber in that hollow could not be logged down the hollow otherwise than by passing over the Boggs land. No railroad was constructed up that hollow; wherefore the timber therein was hauled over the ridge and brought down what is known as First Run hollow. It amounted to a little over 2,000,000 feet, and compensation for the logging thereof is the subject-matter of the alleged modification of the contract and this action. The plaintiff contends his contract was made in view of clearly manifest purpose and intent on the part of the defendants to obtain a right of way through the Boggs land and construct a railroad up Bear Wallow hollow, to which he was to deliver timber standing at the head or on the side thereof, and that his agreement based upon that assumption imposed duty upon the defendants to construct it. He claims that later they attempted to obtain a right of way over the Boggs land, but, disagreeing with the owners thereof as to the price of the right of way and some timber they desired to sell along with it, this purpose was abandoned, and that then an agent of the defendants agreed with him to pay for the stocking of the timber in that hollow a sum equal to the cost of the right of way, construction of the railroad, and removal thereof, in addition to the contract price, and, further, that if such sum did not cover the cost of such logging of the timber he was to be allowed the entire cost thereof. He claims it cost him $21,179.82, on which he has allowed a credit of $11,849.18, the amount paid him therefor under the contract at the prices agreed upon, and that there is a balance of $9,330.64 due him, on which he has charged interest.

The defendants are partners doing business under the firm name and style of George Craig & Sons, and the firm is composed of George F. Craig, John A. Calhoun, and A. J. Cadwallader. For many years, perhaps from the beginning of its operations, the firm's timber business has been managed by George F. Craig. He claims to have made the contract involved here with the plaintiff. On the other hand, the plaintiff contends that George C. Craig, son of George F. Craig, under authority duly conferred upon him, or under circumstances justifying plaintiff's reliance upon his agency, made the contract and afterwards modified it as aforesaid. The defendants deny the agency of George C. Craig and right in the plaintiff to rely upon such agency, and also the making of the alleged modification by George C. Craig and any attempt by him to make it.

The firm's principal office was in Philadelphia, in which city George F. Craig, as well, perhaps, as the other members thereof, resided. At their large mills located in Pocahontas county, W. Va., a village called Winterburn grew up, and they maintained an office there. They employed a bookkeeper, Arbogast, a woods foreman, J. W. Bratton, a head sawyer, Weightman, and others. From 1907 until 1914 George C. Craig resided there, and was charged with certain duties in connection with the logging and mill operations. When he was first stationed there he was a young man just out of school, and one of the purposes in assigning him to that position was to give him business knowledge and experience. With the acquisition thereof, during that period of seven years, his authority may have been considerably increased from time to time. Nevertheless, it is insisted by both himself and his father that his position was thoroughly subordinate and his powers as agent very limited. They say his powers extended only to the procurement of compliance with the contracts made by his father on behalf of the firm, and not to the making of contracts. In the latter part of the year 1914 he discontinued his residence at Winterburn, but did not entirely sever his connection with the business carried on at that place. On his departure therefrom his place was taken by a brother younger than he, Thomas R. Craig.

At the beginning of the transaction leading up to the Clark and McCullough enterprise the the firm did not own the timber on that tract, and did not acquire title thereto until some time in April, 1915. Its situation being such that it could be conveniently logged to their Winterburn mills, they began investigations respecting it in 1914, according to the testimony of the plaintiff. He finished his contract for the logging on the "Hoffman tract" some time in the fall of 1914, probably about September. He swears that in November or December, 1914, he and George C. Craig and J. W. Bratton went over the Clark and McCullough land and made a rough estimate of the amount of timber thereon, for use in the firm's deliberations upon the advisability of purchasing it; and that, in connection therewith, he was asked for the prices at which he would log the timber by George C. Craig, and that, in response to the inquiry, he proposed to log it at the prices and under the arrangement hereinbefore stated. He does not say Craig agreed on that occasion, on behalf of the firm, to pay the prices he had named; but admits that he told him he would report the proposition to the company. He denies that there was any further conversation or discussion with reference to the contract. George F. Craig admits that the plaintiff Bratton and his son George looked over the timber, in a general way, in 1914. He also states that on previous occasions he had negotiated with Clark for the purchase of the timber. If the plaintiff's proposal was made at the time stated by him, there seems not to have been any further discussion of it until about April 2, 1915. Between those two dates the plaintiff had assisted in making another and more thorough estimate of the timber, which was reduced to writing, dated April 1, 1915, and signed by him and J. W. McCullough and J. S. McQuown. When it was completed and signed or was ready for reduction to writing, he was called to Philadelphia. The title to the timber had not then been acquired, but an agreement for the purchase thereof was made about that time. The negotiations had so nearly approached consummation that George F. Craig felt warranted in contracting for the logging of the timber. According to his own testimony, the contract he made with the plaintiff was very informal. He admits the terms of the written contract of April 1, 1912, were not discussed in detail. He merely says he contracted with the plaintiff to cut and log the timber on the basis of the contract of April 1, 1912, with an increase of $1 per thousand for the hardwood and spruce timber. On the other hand, the plaintiff says the terms and conditions of the contract were not discussed at all, and that George F. Craig simply said to him, "Start on the job as soon as you can;" or, "You can start this job as soon as you like."

George C. Craig admits that he went over the land with the plaintiff in November, 1914, and took his offer to do the logging at the increased prices named and communicated it to his father. He denies, however, that he made the contract and also that he had any authority to do so. From what has been stated, it is obvious that there is very little conflict in the testimony as to the manner in which the contract was made. The parties differ in their testimony as to who made it on behalf of the firm, whether George C. Craig or George F. Craig. In other words, the plaintiff's theory is that George C. Craig made it and reported it to his father, while the defendants claim he simply took and reported an offer which they, through George F. Craig, accepted, April 2, 1915.

Since there is no controversy as to the original contract, except in so far as the plaintiff claims it impliedly obligated the defendants to build the railroad up Bear Wallow hollow, the conflict in the evidence as to who made it on behalf of the firm has no important bearing on anything other than the extent of the agency of George C. Craig. If he had power to make it and did so, he had power and authority, no doubt, to interpret and modify it. If, on the other hand, he merely took the plaintiff's proposition and communicated it to his father for acceptance or rejection, the circumstance does not tend to prove the agency imputed.

There is sharp conflict in the testimony of the plaintiff and George C. Craig, as to what was said and not said concerning the intention of the defendants to extend their railroad up Bear Wallow hollow. They agree that they were in that hollow and looked over the ground in November or December, 1914. The plaintiff says it was agreed between them that the railroad would be built up to a point known as the Jess McLaughlin camp, and that the land above that camp was too steep for further extension. Craig says the land was too steep from the mouth of the hollow up to the camp. He further says he ascertained the grade by means of a lock level, and informed the plaintiff that the road could not be so extended. This the latter flatly denies, saying no levels were taken, that the grade was not ascertained, and that it was not steeper than other places on which roads had been built under the old contract. Another witness swore the grade was not over 6 per cent, nor as steep as other grades on which railroads were built under the contract. The plaintiff's testimony conflicts also with that of George F. Craig as to what he said about the building of the road. The latter says he was on the Boggs land in the spring of 1916, and then told the plaintiff the road would not be built. This the former positively denies. This testimony conflicts with his son's, for it proves the building of the road was contemplated and the purpose not abandoned until the spring of 1916. Moreover, he did not say he declined to build on account of the grade. His testimony indicates a decision on account of the length of the road. He does not claim to have been in the hollow at all. As a document confirming his statement respecting the construction of the railroad to McLaughlin camp, the plaintiff relies upon a letter from the defendant apparently written by George C. Craig, dated March 8, 1915, and advising the plaintiff of the coming of a contractor intending to bid on the work, and directing him to take the contractor over the route of the proposed road, "including the line over the old Horton grade." The Horton grade was an abandoned railroad bed running along the right-hand side of the river and extending up into the Boggs land, at least as far as the mouth of Bear Wallow hollow. It did not extend to the Jess McLaughlin camp, which was up in the hollow. It covered about half of the distance from the boundary between the Clark and McCullough land and the Boggs land and the McLaughlin camp. The probative value of this letter is denied in the argument on the ground that the Horton grade did not reach the camp. This circumstance does not wholly disprove its value. The Horton grade went up into the Boggs land and beyond the Clark and McCullough land. There could have been no reason for extension of the road to the mouth of the hollow other than to make it a means of getting the timber out of that hollow. The import of the letter is that there was a proposed road at that time, and that it extended over the Horton grade and into the Boggs land. As to this, the letter was general, and likely based on the assumption of the plaintiff's knowledge of the meaning of the terms "including the line over the old Horton grade." It meant whatever they had previously agreed upon or discussed as that line.

The circumstances attending the negotiations resulting in the contract for the building of the railroads are relied upon by the plaintiff as tending to prove intent and purpose on the part of the defendants to extend the road to the McLaughlin camp. They were constructed by a firm known as Notaranni & Aiello, under a contract dated April 3, 1915, which did not specify the locations of the roads to be built. It provided in general terms for the construction of about 6 miles of railroad, at $2,000 per mile for grading and $525 per mile for track laying and surfacing. The prospective contractors for this work had gone over the ground with the plaintiff, by direction of the defendant, in March, 1915, and among other locations shown them was the one in question. Aiello, one of the contractors, says he and the plaintiff went to the camp and came down the hollow to the river, and that, while showing him that route, plaintiff had said the railroad was to be built there. Under the contract of April 3, 1915, railroad was built to the extent of 6.96 miles, but it did not go to the McLaughlin camp nor cover the Horton grade beyond the boundary line.

Aiello testifies that when they came to that line in the construction of what is called the river line railroad, in May or June, 1915, Bratton, the woods foreman, came to them and ordered them to stop at that point, saying they were unable to secure a right of way through the Boggs land. George C. Craig admits that in May or June of that year he saw one of the owners of the Boggs land and negotiated with him for some timber thereon, not particularly for the right of way, and that he saw him only once, and on the road between Winterburn and Franklin. He also admits that there was some correspondence concerning the matter. The plaintiff says that in June, 1916, Boggs and George C. Craig had an interview respecting the right of way, at Winterburn, and that Craig, expressing disgust at the conduct of Boggs, had said he could not do anything with him, which meant, or may have meant, that he was unable to obtain a right of way from him. Thereupon the plaintiff, according to his testimony, proposed to put the logs over the ridge, if the defendants would give him what the railroad would cost, and Craig replied: "If you will put them over the hill, we will pay you what the railroad would cost, and if it costs more, we will pay you." As has been stated, George C. Craig expressly denies this, and, of course, if the agreement was not made, it was never reported by him. George F. Craig admits negotiations with Boggs for the timber and for a right of way prior to July, 1915. He offered $600 and Boggs wanted $1,000, which he was unwilling to pay. Notwithstanding the failure thereof in May or June, 1915, while the railroad contractors were still there, George F. Craig, as has been stated, testifies that in the spring of 1916, after their departure, he and the plaintiff and Bratton went upon the Horton grade and looked the ground over, and that he then and there decided not to build the road. The railroads built were completed in September, 1915. As will be observed, there is a discrepancy here in dates; the plaintiff saying his agreement, on failure to obtain the right of way, was made in June, 1916, and George C. Craig saying the negotiations for the right of way were had and failed in June, 1915. Reconciliation of this conflict, as well as all others, was a question for the jury, of course.

There is no claim on the part of the plaintiff that his alleged agreement of modification was ever brought to the attention of George F. Craig by him, in any way, until after the completion of the work, and the latter denies that it was. He specifically states that neither the plaintiff nor his son, George C. Craig, ever mentioned the matter to him. It was brought to his attention, however, immediately after the work was completed, by a letter dated May 7, 1917, acknowledging receipt of a check for the balance due. In that letter the plaintiff said, "When George C. is at home you can write me and I will come over and we can settle the Run hauling;" by which he admittedly meant the Bear Wallow hollow hauling. The suggestion of this claim, so made, does not seem to have occasioned any surprise on the part of the defendants, for on May 11, 1917, plaintiff was invited to come, after having given a few days' notice of the time of his arrival. At that time nothing was said about the counterclaim of the defendants which later became a subject of negotiations. Between that date and February 20, 1919, the date of the rejection of the plaintiff's claim, he made two or three trips to Philadelphia in an effort to obtain an adjustment of the matter. Craig knew in a general way what the plaintiff claimed, but says he was not informed as to the real basis of it until the occasion of the last trip. Cochran says the Craigs were evasive and avoided a settlement. They deny this, but a jury might well say they manifested no purpose to allow his claim without abatement, and yet that they did not reject it. In December, 1917, they introduced into the negotiations their set-off or counterclaim, and from that time both were under consideration, until the purpose of the plaintiff to bring this action became apparent. Then they informed his attorney by letter that the logging contract had been closed and settled in full April 30, 1917, except as to a charge for a carload of lumber shipped to the plaintiff May 29, 1917.

As matter tending to refute the good faith of the plaintiff's claim and contradict or negative the inferences arising in his favor from circumstances, the defendants invoke the monthly settlements and payments, and the final settlement and payment, without mention, until the receipt of the last check, of the claim now asserted. Uncertainty of the basis of his claim, or lack of full disclosure thereof, is also relied upon. George F. Craig swears he was not informed as to the exact nature thereof until the last interview between them was held, though he admits he knew something additional or extra was claimed and discussed. In the last interview he says what the railroad would have cost was claimed and $5,000 or $6,000 indicated as the amount. He admits that he neither admitted nor rejected the claim when asserted, but he says he told the plaintiff he would get the boys, including plaintiff's son, together and take up the proposition "as a whole and do whatever was right about it," evidently meaning both claims. It is said the claim for full reimbursement for the cost of taking the timber out over the ridge, whether it exceed what the railroad would have cost or not, is an afterthought, and was never disclosed until this action was commenced. The basis of his claim, as set forth in a letter written by his attorney February 18, 1919, was limited to what the railroad would have cost.

George C. Craig was clearly an agent of the defendants. He was clothed with some authority. As the extent thereof was not defined by any written instrument and had not been otherwise clearly stated, it depended upon the facts and circumstances known to the plaintiff and the defendants. In the transaction here involved he was sent to the scene of the operations frequently and upon important missions, and apparently had considerable authority, as clearly appears from the facts hereinbefore stated. He gave the plaintiff frequent and important directions. Although he had not made any of the former contracts with the plaintiff, he had grown in age and experience at the time of the making of the one here involved, and had been intrusted, in later years, with more important matters than he had formerly handled. If right of recovery depended solely upon proof of his actual or apparent authority, however, the evidence thereof adduced and relied upon might not be sufficient to sustain a verdict, and, for that reason, it might have been the duty of the court to strike it out upon the motions made for such relief. But the existence of such authority as is claimed is not the only theory of right of recovery. There is clear evidence of acquiescence by silence and entertainment of the claim, after knowledge thereof, which might justify a finding of ratification of the alleged contract, if made without authority. Then there is still another theory of right of recovery, yet to be mentioned. As they are in the case and were before the jury, and the facts and circumstances relied upon as proof of actual or apparent authority in George C. Craig constitute some evidence thereof, the court properly overruled the motions made to eliminate that and much other evidence pertaining to the claim, and apparently dependent upon the agency, such as what the railroad would have cost, the cost of logging the timber over the ridge, and the making of the alleged agreement of modification.

[1, 2] Evidence cannot be struck out on the ground of slightness of its probative value, unless elimination thereof is decisive of the whole case. The trial court cannot be required, in the progress of a trial, to stop and weigh and pass upon the evidence piecemeal, or reject certain portions thereof on the ground of insufficiency, if it is relevant, material, and appreciably probative. State v. Clifford, 59 W. Va. 1, 19, 23, 52 S. E. 981. Such procedure would introduce insufferable delays and confusion, endanger the rights of the parties, and likely invade the province of the jury. Parties to actions of this class are entitled to have their cases tried by juries and to have all relevant and probative evidence passed upon by the juries in the first instance. Presumptively, the jury will properly weigh and dispose of the evidence, whether heavy or light. The function of the court in the test of the sufficiency of evidence intervenes after verdict, or upon a motion to strike out all of it before verdict, or upon a demurrer to the evidence upon the theory of its insufficiency as a whole, not insufficiency of mere scraps or parts thereof. Such elimination of clearly insufficient evidence might not be reversible error under all circumstances, but a party cannot require it.

[3] The overruling of a motion to strike out all of the plaintiff's evidence, made at the conclusion thereof, is assigned as error. As the defendants afterward introduced their evidence, they waived the error in the overruling of the motion, if any. Trump v. Tidewater, etc., Co., 46 W. Va. 238, 32 S. E. 1035; Core v. Ohio River R. Co., 38 W. Va. 456, 18 S. E. 596.

[4-6] Evidence of what it would have cost to build the railroad in question was objected to on the ground of insufficiency, abandonment of right to recover on that basis, possibility that such cost might have exceeded the cost of the work, and representation that the claim was for only $4,000 or $5,000. The objection was properly overruled. The contract price per mile of the road built, except as to bridges, the length of the road, and a substantial increase in wages and the cost of materials between 1915 and 1916 were proved. Though this evidence did not fix a definite sum as the cost, it reasonably and fairly proved a large sum of money entering into the cost, and the plaintiff could not be denied right of recovery on the ground of inability to prove the entire or exact amount thereof, if he made good his claim of a contract. It is immaterial that what the railroad would have cost might have exceeded the cost of the logging. If the contract was made as claimed, the plaintiff was entitled to recover it, nevertheless. There was no abandonment of this claim. Assertion of the alternative claim is not inconsistent with adherence to it, if that would be material. The law does not compel a plaintiff to elect at his peril between alternative claims. He may assert both, leaving it to the jury or court to say which he is entitled to. There is no element of estoppel in the representation that the claim amounted to only $4,000 or $5,000, if made. It was not acted upon in any way to the detriment of the defendants. As mere evidence, it was to be weighed by the jury with all the other evidence.

[7] An objection to evidence of the additional cost of logging the timber over the hill, on the ground of lack of a claim of right to recover on a quantum meruit, overlooks the presence of the common counts in the declaration and the legal proposition that deviation from the contract admittedly made by an alteration of the character of the work after it was made, greatly increasing the cost thereof, may have conferred right of recovery on that basis. Besides the evidence tending to prove the alleged modification of the contract, there is an abundance of evidence tending to prove the admitted contract was entered into upon a representation of purpose and intent to build the railroad in question, and in reliance upon previous interpretation of the adopted written contract as to the duty of the defendants respecting the building of railroads thereunder. It suffices at this stage of the opinion to note the presence of such evidence. The question of its sufficiency comes up later.

[8] Aiello's opinion that the cost of building the road in 1916 would have been 50 per cent. or 60 per cent. more than in 1915, was clearly admissible, notwithstanding he had done no construction work in West Virginia in 1916. That circumstance went to its weight, not its admissibility. As a contractor, he was familiar with general commercial and industrial conditions. A witness need not be qualified in the highest degree, nor in any particular degree, to make his opinion on a question of value or quantity admissible. Comstock v. Droney Lumber Co., 69 W. Va. 100, 71 S. E. 255. It suffices that he has some peculiar qualification, more knowledge of the subject than jurors are supposed ordinarily to have.

[9] Nor was the plaintiff's statement that he would not have taken the contract at the prices agreed upon if he had not understood the road was to be built inadmissible. Though in the nature of self-serving evidence, it was not an extrajudicial declaration. It is part of his testimony, laying emphasis upon what he claims to have been a part of his contract. It deals with his understanding of it, his intention and purpose. No rule forbidding such evidence has been adverted to in argument, and we have discovered none.

[14, 15] Coming now to the rulings on instructions, it is necessary first to dispose of a contention on the part of the defendant in error that the instructions were not made part of the bill of exceptions. Indeed, it is insisted upon highly technical and unsubstantial grounds that there is no bill of exceptions. It would subserve no good purpose to analyze and refute this argument by demonstration and authority. A paper containing all of the evidence, motions, rulings thereon, and the instructions, and styled "Defendant's Bill of Exceptions," was certified by the trial judge as a bill of exceptions, and a vacation order makes it a part of the record. That is sufficient. In that paper the instructions are copied, with the objections, exceptions, rulings, and the initials of the judge written on them. These are referred to in the judge's certificate in these words: "Being the exceptions to the rulings and actions of the court in the progress of the trial, as shown above and above set out." These words refer to everything that precedes them, in so far as they are applicable, and they are obviously applicable to the indorsements on the instructions copied in the paper. Those indorsements record objections, rulings, and exceptions.

[11] The correctness of only one of the two instructions given for the plaintiff is questioned. It submitted to the jury the question of George C. Craig's agency and the issue as to whether he had made the alleged agreement and directed them, in the event of their finding for the plaintiff on those issues, to return a verdict in his favor and assess his damages at such sum as the evidence, in their opinion, warranted, but not to exceed the amount claimed in the declaration. It was a binding instruction and wholly ignored the issue as to the claims asserted by the defendants by way of recoupment and set-off. The evidence adduced in support of these claims had a clear tendency to sustain them. Whether they were valid was a question for the jury in the first instance, as were all other issues in the case. The defendants claim the amount of lumber saved from the logs should have exceeded the quantity indicated by the scale under Scribner's Rule, by from 10 per cent. to 15 per cent., and adduced evidence that it had done so in the timber taken from the Hoffman land. Plaintiff's attention was repeatedly directed to the fact that his scale was running too high during the progress of the work. According to the evidence of the defendants, the lumber realized from the timber stocked by the plaintiff from the Clark and McCullough land did not overrun the scale at all. In resistance of this claim, the plaintiff assailed the correctness of the scale of the timber from the Hoffman land, and charged that quantities of timber had been left in the woods along the railroads and that logs had been lost from the mill pond or dam by reason of a flood in the river. In view of this evidence pro and con, neither court nor jury could properly ignore the issue.

If we could say that plaintiff had clear right to recover on the claim set up by him, that would not preclude the possibility of right in the defendants to part or all of their claim asserted against him. Nor can it be said the instruction did not literally require a verdict for the plaintiff on the whole case, if the jury were satisfied of the agency of George C. Craig and the making of the alleged agreement, and that necessarily precluded allowance of a large part of the claim of the defendants, which was nearly double that of the plaintiff. It was not in terms limited to the plaintiff's claim. In express terms, it hypothetically required a finding for the plaintiff on the whole case, but the vice of it was its failure to exclude the claim of the defendants in the hypothetical statement. If the set-off was valid in toto, there could have been no verdict for the plaintiff.

[10] Such an instruction is erroneous and presumptively prejudicial. Wiggin v. Marsh Lumber Co., 77 W. Va. 7, 87 S. E. 194; Stuck v. K. & M. R. Co., 78 W. Va. 490, 89 S. E. 280; Snider v. Robinett, 78 W. Va. 88, 88 S. E. 599; Petry v. Cabin Creek, etc., Co., 77 W. Va. 654, 88 S. E. 105. It is not justified by the principle or rule enunciated in Leros v. Parker, 79 W. Va. 700, 91 S. E. 660. In that case, the instructions submitted conflicting contentions to the jury, hypothetically. Inconsistency in the theories advanced in them was relied upon as vitiating them. Here only one side has been submitted by a binding instruction which completely ignores one of the defenses.

[12, 13] Exceptions were taken to the refusal of two instructions offered by the defendant, each of which would have directed the jury to find against the plaintiff, if given. They were properly refused. The contract as originally made between the parties was thoroughly informal. It verbally adopted the terms and provisions of a previous written contract between them, with two modifications as to prices. Under that contract, according to direct and positive evidence, railroads had been built by the defendants to such extent and in such manner as to bring them within reasonably convenient reach of the timber, when it was practicable to do so. As previously construed, it required the building of a railroad up the hollow in question. For about half of the distance the grade was clearly not too steep, for a railroad had been operated on it. As to the balance of the distance, there is clear and positive evidence that the grade was not too steep. The jury could have found it was not. They could have found, also, that when the plaintiff's offer to do the work was made and accepted, whether accepted by George C. Craig or his father, construction of the road was contemplated. There is no pretence that intention to build it was abandoned earlier than the month of June, 1915, two months after the contract was made. The plaintiff Bratton and George C. Craig had examined the location in 1914. In March, 1915, he had been directed to take the prospective contractors over it and he did so. Within a few days afterward the verbal contract was made, and it was silent as to the construction of that railroad as it was respecting the others. Presumptively, the defendants knew the plaintiff was basing his contract on his belief that they would build that road, and the jury could say they intended to accept the offer as he made it. He knew how the former contract had been interpreted and executed in respect of the furnishing of railroad facilities, and had no reason to suspect that a different interpretation would be put upon it, or that it would be performed in a different manner. It is conceded that George C. Craig had supervising or administrative authority within the contracts made by his father. It was his business to require compliance therewith. That authority apparently, if not actually, included power to interpret provisionally, if not absolutely, the contracts in force and effect between the parties. Considered in the light of previous experience under the logging contract, it could have been treated by the jury as clear justification of plaintiff's reliance upon George C. Craig's representation that the road in question would be constructed. It is immaterial that only "about six miles" of road was contracted for. The plaintiff was no party to that contract. Nor does it matter that nearly seven miles was built. Silence of the logging contract as to what roads should be constructed and where is not conclusive. It implied that there should be railroads constructed by the defendants. Reason would suggest that it further implied an obligation to construct such roads as were reasonably necessary to convenient and economic logging of the timber, when practicable. There is evidence that it was so construed in the stocking of the timber from the Hoffman land. It would be as easy in logic and law to absolve the defendants from duty to build any railroads at all as to relieve them from reasonable duty in that respect. In view of all this, it is obvious that the jury was justified in finding, or could have found, that the contract, as made, provided for construction of the railroad in question.

The material alteration made in their plans by the defendants, necessitating departure from the contract by the plaintiff, if so made, at great additional expense to him, imposed upon the former the legal duty of compensating him for his additional outlay in the execution of his contract as altered in performance by reason of their change of plans. Fucy v. Coal & Coke Ry. Co., 75 W. Va. 134, 83 S. E. 301; Henderson Bridge Co. v. McGrath, 134 U. S. 260, 10 Sup. Ct. 730, 83 L. Ed. 934; Wood v. Ft. Wayne, 119 U. S. 312, 7 Sup. Ct. 219, 30 L. Ed. 416; Wolf v. McGavock, 29 Wis. 290; Salt Lake City v. Smith, 104 Fed. 457, 43 C. C. A. 637.

Having thus demonstrated the propriety of the rejection of the peremptory instructions asked for and the overruling of the motion for a new trial, we deem it unnecessary to inquire whether these rulings can be justified upon any other ground, such as the validity of the alleged agreement of modification or ratification thereof as an unauthorized agreement by silence or acquiescence after knowledge. On these issues there may be additional or different evidence on the new trial to be awarded, and the latter has not been very fully developed. While George F. Craig knew the plaintiff claimed extra compensation, it does not appear just when he was advised that the claim was based upon the alleged special agreement therefor. Ratification of an unauthorized agreement, by conduct, can be effected only after full knowledge of the facts. Thompson v. Laboringman's Manufacturing Co., 60 W. Va. 42, 51, 53 S. E. 908, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 311. There was no duty on the part of the defendants either to affirm, deny, or waive authority in George C. Craig to make the alleged agreement, until they knew he had made it or a claim of liability was asserted thereon.

Failure to invoke the legal principle upon which the rejection of the peremptory instructions and the denial of a new trial are sustained and reliance upon other propositions does not preclude application thereof. Litigation is not, and ought not to be regarded as, a contest presided over by the court and determinable by the skill of the actors, as in the case of a game. A correct ruling based upon a wrong or untenable reason should always be upheld, and when the rights of the parties have been dealt with and results declared upon inapplicable legal principles, so as to work deprivation of right or infliction of wrongs, the reviewing court, on discovery thereof, should correct the procedure and either adjudge the rights of the parties upon correct principles or remand the cause, with directions to the trial court for procedure agreeable to such principles, unless some insuperable obstacle to such action has intervened, and that is our practice.

In our opinion, the conclusions here stated cover and dispose of all the assignments of error that have been relied upon in argument, and sufficiently define the principles involved for the purposes of further procedure.

For the error in the giving of plaintiff's instruction No. 2, the judgment will be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial.

STATE v. KNOSKY. (No. 4159.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 25, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Intoxicating liquors \S 13—State legislation enforced though additional offenses and punishments created thereby.

The general prohibition law enacted by Congress does not provide an exclusive remedy for the enforcement of the provisions of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. By the very terms of that amendment, not only Congress, but the several states, are given power to enforce its provisions against the sale or manufacture of intoxicating liquor, and any state legislation in aid of that general purpose will be enforced, notwithstanding offenses may be created and punishments provided in addition to those offenses created and punishments prescribed by the general prohibition law enacted by Congress.

2. Criminal law \S 1213—Intoxicating liquors \S 242—State law prohibiting manufacture held not to impose excessive, cruel, or unusual punishment.

Section 37 of chapter 108 of the Acts of 1919 does not prescribe punishment out of proportion to the character and degree of the offense therein mentioned, or cruel or unusual punishment, in violation of section 5 of article 3 of the Constitution of this state.

3. Intoxicating liquors \S 137—Desert, secluded, hidden, or solitary "place" held to refer to immediate vicinity wherein illicit still operated.

The language "any desert, secluded, hidden, secret or solitary place," used in section 37 of chapter 108 of the Acts of 1919 in defining what shall constitute a moonshine still, is not used to indicate the exact apartment or room in which the operations are carried on, but as referring to the immediate vicinity, region, or locality in which such still is operated.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Place.]

4. Intoxicating liquors \S 137—Operation of still in defendant's own home in settled community held not operation of moonshine still.

One operating a still for the manufacture of intoxicating liquors upon the stove in the kitchen of his own home, in a settled community close to a public road, is not guilty of operating a moonshine still under the provisions of section 37 of chapter 108 of the Acts of 1919, but is guilty under section 3 of that act.

Lynch, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Hancock County.

Frank Knosky was convicted of having in his possession and operating a moonshine still, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

J. B. Levy, of Weirton, and E. A. Hart, of New Cumberland, for plaintiff in error.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., R. A. Blessing, Asst. Atty. Gen., and Jno. T. Simms, of Charleston, for the State.

RITZ, P. The defendant was indicted, tried, and convicted under the provisions of section 37 of chapter 108 of the Acts of 1919, for having in his possession and operating a moonshine still, and was sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary for a term of two years, and to pay a fine of $300.

It appears from the evidence that the sheriff of Hancock county had information that the defendant was engaged in the unlawful manufacture of intoxicating liquors, and with a view of investigating the complaints he, with one or more of his deputies, went to the residence of the defendant. It appears that the defendant resided with his family, consisting of himself, his wife, and four children, in a small house on a farm containing about 140 acres, the house being, according to the witnesses, from 300 to 500 feet from the public road which passes the place. The defendant rented this house and farm from the owner, who reserved a room in the same for his own use, which was at the time being occupied by him. When the sheriff approached the house from the road, he saw two men leaving the same from the opposite side, and when he and his deputies reached the house and entered the kitchen of the same they discovered therein a still, such as is used for the manufacture of spirituous liquors, sitting on the stove in the defendant's kitchen in full operation. They also found a keg of manufactured liquor in an adjoining room and a gallon jug of the same liquor about two-thirds full, as well as a large amount of raisin mash ready to be used in the process of manufacture. The sheriff testified that he made an inspection of the liquor being produced at the time by the still, and found that it is what is popularly called "raisin jack," or "pick handle," or "white mule," and that it was intoxicating. Upon the trial of the case the defendant introduced no evidence to contradict the testimony of the sheriff, which was fully corroborated by one of his deputies who accompanied him.

Upon this writ of error the defendant insists that the judgment against him should be reversed, and relies upon three grounds therefor: First, that the adoption of the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and the passage of the federal prohibition law for the enforcement of the same, superseded all state laws having for their purpose the enforcement of prohibition; second, that the punishment provided for the offense inhibited by section 37 of the act above cited is cruel and unusual, and in violation of the Constitution of this state; and, third, that under the evidence the defendant was not guilty of operating a moonshine still within the meaning of said section 37, but that, if he was guilty of anything, he was guilty under section 3 of the act.

[1] The defendant's first contention is without merit. The Eighteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution in terms provides:

"The Congress and the several states shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

It cannot be denied but that the purpose of of the Eighteenth Amendment was to secure practical prohibition, and it is quite as plain from the language above quoted that the intention was to confer, not only upon the Congress, but upon the several states, the power, not only to enforce, but to enact such legislation as might tend in that direction. The adoption of this amendment was at least to some extent an innovation on what had been theretofore considered to be within the exclusive jurisdiction of the several states, and no doubt the Congress, in submitting this amendment, believed that the enforcement of the prohibition provided by the amendment could be better secured, in some instances at least, by the action of state authorities. It will be noticed that the language used does not limit the states to the enforcement of such laws as may be passed by Congress for the effectuation of the purpose of the constitutional amendment, but confers upon the states power to enforce the amendment by appropriate legislation. This plainly gives to the several states power to adopt such means by way of legislation as will best meet the obstacles existing in each locality to the enforcement of the law. The fact that some states may make an offense not included within the general prohibition law enacted by Congress can make no difference so long as the general purpose is kept in view. There is some discussion of this concurrent power conferred upon the Congress and the several states in the case of Rhode Island v. Palmer, 253 U. S. 350, 40 Sup. Ct. 486, 588, 64 L. Ed. 946, and related cases, decided by the United States Supreme Court, and reported in the Advance Opinions of July 1, 1920.

[2] Nor is there merit in the contention made that the punishment prescribed by section 37 of chapter 108 of the Acts of 1919 is out of proportion to the character and degree of the offense, or is cruel or unusual, and for that reason in violation of the Constitution of this state. The power of the Legislature to prescribe the punishment for offenses is very broad, and much must be left to the judgment of that body as to what punishment will be adequate for the purpose of deterring others from the commission of crime, and for the reformation of the offender. This question is elaborately discussed by Judge Brannon in the case of State v. Woodard, 68 W. Va. 66,

[3] The third contention made by the defendant is that the evidence does not make him guilty of the offense interdicted by section 37 of the act. It appears from an examination of chapter 108 of the Acts of the Legislature of 1919 that by section 3 any person who engages in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors (other than by moonshine still) shall be guilty of a misdemeanor for the first offense, and, if found guilty of a subsequent offense, of a felony, and punished as provided in that section. This section by itself does not inhibit the manufacture of intoxicating liquors by moonshine still, and, unless there had been other legislation, those engaged in such manufacture would not be punishable under the act. But the exception contained therein was for the purpose of reserving this manufacture by moonshine still for further treatment by the legislative authority, and under section 37 of the act such manufacture is inhibited, and is made a felony punishable by confinement in the penitentiary for not less than two nor more than five years, and a fine of not less than $300 nor more than $1,000. It will thus be seen that the Legislature has classified the manufacture of liquors into those produced by moonshine still and those produced otherwise. Section 37 goes further and defines what shall constitute a moonshine still. This provision is:

"For the purposes of this act, any mechanism, apparatus or device that is kept or maintained in any desert, secluded, hidden, secret or solitary place, away from the observation of the general public, for the purpose of distilling, making or manufacturing intoxicating liquors, or which by any process of evaporation, separates alcoholic liquor from grain, molasses, fruit or any other fermented substance, or that is capable of any such use, shall be taken and deemed to be a 'moonshine still,' and the owner or operator of any such 'moonshine still' shall be deemed a 'moonshiner.'"

It is argued by the learned Attorney General that the proof in this case brings the defendant within the definition of a moonshiner as prescribed by the statute, that his kitchen in his residence is a desert, secluded, secret, or solitary place within the meaning of that statute, and that therefore the conviction of the defendant under the same was proper. It must be borne in mind, in seeking the construction of this section, that all manufacture of spirituous liquors is inhibited by the act, and, this being true, it could hardly be expected that one engaged in such manufacture would set up a still in the face of the public. This would lead to certain detection, and as certain punishment. Illicit business is carried on, not for the purpose of detection, but ordinarily for the purpose of profit, and can only be reasonably successful by escaping detection, at least for a reasonable time, so that we are justified in the assumption that any one who engages in the business of manufacturing intoxicating liquors will, to the extent that he is able, secure himself from detection by those charged with the execution of the law. It therefore follows that, if this statute is to be construed as making any one a moonshiner who manufactures liquor in any place not open to the public gaze, then all persons engaged in this business will fall within the definition, and the Legislature would be open to the charge of having done an entirely futile thing in inhibiting the manufacture of liquor other than by moonshine still, for there would be no offense to fall under that provision of the act. The word "place" used in section 37 has a little broader meaning than the room in which the actual manufacture is being carried on. It means that the house or building itself shall be in a secluded place; the word "place" being used more in the sense of the immediate neighborhood, region, or vicinity than in the sense of the particular room or apartment in which operations are conducted. We know as matter of fact, and the Legislature was not without the same knowledge, that what was ordinarily termed "moonshine" was such liquors as were manufactured in the fastnesses of the mountains and other secret and hidden places, where there was great difficulty of detecting it, and this was the popular meaning of the term. The language used by the Legislature in defining it indicates to our minds that this was the sense in which the Legislature intended it should be used. We do not mean to say that one could not be guilty under section 37 unless it was shown that he carried on his operations in the seclusion of the woods or mountains. There may be just as effective means used in centers of urban population. Such a still might be operated in abandoned coal mines, or in abandoned buildings, or means might be taken by the owner or operator to provide a specially hidden place of manufacture, such as by excavating a cave, or in some similar manner, and it may be that all of these things would fall within the definition of a moonshine still. The principal purpose, however, of the Legislature undoubtedly was to include that class of cases where the operations are extensively carried on in out-of-the-way places, and in neighborhoods not frequented by the general public, and by people of more or less desperate character, where the officers, in the execution of the law, would likely meet with resistance in bringing the transgressors to justice, such as has often been met within the past history of the execution of the liquor laws. From the language used we cannot attribute to the Legislature the intention to make it a felony punishable as prescribed in section 37 for a man to engage in the manufacture of liquor in his own home without taking any extraordinary means to conceal it. We are forced to this conclusion from the fact that to give the statute any other construction would make meaningless its inhibition against the manufacture of liquor other than by moonshine still; for, if the construction insisted upon by the state is sustained, there would be no manufacture except by moonshine still. It may be that all persons who engage in the illicit manufacture of liquors should be severely dealt with, but the Legislature has seen fit to divide them into two classes, making one more odious than the other, and it is beyond our province to abolish the distinction thus made.

[4] We are persuaded that the evidence in this case, which is uncontradicted, does not prove the guilt of the defendant under section 37, but that he is guilty, if at all, and upon this we of course express no opinion, of the offense interdicted by section 3 of the act.

It therefore follows that the judgment of the circuit court of Hancock county will be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

THORNE v. CITY OF CLARKSBURG.
(No. 4105.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 22, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Constitutional law §34—Jury §19(11)—Provision for assessment of damages to private property taken held self-executing.

The last clause of section 9 of article III of the Constitution of this state relating to the taking or damaging of private property for public use, providing that when required by either of the parties the compensation therefor shall be ascertained by an impartial jury of twelve freeholders, properly construed, is so far self-executing as to entitle them in a suit at common law for compensation for property not taken but damaged, to have the damages assessed by such impartial jury of twelve freeholders.

2. Constitutional law §29—"Provision self-executing." If right or duty given enforceable without legislative enactment.

The principal test for determining whether a constitutional provision is self-executing is that the right it gives or the duty it imposes may be enforced without the aid of legislative enactment.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Self-Executing.]

3. Eminent domain §—295—Where assessment by jury of freeholders denied, presumption is that plaintiff was deprived of constitutional right.

Where in a suit for compensation for private property taken or damaged for public use either of the parties thereto has plainly demanded and been denied the right to an impartial jury of twelve freeholders, it will be presumed that the jury was not so composed and that the party so demanding was deprived of a constitutional right.

Error to Circuit Court, Harrison County.

Action by Metta V. Thorne against the City of Clarksburg. Judgment for plaintiff for insufficient relief was set aside on plaintiff's motion, a new trial was awarded, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Homer Strosnider and F. O. Sutton, both of Clarksburg, for plaintiff in error.

Smith & Jackson, of Clarksburg, for defendant in error.

MILLER, J. On the trial of an action on the case for damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff from the lowering of the grade of the street in front of her property in the city of Clarksburg, the verdict of the jury was in favor of plaintiff for $355.41, which verdict was on motion of plaintiff set aside, and a new trial awarded. From that judgment defendant obtained the present writ of error.

The principal ground relied on to sustain the judgment is that plaintiff was entitled to have the compensation for the damages sustained by her ascertained by an impartial jury of twelve freeholders, as provided by section 9 of article III of the Constitution of this State; and this was the ground upon which the record shows the circuit court was persuaded to award a new trial.

The provision of the Constitution relied on is as follows:

"Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use, without just compensation; nor shall the same be taken by any company, incorporated for the purposes of internal improvement, until just compensation shall have been paid, or secured to be paid, to the owner; and when private property shall be taken, or damaged, for public use, or for the use of such corporation, the compensation to the owner shall be ascertained in such manner, as may be prescribed by general law: Provided, that when required by either of the parties, such compensation shall be ascertained by an impartial jury of twelve freeholders."

Plaintiff's bills of exceptions numbers 1 and 2 show: First, that after the case had been called for trial and before the jury was impaneled, the plaintiff demanded a jury of twelve freeholders to try the case, which demand the court refused, and declined to permit none but freeholders to qualify as jurors to try the case, to which action of the court the plaintiff excepted; second, that when the case had been so called for trial and while the jury was being impaneled to try the case and after the court had concluded propounding interrogatories to the jury for the purpose of qualifying them, and after a jury of twenty had been sworn to answer questions, the court turned to counsel and asked if they desired to have the jury asked any further questions, and that thereupon the plaintiff by counsel requested that the jury be asked whether they were freeholders and that each juror be asked whether he was a freeholder, there then being twenty in the box and being interrogated and qualified as aforesaid, which request of the plaintiff by counsel the court refused, and declined and did not ask the said jurors or any of them whether he was a freeholder, to which action of the court she again objected and excepted.

In support of the original rulings of the court denying the plaintiff the right to a jury of twelve freeholders counsel for the city rely mainly on two propositions, namely: First, that the last clause of section 9 of article III of the Constitution is not self-executing, but addressed to the Legislature, and that the Legislature not having enacted any general law to carry said provision into effect, as it had by chapter 42 of the Code (secs. 1699-1727), where land is to be taken or damaged for public use by condemnation, plaintiff was not entitled to a jury of freeholders; second, that as the plaintiff had had a trial before a common-law jury, she had been denied no right, wherefore there was no error in the original rulings of the court denying her a jury of freeholders.

[1] It is contended that the constitutional right to a jury of freeholders when private property is to be taken or damaged for public use by condemnation was made effectual by the provisions of chapter 42 of the Code, but the proposition contended for is that when the property is to be damaged but no part of it taken, the only remedy given for the wrong is an action on the case at common law with the intervention only of a common-law jury, such as was had in this case. In the one case it is said the Legislature has provided the manner in which the compensation to the owner shall be ascertained, that is, upon petition by the condemnor, after effort to agree with the owner, the appointment of commissioners or freeholders by the court as provided, to ascertain what will be a just compensation, and upon demand by either party after report by the commissioners, by the impaneling of a jury of freeholders in such manner as the court shall direct, as provided by section 17 of said chapter 42 (sec. 1716); but that in the other case no method of determining the compensation having been provided by law, the common-law remedy alone must be relied on and pursued. In Supervisors of Doddridge County v. Stout, 9 W. Va. 708, a case which arose and was determined according to the law in force prior to the Constitution of 1872, it was decided that the case was properly determined as provided by the provisions of chapter 42 of the Code, the only method then prescribed for ascertaining the compensation to the owner of the land to be taken, and that the new provision of the Constitution of 1872 giving the right to a trial by a jury of freeholders, not being self-executing and not carried into effect by appropriate legislation, could have no application. In Johnson v. City of Parkersburg, 16 W. Va. 402, 37 Am. Rep. 779, the proposition relied on was that the first clause of said section 9, article III, prohibiting the damage as well as the taking of private property for public use without compensation, was self-executing; and it was decided, contrary to the contention of counsel for defendant, that it was; but it was decided that the second clause thereof, saying that "when private property shall be taken, or damaged, for public use, or for the use of such corporations, the compensation to the owner shall be ascertained in such manner as may be prescribed by general law: Provided, that when required by either of the parties, such compensation shall be ascertained by an impartial jury of twelve freeholders," was not self-executing, but required legislation to carry it out. The distinction made between these two clauses was that the first clause gave and protected the right of the owner to compensation, but that the second was addressed to the Legislature, and it having made no provision where the property is damaged only, the common law alone can be resorted to to redress the plaintiff's wrong. But that case does not hold that when the right is being redressed by a common-law action for damages to property taken, the provision for a trial by a jury of twelve freeholders may not be invoked, and that so much of this provision of the Constitution is not self-executing. No legislation providing for additional machinery for carrying this provision into effect is necessary; the provision simply adds an additional qualification to the jurors; and we think so much of that section as pertains to the qualification of the jurors ought to be construed as self-executing. Jurors so qualified could be drawn from the regular panel summoned for the term at which the trial is to be had, or from other jurors summoned pursuant to law.

[2] One of the well recognized tests for determining whether a constitutional provision is self-executing is that the right or duty which it imposes may be enforced without the aid of legislative enactment. 6 R. C. L.

§ 55, p. 59, citing Davis v. Burke, 179 U. S. 399, 21 Sup. Ct. 210, 45 L. Ed. 249, and numerous other cases. In the latter case the Supreme Court quotes from Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, the following:

"A constitutional provision may be said to be self-executing if it supplies a sufficient rule by means of which the right given may be enjoyed and protected, or the duty imposed may be enforced; and it is not self-executing when it merely indicates principles, without laying down rules by means of which those principles may be given the force of law. Thus, a constitution may very clearly require county and town government; but if it fails to indicate its range, and to provide proper machinery, it is not in this particular self-executing, and legislation is essential"—followed in Tampa Water Works Co. v. Tampa, 199 U. S. 241, 26 Sup. Ct. 23, 50 L. Ed. 170.

And for a clear statement of this general rule, see 12 C. J. 729.

In Erdman v. Mitchell, 207 Pa. 79, 56 Atl. 327, 63 L. R. A. 534, 99 Am. St. Rep. 783, cited in 6 R. C. L. § 55, p. 59, it is said to be a generally recognized rule that legislation is unnecessary to enable the courts to give effect to constitutional provisions guaranteeing the fundamental rights to life, liberty and the protection of property. This was the rule or principle applied in Mason v. Harper's Ferry Bridge Co., 17 W. Va. 396, where, because there was no physical taking of the property but the damages about to be inflicted amounted to a practical taking thereof, and the statute providing no way whereby the damages could be determined or secured before the taking, it was held that equity would intervene to protect the owner and to direct an issue of quantum damnificatus to be tried by a jury of twelve freeholders, as provided by the Constitution and statute. And the same practice was recognized and approved in Ward v. Ohio River R. R. Co., 35 W. Va. 481, 489, 490, 14 S. E. 142. The fact that the Legislature has omitted for so many years to make special provision for ascertaining compensation to the owner for property damaged but not taken by condemnation argues strongly that no legislation was regarded necessary to protect one in his constitutional right to a jury of freeholders; otherwise the legislative branch of the government would be convicted of a purpose to withhold this constitutional right. And if legislation had been attempted, the proviso of section 9 of article III would constitute a complete limitation upon the power of the Legislature to enact any law which did not protect the owner in his right to a jury of freeholders when demanded. Applying this test, if this provision of the Constitution can be given reasonable effect without legislation, it ought to be regarded as self-executing. Such is the rule of construction everywhere, as established by the more recent decisions. Formerly, when, as in the case of the federal Constitution and of those of some of the states, they amounted practically to mere outlines of government, addressed to the legislatures and to control legislation, the provisions were manifestly not self-executing, but required legislative action to carry them into effect. Winchester v. Howard, 136 Cal. 432, 64 Pac. 692, 69 Pac. 77, 89 Am. St. Rep. 153. The provision now under consideration amounts to more than a mere address to the law-making power; it secures a very substantial right and imposes a duty, not only upon the Legislature, but upon the courts, that the compensation for property taken or damaged, when demanded, shall be ascertained by a jury of freeholders. For the foregoing reasons we are of opinion that the circuit court committed no error in setting aside the verdict and awarding the plaintiff a new trial. By denying her a jury of twelve freeholders, twice demanded, she was denied a very substantial right, guaranteed her by the Constitution, self-executing in its nature and requiring no legislation to give it effect.

[3] It is said by counsel for defendant that there is nothing in the record showing that the jury which tried the case were not qualified freeholders, and that the presumption is that they were freeholders. In Supervisors of Doddridge County v. Stout, supra, it is said that it was as much the duty of the defendant as of the court to see that all the commissioners were freeholders. In this case the demand of the plaintiff was twice rejected by the court. The court refused to require a jury of freeholders. Presumptively, therefore, they were not all freeholders. If no demand or objection had been made, the rule of Ohio River R. R. Co. v. Blake, 38 W. Va. 718, syl. 3, 18 S. E. 957, would apply. It is said that when counsel were inquired of, before the jury were sworn, whether they desired to make any further inquiry, they should have availed themselves of the opportunity offered to inquire whether the jury were freeholders, and not having done so, they must be regarded as having waived the right. But two requests having previously been made, is it to be presumed the court would have receded from its former rulings? Besides, as the court below set aside the verdict on the ground that it had erred in denying plaintiff her constitutional right, the presumption is rather that the court was advised that the jury was not lawfully constituted, after demand for a jury of freeholders.

Counsel for plaintiff, during the trial, appealed to the court to change or modify the rule promulgated in prior decisions here and elsewhere for measuring the compensation to the owner when property is taken or damaged for public use. The suggestion was that in determining the damages, the evidence should be limited to the value of the property immediately before the damage is done and immediately after, but before completion of the proposed improvement, by the laying of cross-ties and rails in the case of a railroad, and in the case of improvement of streets and alleys of a municipality before the concrete base and brick or other surface of street paving is laid; this for the purpose of avoiding the difficulty of distinguishing between general and special benefits in ascertaining damages recoverable in such cases. The rule most recently stated is that:

"The true measure of damages to property abutting on a public street, occasioned by a change in the grade thereof, is the difference between the value of the property immediately before, and its value immediately after, the street improvement, special or peculiar, but not general, benefits to the property being considered and included in the latter value." Jones v. City of Clarksburg, 84 W. Va. 257, 99 S. E. 484.

For the reasons there given, which need not be repeated here, we adhere to that rule and see no reason for accepting the suggestion of a change.

We, therefore, affirm the judgment.

EVANS v. KIRSON et al. (No. 4109.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 24, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Landlord and tenant §166(5)—Owner liable for injuries to tenant's property by freezing and bursting of water pipe.

The owner of a building, containing store-rooms or apartments leased to various tenants, who permits the water to remain in the pipes of a vacant portion of the building in his possession and control, without exercising reasonable precaution to prevent its freezing when the temperature probably may endanger it, is liable to the tenant of a lower floor whose property is injured by the freezing and bursting of a water pipe under such circumstances, unless relieved therefrom by the contributory negligence of the tenant.

2. Landlord and tenant §168(2)—Tenant failing to shut off water to prevent freezing held not contributorily negligent.

Where the owner of such a building has installed therein but one stopcock or valve located in the basement, which when closed shuts off the water from the entire building, a tenant, having exclusive possession and control of the first floor and basement, who knows of the vacancy of the two upper floors of the building, is not contributorily negligent in failing to close such valve on an evening when the temperature is such as to endanger freezing, when he does not know that the stopcock controls the water over the entire building, but believes it to relate only to his own leasehold.

3. Landlord and tenant \Leftrightarrow 169(11)—Tenant's contributory negligence in not closing valve covering water supply held for jury in action for damage from water.

Where the testimony is conflicting as to the tenant's knowledge that the stopcock or valve governs the water supply over the entire building, and as to his authority to close it, the solution of the conflict so presented is peculiarly within the province of a jury, and its finding, in the absence of a clear preponderance of evidence to the contrary, and of prejudicial error during the course of the trial, cannot properly be disturbed.

4. Trial \Leftrightarrow 253(9), 296(4, 5)—Instruction ignoring contributory negligence held erroneous, and not cured by other instructions.

Where contributory negligence is relied on in defense of an action for wrongful injury, an instruction, directing a finding in favor of the plaintiff on certain facts therein set forth, but omitting any reference to the facts tending to establish contributory negligence, and entirely ignoring such defense, is erroneous, and cannot be cured by other instructions given in behalf of either party.

Error to Circuit Court, Berkeley County.

Trespass on the case by James F. Evans against Noah Kirson and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed and remanded.

D. W. Snyder, Jr., and H. H. Emmert, both of Martinsburg, for plaintiff in error.

Martin & Seibert, of Martinsburg, for defendants in error.

LYNOX, J. The judgment complained of on this writ plaintiff recovered in an action of trespass on the case for damages sustained by him as a result of an injury to his property, consisting of pool tables, by water escaping from bursted pipes in the two upper stories of a three-story brick building owned by defendants. The latter leased to plaintiff the first story and basement for a period of two years from April 1, 1916, at a monthly rental of $80. The upper stories were not occupied by tenants at the date of the accident, but seem to have been used by defendants for storage purposes. The pipes were a part of the plumbing system installed in the building. They connected with the city's water mains by means of a service pipe which entered the basement of the building, and thence carried the water throughout its several parts. The only provisions made to stop the water flow into the several portions of the building were located, one at the connection with the water main outside, for the convenience chiefly of the officials in charge of the city's water supply, the other in the basement on the inside of the building, for the convenience of the owner or tenant. By means of either it was possible to shut off the water from the entire building.

Saturday night, January 5, 1918, was intensely cold, and as a natural consequence the water in the pipes installed in the two upper stories froze, there being no artificial heat to prevent freezing, and exerted such pressure that the piping system yielded and broke or split, and thereby caused a leakage and drainage into the room occupied by the lessee. He did not discover the leakage until Sunday evening, when he casually entered the building and found his property seriously injured.

His right to recover compensation for the injury done is based upon the assumption that defendants owed him the duty to protect his property from the danger incident to freezing and bursting pipes in either of the upper stories, by the installation of appliances to cut off the flow of water into such rooms and apartments as were unoccupied by tenants, or by other reasonable means sufficient to furnish similar protection. Defendants to defeat recovery in the action contend that, as there was accessible to plaintiff a stopcock or valve in the basement, it was his duty to close it when he left the building Saturday night, as at that time he must have realized the imminence of the danger because of general weather conditions, and his failure to exercise that precaution constituted contributory negligence on his part, precluding recovery of compensation for his loss. Apart from questions pertaining to the right to file and prove, by way of set-off to plaintiff's claim, rentals due under the terms of the lease and unpaid when the case was tried, excessiveness of the verdict, and the giving and refusal of instructions, the issues to be determined upon this review are as we have stated them to be.

The question of the extent of the landlord's duty to prevent freezing and bursting of water pipes in these parts of the building under his control has never before been presented to this court, so far as we are able to ascertain. But in Charlow v. Blankenship, 80 W. Va. 200, 92 S. E. 318, L. R. A. 1917D, 1149, we held that a lessee might maintain an action to recover damages for the failure of his lessor to exercise due care and diligence in making repairs to that part of the building which he retained in his possession and control, or for the negligent use by the lessor of such part of the building. The present case, however, goes further than that cited, in that here there is no evidence showing that any part of the plumbing system was in a state of disrepair.

[3] It seems that plaintiff did not know that the stopcock or valve in the basement under his control operated to cut off the water from the entire building. True, defendants testify that they had informed him on numerous occasions of its true function, and authorized him to close it in cold weather, but plaintiff flatly denies that he had such information or admonition, and states that he thought it controlled only the water in the poolroom, and deemed it unnecessary to exercise further precaution as to that part of the building because he had left it supplied with heat amply sufficient to protect his property from damage. His conduct at the time of the discovery of the leak tends strongly to support his testimony in this respect; for immediately upon seeing the torrent, as he terms it, pouring through the ceiling onto his tables, he obtained a wrench and rushed upstairs seeking to gain entrance into the second floor room and hoping to find a shut-off there. But discovering the door padlocked, he went to the basement and spent considerable time looking among the maze of pipes for a stopcock other than the one of which he had knowledge. Not finding any, he turned off his, and then for the first time, he says, discovered that it controlled the water, not only in the poolroom, but throughout the entire plumbing system. Of course defendants positively assert that they frequently had given plaintiff such information, but opposed to this is plaintiff's equally positive denial, accompanied by conduct which the jury could say supported his contention. At any rate, the question of plaintiff's authority and knowledge in this respect was presented for the consideration of the jury by defendants' instruction No. 4, clearly calling to their notice defendants' theory of contributory negligence, and as the verdict solved that question in plaintiff's favor, it cannot be disturbed at least on that ground. Of course, if the latter had known that the valve under his control governed the water supply in the building, as he later discovered it did, and had received authority to turn it off in cold weather, as defendants say he had, he might perhaps have been chargeable with contributory negligence in failing to exercise his right and duty, especially since he seems to have known of the vacancy of the two upper floors, and that the turning off of the water would cause no inconvenience to an occupant of the upper floors. However, we express no definite opinion as to that.

A brief review of a few selected authorities dealing with analogous situations in other jurisdictions may be instructive. The case of Hunter-Smith Co. v. Gibson, 119 Va. 582, 89 S. E. 886, is confidently relied on by defendants as decisive of this case. There, as here, plaintiff occupied a room on the ground floor of defendants' three-story building, but, unlike this case, the upper floors were also occupied by tenants. The entire structure was supplied with water through a service pipe leading into the basement, which was within plaintiff's exclusive possession and control. In it, as well as in the storeroom above, were stopcocks by means of which the water could be cut off from the entire building. There was also a shut-off valve on the second floor, but none on the third where the freezing occurred. Plaintiff based his claim for damages upon the failure of the owners to provide a cut-off for each floor to enable its occupant to avoid injury in cold weather. In holding the defendants not liable for the resulting damage to the goods of the plaintiff, the court found him guilty of such negligence as precluded right to compensation, in that he failed to use the means at hand for his own protection. But there is also this further dissimilarity between the facts of the two cases. Plaintiff appears to have known that the stopcocks in the basement and on the first floor controlled the entire water system of the building, for, it seems, they had been used on other occasions to prevent just such an accident. He attempted to justify his failure to exercise due caution for his own safety because of the presence of tenants of other floors, but this attempted justification the court brushed aside, holding it to be unavailing. Whatever might be our views under facts similar to those revealed in the Virginia case, it is sufficient to say that each is clearly distinguishable from the other. Moreover, in the former case cited defendants did not have possession and control of the part of the building in which the break occurred, as they did in this case.

Buckley v. Cunningham, 103 Ala. 449, 15 South. 826, 49 Am. St. Rep. 42, is another case that tends to support the theory relied on to defeat recovery by plaintiff. Tenants of the first floor of defendant's building conducted therein a millinery business. Other stories, two in number, were unoccupied, and therefore in the lessor's possession and control. There was no cut-off inside the building, and none outside except the city valve. The plumbing admittedly was good and free from defects. On an extremely cold night, however, the pipes in the vacant upper stories burst and flooded plaintiff's shop. In reversing a verdict for the latter, the court held that defendant was under no duty to provide valves by which to shut off the water from unoccupied rooms under his control, so long as the plumbing was adequate in other respects, as the tenants, at the time they rented the premises, knew there were no such appliances, and with such knowledge accepted the tenement at a rental based upon the condition as it then existed, and thereby assumed the risk incident to the absence of such equipment. This case represents an extreme view of the reciprocal rights and duties existing between landlord and tenant, and we are not disposed to adopt its conclusions in this instance.

On the other hand, there are several adjudications in support of plaintiff's contention as to the legal duty existing under such circumstances and in harmony with the conclusion we have reached. Kecoughtan Lodge, etc., v. Steiner & Kaufman, 106 Va. 589, 56

S. E. 569, 10 Ann. Cas. 256, involved an action by the occupant of the ground floor of a three-story building owned by defendant to recover damages caused by the freezing and bursting of a water pipe near a toilet on the second floor. There was conflict in the testimony as to whose duty it was to cut off the water from the toilet, plaintiff's evidence tending to show that defendant employed a janitor whose duties included the one in question, while defendant's testimony tended to establish that the toilet was under the exclusive control of tenants occupying the first and second floors, whose duty it was to shut off the water on such occasions. But the jury having found in favor of the former, the court declined to disturb the verdict.

In Moroder v. Fox, 155 Wis. 503, 143 N. W. 1040, L. R. A. 1917B, 238, plaintiff, a tenant occupying the ground floor of a building, sued for injuries caused to his goods as a result of the freezing and bursting of a pipe in a vacant flat on the second story, the third floor being occupied. One water cut-off was provided for the entire building, and that was located in the basement, to which plaintiff and defendant had equal access. A clause in plaintiff's lease required him "to turn and let the water out of the pipes on said premises whenever it shall be necessary to do so to prevent it from freezing or injuring said pipes and property." The court held that clause applied only to plaintiff's premises, and did not require him to shut off the water from the entire building, and found the defendant liable for the damage originating in the vacant flat, saying:

"Knowing that the premises were vacant and unheated, and that the water pipes running through the same to supply the flat on the third floor with water were uncovered and unprotected from frost, it was negligence to allow them so to remain during the winter time."

Two members of the court, however, concurred in a dissenting opinion. For cases announcing similar principles, see Le Vette v. Hardman Estate, 77 Wash. 320, 137 Pac. 454, L. R. A. 1917B, 222; Martindale Clothing Co. v. Spokane & Eastern Trust Co., 79 Wash. 643, 140 Pac. 909; Dreeves v. Schoenberg, 82 N. J. Law, 335, 82 Atl. 530, and also monographic notes in L. R. A. 1917B, 244, and 17 N. C. C. A. 115, 126, et seq., annotating and discussing many other cases relating to the general subject of the liability of a lessor for damage to goods of a tenant caused by leakage from water fixtures.

[1, 2] From the authorities cited and referred to the consensus of judicial opinion seems to be that the owner of a building, containing storerooms or apartments leased to various tenants, who permits the water to remain in the pipes of a vacant portion of the building in his possession and control, must exercise such reasonable precaution as will tend to prevent its freezing when the temperature probably may endanger it. This he may do by the installation of sufficient appliances to cut off vacant rooms from the general plumbing system, by heating them, or in any other manner reasonably sufficient to safeguard tenants of lower floors. Of course, if the tenant is contributorily negligent in failing to use existing appliances within his control and which he is authorized and required to use, he may be barred from a recovery for the resulting damage. And where he knows of the vacancy of the floors above him and is aware that he possesses the means and authority to shut off the water from such portions, there may, or may not, devolve upon him a duty to use the appliances at his disposal, as held in Hunter-Smith Co. v. Gibson, 119 Va. 582, 89 S. E. 886, cited. But though plaintiff probably knew that the upper stories were unoccupied, the jury's finding negatives any such knowledge on his part that the stopcock in the basement controlled the entire building, and in view of the conflicting testimony that finding cannot be disturbed. Hence in this case we are confronted by a breach of duty on the part of defendants, unrelieved by any finding of contributory negligence by the plaintiff—a situation which imposes upon the former liability for the injury and damage resulting to the latter.

Complaint is made of the court's refusal to give instructions Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 5, requested by defendants. No. 1, directing a verdict for defendants, was rightly refused for reasons already stated. The rest were amply covered by No. 4, given, which presented to the jury the question of plaintiff's contributory negligence.

[4] Plaintiff's instruction No. 1, however, was improperly given. It was a binding instruction, directing the jury to find for the plaintiff if from the evidence they believed that defendants did not use due and ordinary means to prevent the escape of the water. It wholly ignored the theory of contributory negligence in failing to close the stopcock in the basement, as disclosed by defendants' instruction No. 4. Binding instructions ignoring vital issues in a case should not be given, even though such issues are presented by other separate and distinct instructions. McCreery's Adm'r v. Ohio River R. Co., 43 W. Va. 110, 27 S. E. 327; Britton v. South Penn Oil Co., 73 W. Va. 792, 81 S. E. 525; Petry v. Cabin Creek Consolidated Coal Co., 77 W. Va. 654, 88 S. E. 105; Stuck v. K. & M. Ry. Co., 78 W. Va. 490, 89 S. E. 280; State v. Price, 83 W. Va. 71, 97 S. E. 582, 5 A. L. R. 1247.

Defendants also assign as erroneous the refusal of the court to permit them to file a statement of two months' rent, due them at the date of the trial, by way of set-off to plaintiff's claim for damages. They do not press the point in this court, however, and hence in accordance with our rules it is deemed to have been waived and abandoned.

Nor is it necessary to discuss the alleged error of the jury in calculating their verdict, disclosed, as defendants contend, by the paper pinned to and returned with it. The verdict is general, and does not in any manner refer to the paper, and no order made the latter a part of the record until after the jury had been discharged. Moreover, the new trial which we are compelled to award renders unnecessary any decision on that point.

For these reasons, we reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, and remand the case for a new trial.

MATHENY v. WHITE. (No. 3557.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 22, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Taxation \S 788(3)—To invalidate tax deed, former owner must show defect or wrongful act in assessment or sale of such character as to invalidate proceedings.

As section 29 of chapter 31 of the Code (sec. 1068) makes a tax deed regular on its face prima facie evidence against the former owner of the land conveyed by it, that the material facts therein recited are true and that such estate as is mentioned in section 25 of said chapter vested in the grantee therein, the former owner, in order to prevail in an attack upon such a deed, must allege and prove a defect or some wrongful act in the proceedings under which the land was assessed, returned delinquent and sold, of such character as will invalidate it.

2. Taxation \S 688—Mere defect in list returning land delinquent insufficient to overthrow tax deed.

A mere defect in a list returning land delinquent for nonpayment of taxes does not constitute ground for overthrow of a deed made in pursuance of a sale based thereon, provided it is not such as precludes the view that the paper is such a list, for it falls within the curative provisions of section 25 of chapter 31 (sec. 1064).

3. Taxation \S 788(9)—Excerpt from conclusion of delinquent tax list held insufficient for overthrow of tax deed.

Production of a mere excerpt from the conclusion of a delinquent list several pages in length, showing only a recapitulation of the contents thereof, by districts, cities, and towns, under an incomplete subheading which, if complete, would indicate a recapitulation of a list of lands returned as having been improperly placed on the land books or as being unascertainable, but over an affidavit appropriate to a list of lands returned delinquent for nonpayment of taxes, is not sufficient to overthrow a deed made pursuant to a sale based on such list, on the ground of lack of a return of delinquency for nonpayment of taxes.

4. Taxation \S 788(9) — Delinquent tax list held insufficiently established to authorize overthrow of a tax deed.

Nor is such list shown to be a list of lands returned as having been improperly placed on the land books or as being unascertainable, by indorsement thereon and recordation therewith, of an attested copy of an order of the county court of the county in which it was returned, indicating that it was presented, examined, approved, and allowed as such a list, because such attested copy is no part of the list nor of the proceedings of record in the clerk's office of the county court, pertaining to the assessment return and sale of the land.

5. Taxation \S 788(9)—Attested copy of county court order indorsed upon copy of delinquent list sent to state auditor may constitute sufficient certification of allowance of list.

Such attested copy, however, indorsed upon the copy of the list sent to the state auditor, by the clerk of such court, constitutes a sufficient certification of the allowance of the list, and the list so sent up may show by its contents that it is a list of land delinquent for nonpayment of taxes and has been misdescribed in the attested order performing the function of a certificate, wherefore such excerpt from the list is not sufficient to prove lack of certification thereof.

6. Taxation \S 788(9)—Attested copy of county court order on delinquency list held insufficient to prove lack of presentation to county court and approval by it.

Being no part of the proceedings of record in the clerk's office of the county court, pertaining to the delinquency and sale of the land, such attested copy of a court order, appearing on the list, does not prove lack of presentation to the county court and examination and approval thereof by it, as a list of lands delinquent for nonpayment of taxes.

7. Taxation \S 788(9) — Proof as to mode of recordation of delinquency list held insufficient to enable court to say that list for each year not transcribed into book provided therefor.

Proof that the delinquent lists of a county are kept by the clerk of its county court, in separate bound books, by years, the list for each year constituting one book and each book being so labeled as clearly to indicate its character and contents, is too uncertain and indefinite, as to the mode of recordation, to enable the court to say the list for each year is merely bound and labeled and not transcribed into a book provided for the purpose.

8. Taxation \S 656—Rule for determining the time for sale of delinquent lands stated.

Properly interpreted, the provisions of section 6 of chapter 31, of the Code (sec. 1064), prescribing the time for sales of delinquent lands, do not authorize a sale of such lands on the second Monday in December, if a term of the circuit or county court of the county is held in said month or the preceding month, on the first day of which sale cannot be made by reason of lack of time for posting and publication of notice, after receipt of the lists, wherefore the sale should be made on the first day of a circuit or county court for such county, whichever is held first, in the succeeding year, and a sale made on such court day, under such circumstances, is valid as to the time of sale.

9. Statutes \S 185 — Unnecessary Implication cannot stand against express terms evincing contrary legislative intent.

In the interpretation of a statute, an unnecessary implication cannot stand against express terms evincing legislative intention contrary thereto.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Proceedings by William A. Matheny against John Baker White to vacate a tax deed. Decree for defendant, and complainant appeals. Affirmed.

McIntic, Mathews & Campbell, of Charleston, for appellant.

Henry S. Cato, of Charleston, for appellee.

POFFENBARGER, J. The decree of the common pleas court of Kanawha county, which the circuit court of that county refused to disturb by the award of an appeal therefrom, brought up by this appeal, dismissed, on final hearing, a bill filed for the purpose of vacation of a tax deed conveying to the appellee, White, a tract of 7½ acres of land, based on a sheriff's sale thereof for nonpayment of taxes for the year 1904.

The tax deed was obtained October 24, 1911. Tellitha J. Gillispie and her husband, claiming some interest in the tract of land, executed a deed, December 18, 1911, conveying 5 acres thereof to J. G. Carper. On the next day, Carper and his wife executed a deed purporting to convey to the said Gillispie and her husband the undivided one-half of the 5 acres. On March 29, 1912, White and the Gillispies and the Carpers executed a lease on the 7½ acres to E. A. Mead, J. H. Mead, and L. M. Whan, for oil and gas purposes. White had previously executed a lease on the same land to the Hamilton Company, which afterwards came into the hands of the William Seymour Edwards Oil Company. Not long before the tax deed was obtained, oil was discovered in the neighborhood of the land, and, since this controversy arose, a well of small production has been drilled on the land. Before he took his deed, Col. White claims to have advised the owners of their right to redeem and given them a fair opportunity to do so. That ample time was allowed is clear. After obtaining it, he conveyed the surface to plaintiff's mother for a merely nominal consideration, if any at all.

As no demurrer was interposed to the bill, its sufficiency seems to be conceded. The answer is very full and complete. It fully, clearly, and specifically denies every allegation of fact relied upon for the establishment of invalidity of the deed. Some of the numerous grounds of assault upon that instrument have completely failed and are no longer relied upon.

The argument submitted to sustain six of the seven assignments of error found in the brief filed for the appellant is based largely upon an exhibit filed with the bill, which, on its face, purports to be only a part of a record or paper, and admittedly is only a part thereof. A witness testifies that it is a certified copy of a part of the delinquent list for 1904. The document from which it was taken, as now found in the clerk's office of Kanawha county, is described as being a bound book, 20 or 24 inches long and about 16 inches wide, and is designated the delinquent list for the year 1904, by a label or mark placed thereon.

The first thing on the exhibit is this incomplete caption:

"List of Property on the Land Book, for the County of Kanawha—Thereon or Not Ascertainable for the Year 190—."

Following that are the headings of columns for names of persons charged with taxes, the estates held, the quantities of land, the descriptions and locations of the land, the distances and bearings from the courthouse and the different funds for which taxes are charged. Under the designation "Grand Recapitulation" are the names of the magisterial districts, cities, and towns of the county, opposite to which are columns of figures showing the aggregate amounts of taxes for which delinquent returns were made. This is followed by an affidavit admittedly made in the form prescribed by the statute. Lastly, it sets forth what purports to be an attested copy of an order entered by the county court of Kanawha county, on July 24, 1905, saying:

"This day came J. A. Jarrett, sheriff of this county, presented to the court a list of real estate which is improperly placed on the assessor's books, or is not ascertainable with the amount of taxes charged on such property for the year 1904, verified by his affidavit thereto appended, which said list being examined by the court, and found to be correct, is therefore allowed."

The statute contemplates three delinquent lists: (1) A list of lands improperly placed on the land books or not ascertainable; (2) a list of other real estate delinquent for nonpayment of taxes; and (3) a list of persons and property other than real estate. The first two of these lists have different headings, but the form of verification of each is exactly the same. Code, c. 30, § 21 (sec. 1043). The blanks for these lists are furnished by the state authorities. Only real estate returned in the second list is subject to sale, and the heading of the exhibit is relied upon as showing return of lands required to be embraced in the first.

As the statute does not authorize sale of lands returned in the first one of the three lists, but does authorize sale of those required to be returned in the second, the heading of the exhibit and the court order thereon certified are treated in the argument, as proof that only one list was returned, a list of lands improperly charged or not ascertainable, and that no list showing a return of lands delinquent for nonpayment of taxes was made out and filed. Upon this assumption, it is contended that the list returned constituted no basis for a sale; that no list authorizing sale was preserved and recorded by the clerk; that no such list was presented to the county court or examined by it; that no such list was certified to the auditor, by the clerk of the court; and that the auditor did not certify to the sheriff, for sale, lands returned delinquent for nonpayment of taxes, but did attempt to certify for sale lands improperly charged or not ascertainable.

[1] Regular and accordant with statutory requirements, on its face, the tax deed is prima facie proof that all statutory provisions essential to a sale of the land thereby conveyed were complied with and that such title as it purports to convey vested in the grantee. Code, c. 31, § 29 (sec. 1088). Hence, in every attack upon such a deed by the former owner of the land, he must affirmatively show, in order to prevail, that some essential step in the proceedings was omitted or some vitiating act performed. Hogan v. Piggett, 60 W. Va. 541, 56 S. E. 189; Mosser v. Moore, 56 W. Va. 478, 49 S. E. 537; Dequasie v. Harris, 16 W. Va. 345. Recognizing this rule, the plaintiff has attempted to establish lack of a return of delinquency of the land in question, for nonpayment of taxes.

The exhibit relied upon as proof of such omission is clearly not sufficient. As the oral evidence discloses, it is a certified copy of the whole or part of one sheet or page of a document sufficient in volume to constitute a bound book found among the records of the clerk's office of the county court, and presumptively the last page thereof. If it were read in connection with all that precedes it, and in the light thereof, it might turn out to be, in its incomplete heading, and in the copy of the court order indorsed thereon, a misdescription and a misnomer of an otherwise complete and perfect list of lands returned for nonpayment of taxes. And, notwithstanding the certificate of what purports to be a copy of the court order therein set forth, there may be an order of the court, showing presentation, examination, and allowance of the list, as one of lands returned delinquent for nonpayment of taxes. In other words, the numerous sheets on which the lands were entered and returned, constituting the list, may have been properly headed, "List of Real Estate in the County of Kanawha Delinquent for Nonpayment of Taxes Thereon for the Year 1904," and the recapitulation made upon a blank intended for the other list, the list of lands improperly charged, and the affidavit appended thereto. In such case, the list itself would be properly headed and be complete, perfect, and unclouded, but for this incomplete expression, "List of Property on the Land Book, for the County of Kanawha—Thereon or Not Ascertainable for the Year 190—," at the end thereof and above the recapitulation. As has been stated, the affidavit is, in terms, the one prescribed for the list of lands returned for nonpayment, wherefore there is no defect in it. The erroneous designation of the recapitulation is not controlling, for the statute does not in terms require a recapitulation. Besides the heading on the exhibit is incomplete. It names no year, and another blank is unfilled. Read in connection with what may have been a dozen or more other and preceding pages properly and fully headed, it could not be regarded as anything other than an erroneous caption of the recapitulation, not the list, left or entered thereon by mistake. If it could not be wholly disregarded, it would constitute nothing more than a slight defect in the list.

The attested copy of the court order appended to the list, as shown by the exhibit, and describing it as a list of lands improperly charged or not ascertainable, may be disregarded upon the inquiry as to the character of the list returned, because the statute nowhere requires its indorsement on, or recordation with, the delinquent list. After the list has been approved by the county court, it is the duty of the clerk to certify a copy thereof to the auditor and record the original. Code, c. 31, § 24 (sec. 1083). He is not required to indorse any certificate or court order upon the original. Hence, this attested copy of the order is no part of the proceedings of record in the clerk's office of the county court.

Though there may have been but one affidavit to the list from which the exhibit was taken, that fact does not disprove sufficiency of the list. Only one list of real estate may have been returned, and that may have been one of lands delinquent for nonpayment of taxes.

[2] If the list returned was such as we have shown it may have been, a merely defective one, the defect therein would not justify vacation of the deed. It is expressly and clearly cured by section 25 of chapter 31 of the Code (sec. 1084), saying:

"And no irregularity, error or mistake, in the delinquent list, or the return thereof, or in the affidavit thereto, * * * shall, after the deed is made, invalidate or affect the sale or deed."

[3-5] Treated as the clerk's certificate of the list to the auditor, the attested copy of the court order is sufficient. A manifestly erroneous designation of the list in a clerk's certificate could not change its character. It would correctly define itself by its contents, even though a single erroneous expression therein should be inconsistent therewith. The order or certificate says the list was presented, examined, found to be correct, and allowed, and the erroneous designation thereof, in the case supposed, would be corrected by its true character as disclosed by its contents. The statute requires certification of copies of the lists, but it prescribes no form of certificate. A copy of the court order allowing the list is usually indorsed upon the original, copied with it for the certificate and recorded, but it can operate only as a certificate, for the reason already stated. It is, however, an indorsement upon the copy, signed by the clerk, saying the list was presented, examined, found to be correct, and allowed. Then the document so certified proves itself, as to its character.

What has been said fully disposes of the contention that the auditor's certification of the lands in the list, to the sheriff, for sale, as being delinquent for nonpayment of taxes, was unauthorized and invalid. What is relied upon as proof of return of a list on which a sale could not be predicated and certification thereof to the sheriff is wholly insufficient for that purpose.

[6] There is no proof that the county court did not approve and allow the list as one of lands returned for nonpayment of taxes. Despite the attested copy indorsed on the exhibit, there may have been a court order so allowing it, and the proof does not negative its existence. The court ought not to be asked to infer nonexistence thereof from the exhibit, because, if it does not exist, the fact could have been shown. Stout v. Sands, 56 W. Va. 683, 669, 49 S. E. 423. Strictly speaking, the attested copy should not have been on the original list. The order should have been sought in the order books of the court.

[7] Nor is there clear evidence that the list was not properly recorded. Though one witness was made to say the original list was merely bound, instead of transcribed in a book, by assumption that it was, in questions propounded to him, he distinctly said there was a book in the office of the kind required by law to be kept for recordation of such lists. Another witness said the book from which the exhibit was taken was "a book such as we record the delinquent lists in each year." Both described it as a book labeled as the delinquent list for 1904, and say there was a book of that kind for each year. If what is claimed is true, it was susceptible of clear proof in less than a dozen words, and the burden of proof thereof was on the plaintiff. It is not the province of courts to raise out of equivocal expressions what is manifestly susceptible of positive proof if it exists. Stout v. Sands, cited.

[8] The remaining inquiry is whether the land was sold at a time prescribed by law. If it was not and the fact appears in the proceedings of record, the irregularity is fatal. It is not cured by any statute. Hardman v. Brannon, 70 W. Va. 726, 75 S. E. 74. Although the statute required delivery to the sheriff of the auditor's list containing the land in question, on or before November 1, 1906, it was not delivered earlier than November 3, 1906. At any rate, there is a preponderance of evidence against delivery before the last-mentioned date. That delivery was too late to enable the sheriff to sell at the November term of the county court, or the December term of the circuit court of Kanawha county, held in that year. It was advertised for sale on December 11, 1906, under the impression that sale thereof could be made on the second Monday of said month; but there were errors and irregularities for which such sale was abandoned, notice of a continuance thereof until February 11, 1907, given, and the property readvertised for the time and in the manner prescribed by law. The sale seems to have been advertised for the second Tuesday, instead of the second Monday, in December, and the notice published only in Sunday issues of a daily paper. If the statute authorized sale on the second Monday of December, under the circumstances, the list may have been received in time for sale on that date; but our interpretation of the statute renders it unnecessary to pass upon that question.

Section 6, c. 31, Code (sec. 1064), requires sale to be made "on the first day of the next November or December term of the circuit or county court of the said county, whichever may be held first after the posting of said list and the publication of said notice as herein required: or if no term of either court be held in said county in November or December; then on the second Monday in December next thereafter." An exception is pro-

"If the lists herein named be not received by the sheriff in time to publish such notice and make such sale in the month of November or December, as herein provided for, then said sale shall be commenced on the first day of a circuit or county court for such county, whichever may be held first, in the year next after the publication of such notice of sale."

[9] If the lists were not received in time to sell in November or December, within the meaning of these provisions, then the second notice of sale, fixing upon February 11, 1907, as the time, and the sale made thereunder, were valid, for that day was the first day of the first term of court held in the succeeding year. Under the circumstances, the statute would not have been literally followed by a sale on the second Monday in December. Sale on that day can be made only when no circuit or county court is held in November or December. In this case, there was a term of court in each of those months. If the terms of the exception could be ignored, those of the other provision might be interpreted as authorizing sale on the second Monday in December, in case of failure to receive the lists in time for a sale on a court day in November or December, when there is such a term. But the terms of the exception forbid such interpretation. In other words, they forbid modification of the meaning of the words of the main provision, by implication. They say the exception shall be operative and controlling, unless the lists shall have been received in time to advertise and sell as provided in the section, that is, on a court day in November or December, or on the second Monday in December, if no court is held in November or December. The phrase, "as herein provided for," found in the exception, extends its operation to all cases not falling within the terms of the general provision. If a term of court is held in either of the months named, and the lists are not received in time therefor, the general clause does not say the sale may be made on the second Monday in December. Sale can be made on that day, agreeably to the words of the general provision, only in the event that no court is held in November or December, and the exception makes the words, "if no term of either court be held in said county in November or December," binding, by reference thereto and adoption thereof. A mere unnecessary implication cannot stand against express words. Waggy v. Waggy, 77 W. Va. 144, 87 S. E. 178; Bank v. Thomas, 75 W. Va. 321, 83 S. E. 985; Bank v. Jacobs, 74 W. Va. 525, 82 S. E. 320, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 695.

From this conclusion, it results that the sale was made on the day authorized by law, after due advertisement and posting of the list, and it is immaterial that there were mere purpose and preparation to sell on a different day.

Seeing no error in the decree complained of, we will affirm it.

MURPHY v. KARNES. (No. 4074.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 22, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Executors and administrators § 17(2)— Grandfather held entitled to appointment in preference to stranger.

The principles announced in the case In re the Administration of the Estate of Joel Stollings, 82 W. Va. 18, 95 S. E. 446, affirmed and applied.

Error to Circuit Court, Morgan County.

Petition to county court by John K. Murphy against Hiram Karnes, administrator.

Judgment for defendant on appeal to circuit court, and petitioner brings error. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

A. C. McIntire, of Martinsburg, and G. McIntire-Weaver, of Berkely Springs, for plaintiff in error.

LIVELY, J. A. R. Barnes, a resident of Morgan county, died intestate on November 7, 1918, leaving a widow, Bessie Fortney Barnes, and one child, Ada, about three years of age. Several hours afterwards, on the same day, the widow, Bessie Fortney Barnes, died intestate, leaving surviving her, Ada, the three year old child, begotten by A. R. Barnes, and two other children, Flora Fortney and Madeline Fortney, both under fourteen years of age, children by a former deceased husband. On the 12th day of November, 1918, the infant child Ada died. The three deaths were caused by the terrible epidemic of influenza which prevailed that year, and left so many broken homes and bleeding hearts. On the day of the death of the infant Ada, Jonas H. Karnes, on his own motion, was appointed administrator of the estates of A. R. Barnes and Bessie F. Barnes, and qualified, giving bond in the penalty of $1,500, which appointment was confirmed by the county court on January 20, 1919. Karnes was no relation either by blood or marriage to the decedents, and was not a creditor nor in any way interested in the administration of the estates. On the following day John K. Murphy, who is the grandfather of the infants Flora and Madeline Fortney, appeared before the county clerk and moved the revocation of the appointment of Karnes as administrator, and asked to be appointed in his stead. This motion was resisted by Karnes, who had been also appointed guardian of the infant distributees. Thereupon the clerk revoked the appointment of Karnes, but refused to appoint Murphy, or reappoint Karnes, who then asked to be reappointed upon motion of himself as guardian. The parties then agreed to submit their claims for administration to the judge of the circuit court upon an agreement of facts. The judge declined to take jurisdiction, and on the 27th day of September, 1919, John K. Murphy presented his formal petition to the county court, alleging that he was the next of kin of the infant distributees and the only adult distributee of the estates, that the appointment of Karnes was unlawfully made, and, although revoked, he (Karnes) was continuing to act as administrator, that petitioner had never declined to qualify in his own right or on behalf of the infants, his grandchildren, that he is the next of kin to the infants, and, in case of their demise, would inherit the entire estates, and praying that he be appointed as administrator. To this petition Karnes appeared at a session of the court held on October 4, 1919. The hearing was continued until October 11, 1919, but it appears that on October 4, 1919, Hiram Karnes was appointed administrator of the estates. At the next hearing of the petition on October 11, 1919, Jonas H. Karnes nominated Hiram Karnes, his brother, as administrator, and the court again appointed Hiram Karnes as such, over the objection of Murphy, the grandfather. Afterwards Hiram Karnes qualified as administrator and gave bond in the penalty of $2,000. An appeal was allowed from the order of the county court upon petition of Murphy, duly verified, setting out the proceedings in full with attested copies of the various orders of the county court as exhibits; and on January 17, 1920, upon argument of counsel, the court dismissed the appeal as improvidently awarded, and awarded costs against the petitioner. From this order of the circuit court plaintiff obtained this writ of error.

The statute authorizing the granting of letters of administration, sections 4 and 5 of chapter 85, Code (secs. 3991, 3992), in part reads:

"Administration shall be granted to the distributees who apply therefor, preferring first the husband or wife, and then such others entitled to distribution as the court shall see fit. If no distributee apply for administration within 30 days from the death of the intestate, the court may grant administration to one or more of his creditors, or to any other person.

* * * If a will of the deceased be afterwards admitted to record, or if after administration is granted to a creditor, or other person than a distributee, any distributee who shall not have before refused, shall apply for administration, there may be a grant of probate or administration in like manner as if the former grant had not been made, and the said former grant shall thereupon cease."

The defendant Hiram Karnes filed no answer or plea to the petition of the plaintiff either in the county court or circuit court. No evidence was taken so far as the record discloses. There is no intimation that the grandfather is unfit for the trust. The petition alleges that he is the nearest of kin to the infants, and will be the sole heir of the estates in case he should survive them. He has been taking care of them since the untimely death of the parents, and is bound to them by ties of blood, love, and affection.

He avers his readiness and ability to execute the necessary bond. Should he have preference over the stranger in the administration of this important trust and in its preservation for the benefit of the children, and for his own possible inheritance? Reason answers in the affirmative. The statute accords with reason. Its terms clearly indicate that those having an interest in the estate as distributees shall be preferred to the strangers. This court has held that it is mandatory upon the county court to appoint a distributee upon his application if he be a fit person and able to qualify. Should the distributee not desire the appointment, or be unable to give bond, he may designate the person to be appointed. Taylor v. Virginia-Pocahontas Coal Co., 78 W. Va. 455, 88 S. E. 1070. But the infants are of tender years, and for that reason cannot nominate an administrator. In such cases the general rule is that the person who is nearest to the distributee in blood, affection, and interest is entitled to the administration. This court has held that, if the distributee be a minor of such tender years as to be unable to designate a person for the trust, the mother, as the natural guardian, custodian, nearest relative, and prospective heir may demand the administration in her own name in its behalf, and it then becomes the duty of the court, having jurisdiction, to grant it to her upon proper application, if she be a suitable person and able to qualify. In re Estate of Joel Stollings, 82 W. Va. 18, 95 S. E. 448. The same reasons would dictate the appointment of the grandfather, where the mother and father are both dead, and he is the custodian of the infants and their prospective heir. The principles announced by Judge Poffenbarger in the Stollings Case, cited, govern this case.

The county court erroneously refused the appointment of John K. Murphy as the administrator of the estates upon his petition, and the circuit court erred in dismissing his appeal, and thereby refusing to grant him the proper relief. The case will be remanded to the county court of Morgan county, with direction to grant administration of the estates of Albert R. Barnes, deceased, and of Bessie Fortney Barnes, deceased, to John K. Murphy, plaintiff in error, when he executes proper bonds and takes the prescribed oaths.

Reversed and remanded.

GRAY v. CENTRAL WAREHOUSE CO. et al. (No. 222.)(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 6, 1921.)1. Warehousemen ¶8—Owner of property affected with public use must treat all users impartially.

The owner of any business affected with a public use, so long as he devotes his property to such use, must treat with absolute impartiality all who apply to him for service.

2. Injunction ¶136(1)—Tobacco buyer entitled to temporary injunction against exclusion from warehouse pending determination of charges against him.

A tobacco buyer is prima facie entitled to attend tobacco sales in public warehouses and to bid therein, and the warehousemen will be temporarily restrained from interfering with such right pending the final trial at which the sufficiency of the warehousemen's grounds for excluding him will be determined.

3. Warehousemen ¶3—Tobacco warehouses are public and affected with a public use.

Tobacco warehouses, which are essential to the conduct of the most important agricultural pursuit in the state, and which have been regulated by statute since the earliest colonial times, and are now regulated as to charges, transaction of business, and accounts by G. S. §§ 4926-4980, 5124-5126, and required to take out a license by section 7839, are public warehouses engaged in business affected with a public interest.

4. Warehousemen ¶8—Public warehouse cannot discriminate against any seller or buyer.

A public warehouse company cannot discriminate by rejecting or excluding any one therefrom as seller or buyer.

5. Warehousemen ¶8—Public warehouse cannot exclude buyer for nonmembership in board of trade.

A public warehouse cannot exclude therefrom a buyer for the reason that he was not a member of or had been excluded from a board of trade.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Connor, Judge.

Action by George W. Gray against the Central Warehouse Company and others. From an order continuing until trial a restraining order against defendants, they appeal. Affirmed.

This is an action by George W. Gray, alleging that since 1914 he has been engaged in the business of buying tobacco sold on the floors of the tobacco warehouses located in Kinston, N. C., and up to 1920 had bought large quantities of tobacco, and that the buying of leaf tobacco upon warehouse floors is the principal business and occupation of the plaintiff, who has a license from the United States government to buy leaf tobacco; that the persons, firms, and corporations named as defendants compose a voluntary association known as the Kinston Tobacco Board of Trade, which consists of several warehouses doing respectively business in said town as the Central Warehouse Company, Farmers' Warehouse Company, Atlantic Warehouse, Knott Bros. Warehouse, Eagle Warehouse Company, and the New Brick Warehouse Company; that under a rule of the said Board of Trade no person could buy tobacco on said warehouse floors unless he were a member of the Kinston Tobacco Board of Trade; that heretofore and up to 1920 the membership fee of the said Kinston Tobacco Board of Trade was $25, which sum was so small that any person desiring to buy tobacco could easily become a member of the Board of Trade with the right and privilege of buying tobacco, but on August 23, 1920, the said Board of Trade, the plaintiff not being present and having no notice, adopted a rule fixing the membership fee at $500 and raising the annual dues from $18.50 to $49.50, and also adopted a rule that failure to pay within 10 days after notice would forfeit membership. The plaintiff further averred that, though a member of the Board of Trade, he was not present at said meeting and had no notice thereof, and the Board of Trade, composed of 34 members, increased the membership fee to $500, which was exorbitant and excessive, and was intended to reduce competition among the buyers by limiting the number of competing bidders; that the dominant and controlling members of the said Kinston Board of Trade are the representatives of the Imperial Tobacco Company, Export Tobacco Company, Liggett & Myers Tobacco Company, and the American Tobacco Company, and the warehouses in said town, and that the purpose of the said tobacco companies was, by diminishing competition among buyers, to purchase the tobacco upon the warehouse floors at the lowest possible price, with the result that said tobacco companies would obtain tobacco at a less price than it was reasonably worth, and in this way the tobacco growers in that section of the state are compelled to take less for their tobacco than the same is fairly worth, it being the purpose and object of said combination of manufacturers to purchase the tobacco at the lowest possible price by eliminating the independent buyer or reducing the strength and number of the independent buyers, and that for that purpose said companies gave notice through the president of the Kinston Tobacco Board of Trade, he being one of the buyers for the Export Tobacco Company, to each of the said warehouses, that if any of the said warehouses accepted any bid from the plaintiff for tobacco on the said warehouse floor, then the said tobacco companies—i. e., the Imperial Tobacco Company, the Export Tobacco Company, Liggett & Myers Tobacco Company, the American Tobacco Company, and the other companies above named—would withdraw their buyers from said market and the floors of said warehouse offending and not buy any tobacco offered for sale thereon, and he avers that the reason assigned for refusing the plaintiff's membership, which was that he had "nested" tobacco, was a pretext, and he was found guilty without giving the plaintiff an opportunity to be heard or requesting him to give information though the charge was untrue and false; whereupon the plaintiff brought this action for damages to his reputation and character and humiliation for such unjust expulsion, and denies that the defendants had the right to exclude him from buying on the floors of said warehouses, and asked for an injunction to compel them to accept bids made by him for tobacco sold upon their said warehouse floors and deliver upon payment therefor. The defendants answered, denying some of the allegations and admitting others, and the court in its judgment granted an injunction to the hearing, finding as facts that—

"The defendants, Central Warehouse Company, Farmers' Warehouse Company, Atlantic Warehouse Company, Knott Bros. Warehouse, Eagle Warehouse Company, and the New Brick Warehouse, are each and all public tobacco warehouses, doing business as warehousemen in the city of Kinston, and that each and every one of the said warehouses declined and refused to admit the plaintiff, George W. Gray, dealer in leaf tobacco, holding registration under United States statute marked Exhibit A, and filed in the record, to purchase or bid for tobacco upon the warehouse floors of the said respective warehouses for the reason that the said George W. Gray was not a member of the Kinston Tobacco Board of Trade, the plaintiff having been expelled upon the charge of nesting tobacco, and the court being of the opinion that the said defendant warehouses above named cannot refuse to permit plaintiff to bid whether the allegations of their answers are true or not," and restrained the above-named warehouse companies and other persons named in the complaint from preventing "the said George W. Gray, the plaintiff, to bid for tobacco offered for sale upon the floors of the said respective warehouses at public auction, and to buy the same when his said bid is the highest bid therefor, and to deliver the same to him upon the payment therefor," and "consideration of the issues raised by the pleadings is continued to be heard and to be determined in due course and practice of this court, and the cause is retained for further orders."

From this order continuing this restraining order to the hearing the defendants appealed.

Cowper, Whitaker & Allen and Rouse & Rouse, all of Kinston, for appellants.

Powers & Elliott, of Kinston, and James S. Manning, of Raleigh, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. The only question presented is whether under the allegations of the complaint and admissions in the answer, and on the facts found by him, his honor was justified in entering the order appealed from.

The Kinston Board of Trade is a voluntary organization, and they had the right to exclude or expel the plaintiff from membership therein with or without cause, and his honor properly held that he did not pass upon that question, but, inasmuch as the defendant warehouse companies were operating their property "affected with the public use," he rightly held that they had no power to exclude the plaintiff from buying because he was or was not a member of that organization.

The plaintiff's cause of action is not because of his exclusion from the Board of Trade, but because he was forbidden to buy on the floor of the warehouses, and damages for such interference with his business, and because of the humiliation and damages to his business by the publicity given to the allegation that he had been expelled for improper conduct. This raises issues of fact for the jury on the question of damages and whether the allegation by the Board of Trade that he had been guilty of "nesting" tobacco was truthful or not. These issues were continued to the trial to be passed on by the jury. But the court held that whether he was a member of the Board of Trade or not did not entitle the defendants to exclude him as a buyer, and his honor properly continued the order restraining the defendants from excluding the plaintiff as a buyer until the hearing. The order appealed from provides that "the plaintiff is to be accepted as a buyer only when his is the highest bid and on payment."

[1, 2] If any one applies to a railroad or a ferry for the transportation of himself or the carriage of freight, or to an innkeeper, or sends his corn to a public mill or his tobacco to a public warehouse, or applies to the owners of a gas or electric power plant or any other business "affected with a public use," it has always been a principle of the common law, and never more necessary than now, that he is entitled to absolute impartiality as to the charges and treatment. If a passenger misconducts himself, those in charge of the train can put him off, and the same is true as to any other business affected with the public use. If in this case at the trial it shall be found that the plaintiff as a seller "nested" his tobacco, it would prevent any recovery for damages on the charge of humiliation caused by the publicity given by the defendants in making public that matter, for the truth is a defense to libel. Whether, if true, such conduct authorized the defendants to exclude the plaintiff as a buyer, is a matter which may come up on appeal from the verdict at the trial, but we hold that his honor was eminently correct in holding that, as long as that matter was undecided, the defendants had no power to exclude the plaintiff from being a buyer at their public sales, and the injunction until the hearing was properly granted.

In Nash v. Page, 80 Ky. 539, 44 Am. Rep. 490, the duty imposed upon public warehousemen for sale of tobacco is thus summed up:

"When a warehouseman for the public sale and purchase of tobacco undertakes to sell at auction, and to conduct the business of a public warehouseman, he assumes an obligation to serve the entire public. He has no right to select his own bidders, nor can he refuse to receive the tobacco of producers when shipped to him. He can no more refuse to sell the tobacco of the producer at auction, or deny the right of any to bid * * * when offered, than the owner of a stage or steamboat line may decline to take passengers, or the owner of wine houses refuse to receive the wine of others on storage. He cannot escape the obligation imposed by the reason of the statute and the common law, by changing his appellation from warehouseman to commission merchant."

There is stated as authority for this the principles of the common law:

"The selling of tobacco at auction at tobacco warehouses is a business affected with the public interests, and [those] carrying it on are under duties and obligations by common law * * * to carry it on in a way that is reasonable and beneficial to the tobacco trade, and therefore they cannot discriminate or exclude buyers or sellers."

This proposition is sustained by Cooley, Const. Lim. (7th Ed.) 870 et seq., and notes. The same subject is thoroughly discussed by Waite, Chief Justice, in Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 125, 24 L. Ed. 77, where it is held that—

"It has been customary in England from time immemorial and in this country from its first colonization to regulate ferries, common carriers, hackmen, bakers, millers, wharfingers, innkeepers, etc., and in so doing to fix a maximum of charge to be made for services rendered, accommodations furnished, and articles sold."

And the doctrine is there traced back to Chief Justice Hale. It is there also stated that it was held to apply to warehouses in Aldnut v. Inglis, 12 East, 527.

The same statement as to the common law as to the many different businesses where property is affected with a public use forbidding discrimination in prices or otherwise is to be found in Bacon's Abridgment, Wait's Actions and Defenses, and Aldnut v. Inglis, 12 East, 527 (already quoted), and Freund on Police Power, §§ 372-394.

In Head v. Mfg. Co., 113 U. S. 17, 5 Sup. Ct. 441, 28 L. Ed. 889, Munn v. Illinois was reaffirmed as to a water mill and milldam being affected with a public use, forbidding any discrimination as to the patrons or charges, and at pages 17 and 18 are given the states which have by statute enlarged the common-law power in this respect, and among them this state.

One of the most informing decisions on this subject is Publishing Co. v. Ass'n Press, 184 Ill. 438, 56 N. E. 822, 48 L. R. A. 568, 75 Am. St. Rep. 184, which held:

"The obligation of a corporation charged with a public interest does not arise from, nor rest upon, contracts made by it in conducting its business, but grows out of the fact that the corporation is discharging a public duty or private duty, which has been so conducted that it has become affected with a public interest."

To the same purport is State v. Edwards, 86 N. C. 666, as to gristmills. In Brass v. North Dakota, 153 U. S. 391, 14 Sup. Ct. 857, 38 L. Ed. 757, the doctrine was applied to public warehouses, and Munn v. Illinois was reaffirmed. It had already been reaffirmed as to elevators in People v. Budd, 117 N. Y. 1, 22 N. E. 670, 682, 5 L. R. A. 559, 15 Am. St. Rep. 460, affirmed on writ of error 143 U. S. 517, 12 Sup. Ct. 468, 36 L. Ed. 247.

The same principle as to all agencies "affected with a public use" was restated in Milldam Corp. v. Newman, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 477, 23 Am. Dec. 622. The same rule was applied to gas companies (Shepard v. Gas Co., 6 Wis. 546, 70 Am. Dec. 479), and to stockyards (Chicago v. Rumpff, 45 Ill. 90, 92 Am. Dec. 196), to market houses (Gale v. Kalamazoo, 28 Mich. 845, 355, 9 Am. Rep. 80, in a learned opinion by Chief Justice Cooley). That an auction house was held for public use was laid down in 70 E. C. L. 54. The application of this doctrine to common carriers and other public utilities has been too often and too fully recognized to require any citations. We have recently applied it to electric power companies. Public Service Co. v. Power Co., 179 N. C. 13, 101 S. E. 593; Railroad v. Power Co., 180 N. C. 422, 105 S. E. 28; Griffin v. Water Co., 122 N. C. 208, 30 S. E. 319, 41 L. R. A. 240; and other cases.

[3] Tobacco warehouses are public warehouses under the laws of North Carolina. Since 1895 the Legislature of North Carolina has regulated the warehouse charges, requiring that the tobacco shall be weighed by a person duly sworn, and that every warehouse proprietor shall render to each seller of tobacco a bill of charges of fees for the same and subjecting said proprietors to penalties for violations of the provisions of said statute (C. S. 5124, 5125, 5126), and since 1907 has required them to keep an account of the sales upon the floors and report the number of pounds sold each month to the Commissioner of Agriculture at Raleigh, who is required to keep record thereof and publish same in a bulletin, with penalty for failure to observe the statute both as to the warehouses and the Commissioner of Agriculture (C. S. 4926, 4927, 4928, 4929, 4930); and since then Laws 1919, c. 90, now C. S. 7839, requires that every tobacco warehouse shall take out a license, which "shall be a personal privilege and shall not be transferable," specifying also the amount of tax and the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture and the appointment of traveling auditors, and making violations of the statute a misdemeanor, thus taking over the supervision of the business by the state.

Indeed, as far back as the history of the state extends the business of tobacco warehouses has been, if not a public duty, always "affected with a public use." The laws of North Carolina from 1689 to 1790 have been compiled as State Records, vols. 23, 24, and 25, by the writer of this opinion, and in the index thereto, in the last-named volume, it appears that no less than 75 statutes were enacted prior to 1790 in regard to tobacco warehouses requiring inspection, regulation, and fixing charges in such business. To the fullest extent, therefore, their regulation and control by the public has been recognized and enforced in this state.

In fact, there is no subject in which the protection of the producers against extortion and combinations to reduce prices is more important. It appears from the official reports of the United States and state governments that North Carolina in 1919 was the fourth state in the Union in the value of its agricultural products, coming after Illinois, Iowa, and Texas only. In that year the cotton crop of this state was 857,000 bales, bringing approximately $154,000,000 at the current price of 36 cents. The tobacco crop for the same year was 326,000,000 pounds, bringing, at an average price of 50 cents, $163,000,000, being in excess of the value of the cotton crop of the state. In 1920, according to the government and state reports, the cotton crop of the state was 936,000 bales, which at 15 cents brought only approximately $70,200,000, while the tobacco crop of 421,000,000 pounds (in which North Carolina led all the other states), at an average price of 21½ cents brought in $90,515,000. It thus appears that the tobacco crop of the state exceeds in value even the cotton crop, and whether the charge is true or not that the excessive reduction in the price of tobacco was caused by combinations among the buyers, it is easy to see that, if the conduct of warehouses is left to the warehouses, and either on their own motion or upon pressure from the large tobacco manufacturing companies they can exclude any one from being a buyer either upon the charge of some previous moral delinquency, especially before conviction in court, or by requiring buyers to become members of a board of trade at high cost, or in any other manner, the result will be to place the tobacco farmers of the state absolutely at the mercy of these gigantic corporations, and would reduce the farmers, while nominally owners of their land, to become in reality mere tenants at will of these great monopolies, and therefore peasants. The entire history of the state and the statutes on this subject as well as our present statutes place the regulation of tobacco warehouses not under private control as defendants have assumed in this case, but under the control of the public authority. If they can exclude any one from being a buyer, upon one pretext or reason, they could do so upon any others, but, being public warehouses, they cannot forbid any one to be a buyer or seller any more than a quasi public corporation like a railroad could refuse any one from being a shipper or a traveler over their lines upon an allegation of moral delinquency or failure to belong to some prescribed association. The matter however, does not need discussion, as it has been fully decided.

In Nash v. Page, 80 Ky. 539, 44 Am. Rep. 490, it is held:

"One who assumes to carry on the business of a public warehouseman for the purchase of tobacco and the public sale thereof at auction is bound to serve the public without discrimination, and may not select his bidders nor reject any producers."

In the course of that opinion the court says:

"Since the formation of the state government the sale of this great staple has been fostered and protected by legislation. The rights and duties of the warehousemen, the buyers and sellers, and all the officers connected with the warehouses, have been defined by statute, and no commodity has received the same protection in the way of either general or special legislation. Nine-tenths of the tobacco is sold at auction, with the right unquestioned, until the present controversy, of all parties to enter the warehouses as buyers or as sellers, by their warehousemen as their agents, and competition left unrestricted, save the option on the part of the owner to approve or reject the bid. There is no provision, it is true, in any of the statutes now in force, or that existed prior to the law as we now find it, compelling the producer of tobacco to take it to the warehouses in the city of Louisville, or to expose it for sale at public auction; but such warehouses have been always regulated by law for the benefit of the producer, as well as those who are the proprietors of these warehouses, and the latter have assumed an obligation to the public that exists so long as they continue public warehousemen. They have assumed a quasi public character under the protection of the law, and will not be allowed to exercise all the privileges that have heretofore belonged to warehousemen, and evade all the duties and responsibilities of their position by the passage of a resolution disclaiming that they are operating their houses in the capacity of warehousemen, but as commission merchants."

This opinion from Kentucky, which is second only to this state in the production of tobacco, further says:

"The case of Munn v. State of Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, bears directly upon the question raised in this case. In that case it was claimed that the exercise of the legislative power of the state of Illinois was in violation of the Constitution of the United States in attempting to regulate by statute the maximum charges for the storage of grain in warehouses at Chicago and other places in the state—in which grain is stored in bulk, and the grain of different owners mingled together. The right of private property, and to deal and trade as these warehousemen might see proper with those who applied to them to store their grain, was insisted upon in that case; but it was there held [by Waite, C. J., quoting Sir Matthew Hale in England] that 'property does become clothed with a public interest when used in a manner to make it of public consequence and effect the community at large. When, therefore, one devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest, he, in effect, grants to the public an interest in that use, and must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good to the extent of the interest he has thus created. He may withdraw his grant by discontinuing the use, but so long as he maintains the use he must submit to the control.' There is manifest distinction between the manner in which the business of selling tobacco at these warehouses is conducted and those who are engaged in the ordinary business of commission merchants. These warehousemen now have, and always did have, in this state, public duties to perform, and to attempt to control by legislation the ordinary business of mercantile establishments in the same manner as the duties of these warehousemen are defined and regulated would be in violation of both the federal and state Constitutions. If the 14 warehouses in Chicago can be regulated in their charges because of their relation to the public, the 10 warehouses in the city of Louisville can be regulated in the same manner, and because the statute of this state is more liberal in its provisions toward the owners of these public warehouses than that of the state of Illinois is no argument in favor of the right of the appellants to relieve themselves of the duty they owe to the public. It is a conceded fact that more than five millions in value of tobacco annually find its way from the producer to the warehouses in that city. The great part of this product is grown within the state, and the producer almost of necessity compelled to place his tobacco under the control of and for sale by these several warehousemen at public auction. All this tobacco must necessarily pass through these warehouses, subject to such charges as are reasonable and proper, and to say that the proprietors, with such relations to the public, can forbid buyers to enter their auction room, and to deny to any but members of the Board of Trade or applicants for membership the right to make purchases, is a palpable disregard of the duty they owe to the individual patron as well as to the public, and, in the absence of any statute, is in violation of the rule of the common law. Such a public duty may be imposed on these warehousemen in express terms or by implication, but, whether so imposed or not, it arises from the facts of this case. This doctrine has been discussed and in effect settled long before the rule established in Munn v. State of Illinois, and upon the doctrine of the common law in reference to common carriers, such as steamboats, railroads, express companies, stage lines, warehouses, etc. If a public warehouseman can refuse to sell the tobacco of the producer at auction, or deny the right of any one to bid for it when offered but those whom he selects or permits to bid, why may not the owner of a steamboat or stage line, without excuse, decline to take the passenger, or the owner of the wine warehouse to receive the wine of others on storage? The steamboat is the private property of the owner; but he has engaged in a public employment, and so is the warehouseman, although not of the same character; but the undertaking of each is affected with a public interest, and for that reason the steamboat is compelled to take freight and passengers, and the warehousemen to receive and store and sell at auction the tobacco of the owner, and all are allowed to enter and compete as bidders."

[4] A public warehouse company cannot discriminate by rejecting any one as seller or buyer. This is an obligation imposed on public warehousemen both by common law as well as by statute. 40 Cyc. 404; 27 R. C. L. 951. Up until Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. Ed. 77, the railroads contested the right of the government to fix their rates, prescribe their schedules, or otherwise regulate their operations, but that case settled the contest in favor of the public, and since then regulation has been extended, and it is now undisputed. An examination of that case will show that the doctrine was derived by analogy from the common-law right to regulate ferries, common carriers, hackmen, bakers, millers, wharfingers, innkeepers, and the like; to regulate their charges, prescribe the accommodation to be furnished and the articles to be sold, and above all the prohibition of any discrimination in the facilities to be furnished to all alike and the charges to be made.

[5] The correctness of his honor's continuance of the injunction is in no wise affected, as he properly held, by the consideration whether the plaintiff was justly expelled from the Board of Trade or not, and it is not a matter of consideration, even at the trial, except upon the issue as to damages for the humiliation caused by making the charge public, if it was untrue. The injunction was continued for the valid reason that the defendants could not exclude him from being a buyer because he was not a member of the Board of Trade, which is entirely independent upon his having been properly excluded or not. The injunction was continued upon the ground that, the warehouses being affected with a public use, the owners could not require any discrimination by rejecting those who were not members of a certain organization or requiring that such bidders should have paid a specified sum before they could join that organization, which would be a further hindrance to a numerous body of buyers. It is to the public interest that buying shall be a privilege open to all the public. If the warehouse owners could require that the bidder must belong to a Board of Trade to entitle him to be a buyer, they could require that he should belong to any other organization or be a member of any church that they might designate. If they could require him to pay $500 to become a buyer, they could require him to pay $5,000. In short, if the public warehouses could make any requirements which are a discrimination, they could so narrow and so restrict the number of buyers that the competition would amount to nothing, and the farmers who raise and offer tobacco for sale would be compelled to take whatever was offered. In this lies the vital importance of this principle of the common law in its application to this case and all other cases of public utilities or where private property is "affected by a public use."

Many principles of the common law have been eliminated or modified by the experience of the ages, with the advance of civilization, but those that have stood this test have preserved the standing of the common law as the foundation of much of our liberty. Among these last there is no principle more important to the public welfare than to preserve to every individual, however humble, the right that in dealing with public utilities and businesses "affected with a public use" there can be no discrimination against any individual in regard to uniformity of charges and impartial treatment. This principle is more important now than ever and has been widened, and not restricted, by the courts and by statute. Its assertion by every one is as commendable (and even more necessary to the public welfare) as the resistance of Hampden to the collection of ship money or of the colonists to the stamp tax. In this particular matter we know that the great tobacco companies have been exceedingly profitable and that their methods were declared illegal by the Supreme Court of the United States by an unanimous opinion, U. S. v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U. S. 106, 31 Sup. Ct. 632, 55 L. Ed. 663, quoted in Public Service Co. v. Power Co., 179 N. C. 32, 38, 101 S. E. 593. One of them upon a capital beginning with $350,000 gathered in a very few years an aggregation of $350,000,000, in addition to heavy dividends all along, being $1,000 collected from the public for every $1 the owners of the company had put into the business; and we know even now more than one of them has been recently declaring 200 per cent. dividends and more, while at the same time those who produced the tobacco are in the direst straits, in many instances not being able to defray even the expenses for the cultivation, and the fertilizer, for their product. If the tobacco warehouses can make discrimination of the kind used against this plaintiff, the producers of tobacco are henceforth hopelessly and absolutely in the power of these great corporations who control the warehouses and can prescribe, as in this case, regulations that will rule out "independent" buyers and prevent the organization of small competing companies.

In the early history of this state, as set out in the compilation of our early laws, 23, 24, and 25 State Records, the tobacco warehouses were operated under state ownership. The present regulation is that of supervision of a business "affected with the public use." Should any seller or buyer misconduct himself as by fake sales or fake purchases or otherwise, his conduct is a matter to be settled by prosecution for disorderly conduct or other misdemeanor in the courts. The public warehouseman himself has no such power and cannot punish him by prohibiting any seller or buyer from taking part in the sales conducted in said warehouse. To permit this would be to lay wide open the road to the exercise of an undue restriction upon trade which, always forbidden by the common law, is now indictable under both state and federal laws. Whether in this case there has been a combination attempting to restrict the number of buyers is a matter which can be settled only by proceedings under the state or federal statutes and is not before us.

This matter has been too often discussed and is too fully settled to require an extension of this discussion. In Munn v. Illinois, supra, the question was the application of the principles of the common law to elevators which had a monopoly of the grain business, as the public warehouses have in this state a monopoly of the sales of tobacco, and if the warehouses in Kinston can exclude any one, at their will, from buying or selling, all could do so. It is not necessary that there should be statutes regulating on the part of the public the conduct of these public warehouses further than the common law or the statutes have already done. It is sufficient to say that those operating them cannot impose rules or regulations which will exclude any one from selling or buying thereon equally with every one else and on the same terms. They cannot make different charges to any one nor exclude any one.

This action is brought for damages. The allegations that the plaintiff's expulsion was upon an unjust and unproven charge of misconduct causing humiliation, and that being prevented from buying has caused him pecuniary loss in his business and humiliation, are denied and are issues of fact to be settled by the jury at the trial. The judge, however, properly granted an injunction against restraining the plaintiff from being a buyer on the floor of any warehouse operated by the defendants, and in doing so he has rendered a distinct service not only to the largest agricultural interest in the state, but to the state at large.

The defendants rely upon Godwin v. Carolina Telephone & Telegraph Co., 136 N. C. 258, 48 S. E. 636, 87 L. R. A. 251, 103 Am. St. Rep. 941, 1 Ann. Cas. 203, where the court upheld the refusal of an application for mandamus to place a telephone in a house where unlawful business was carried on if an aid in carrying on the illegal business, but otherwise the corporation could not refuse the applicant. The court in that case was careful to say that, while a common carrier was not required to carry a passenger to aid in an illegal escape, or to do an illegal act, it could not refuse to convey him because he had done an illegal act. In this case the buying by the plaintiff was a perfectly lawful act in which any one was entitled to share, especially one who held, as the plaintiff did, a federal license. The defendants could not reject or refuse any one the right to sell or to buy at a public warehouse sale or require any qualification such as membership in a board of trade or any other that would not be valid if required by a public mill or a common carrier. It is true a railroad company is a quasi public corporation, and a telephone company is a public utility, but a public warehouse is at least "affected by a public use" like public mills, innkeepers, and others. It is not necessary that there shall be statutory regulations, but it is essential that there shall not be regulations by those operating public utilities or business "affected by the public use" which will permit discrimination against any one. These requirements are based upon the principle, "Salus populi suprema est lex;" that is, that the public welfare is the highest law.

The question here presented is one of the utmost importance, not only because it presents a principle that has been recognized as settled law for centuries, but because of its great importance from a politico-economic standpoint, and that proposition is that public utilities, and wherever private property, by the nature of its employment, has become "affected with a public use," the owners thereof cannot discriminate as to charges or treatment of the public who are from the nature of the business invited to make use thereof. There is probably no principle of the law whose maintenance in its integrity is more important to the welfare of the public than this, or whose disregard will bring greater disaster.

Government is instituted for the protection of all men and all legitimate businesses, especially the weak against the strong. One buyer could not successfully contend against a combination of buyers, or of the owners of the warehouses, which is the only place where tobacco can be sold or bought, and to permit discrimination would be to place this great agricultural industry in the absolute power of any combination which by reducing the number of buyers and admitting only those acceptable to great combinations would place the producers of tobacco at their mercy.

For the same purpose of protecting the producer in the sale of the cotton crop, the General Assembly enacted the Cotton Warehouse Act (Laws 1919, c. 168, now C. S. 4907-4925), which was held valid. Bickett v. Tax Commission, 177 N. C. 433, 99 S. E. 415.

Affirmed.

WALKER and ALLEN, JJ., concur in result upon the ground that the case ought to be more fully developed and the issues raised by the pleadings determined before an expression of opinion on the legal questions discussed before us.

HOKE, J. (concurring). I concur in the disposition made of this appeal by which the injunction is continued to the hearing and in the opinion that these warehouses dedicated by the owners or management to the public marketing of tobacco are effected with a public use and interest so as to become the subject of reasonable public regulations. And I am inclined to the opinion that the regulations now established by the Kinston Tobacco Board, as to the selection and qualification of these buyers, may be too restrictive, reserving final decision on that question, however, until the facts are more fully disclosed at the hearing. I am of opinion further that, subject to such reasonable rules and regulations as may be established by the public agencies, and when not interfering with same, the authorities in control and management of these warehouses have the power to establish for themselves such reasonable rules and regulations as may be required to promote business efficiency and insure fair and honest dealing in the transactions occurring there, and the same may extend to the exclusion of an individual buyer or seller who has been properly shown to be guilty of dishonest practices on the warehouse floor, and such as tend to destroy the confidence of the public and patrons in the integrity of their management and of the business methods under their supervision and control. On perusal of the record it is alleged in the answer of defendant's and duly verified that the plaintiff who had been a member of the Board of Trade privileged to sell and buy

In these warehouses after a full and impartial hearing had been found guilty of "nesting tobacco" at one of these warehouse sales, this being a practice by which the tobacco offered for sale is so packed as to deceive bidders and give a false impression of its value, and that he was expelled from his membership and excluded from buying for that reason and pursuant to a rule to that effect established by the governing board. If these allegations should be established on the hearing, whatever may be the rights of the public and patrons generally, I am of the opinion that the present claimant as an individual buyer has been properly excluded, and I am well assured that no court should lend its aid to restore him to a participation in the warehouse privileges. Public policy requiring that these warehouse sales should be kept free from unreasonable restrictions, and the pertinent facts being in dispute, I think plaintiff prima facie has the right to take part and have his bids duly considered, and that his position should be maintained to the hearing. Tise v. Whitaker, 144 N. C. 508, 57 S. E. 210; Cobb v. Clegg, 137 N. C. 153, 49 S. E. 80. But, there being material issues raised on the pleadings which may affect both the question of liability and the amount of damages, I am of the opinion that the order must be without prejudice and subject to the determination of these issues at the final hearing. Although this may be to some extent in the nature of a mandatory injunction, the authorities hold that a preliminary order is at times permissible in such cases, and I think this course should be pursued in the present instance. Keys v. Allgood, 178 N. C. 16, 100 S. E. 113; High on Injunctions (4th Ed.) § 4.

STACY, J. (concurring). I think the plaintiff prima facie is entitled to the privileges of a buyer upon the warehouse floors of the defendants, which have been dedicated to the public marketing of tobacco. I am also of the opinion that the regulation fixing membership in the Kinston Board of Trade as a prerequisite to the privilege of buying at such warehouses is unreasonable and void. However, the duty which the defendants owe to the public of maintaining a free and open market is coequal with their obligation to support and promote the principles of honesty, integrity, and fair dealing in their business. Both affect the public interest. Hence, it appearing that material issues are raised by the pleadings which may bear upon the question of liability as well as the issue of damages, I concur in the result, and agree that the restraining order should be continued without prejudice and subject to the determination of these pertinent issues at the final hearing.

ROBERTS et al. v. UTILITY MFG. CO.
(No. 285.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 6, 1921.)

1. Dismissal and nonsuit \S 56—Pleading \S 218(4)—Action to be dismissed where misjoinder is both as to parties and causes of action.

Where there is a misjoinder both of parties and causes of action, the court in sustaining demurrer cannot order the action to be divided under C. S. § 516, but must sustain the demurrer and dismiss the action.

2. Action \S 50(1) — Parties \S 15 — Complaint held bad for misjoinder of parties and causes of action.

Complaint alleging breach of contract made by defendant with one plaintiff and assigned by such plaintiff to a second plaintiff, and as a second cause of action a breach of a separate and distinct contract made by the defendant with both of the plaintiffs, and as a third cause of action a breach of a contract made by the defendant with the first plaintiff, held bad for misjoinder of parties and causes of action since all three causes of action do not affect both plaintiffs, as required by C. S. § 507.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover County; Craumer, Judge.

Action by Owen H. Roberts and another against the Utility Manufacturing Company. From a judgment overruling a demurrer to the complaint, the ground of demurrer being that there is a misjoinder of parties and causes of action, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Langston, Allen & Taylor, of Goldsboro, for appellant.

Rodgers & Rodgers, of Wilmington, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. The causes of action that may be joined are classified in section 507 of the Consolidated Statutes, which concludes:

"But the causes of action so united must all belong to one of these classes, and, except in actions for the foreclosure of mortgages, must affect all the parties to the action."

[1] It is also well settled that an action cannot be divided under section 516 when there is a misjoinder both of parties and of causes of action, and that in such case the demurrer must be sustained and the action dismissed. Cromartie v. Parker, 121 N. C. 198, 28 S. E. 297; Morton v. Telegraph Co., 130 N. C. 302, 41 S. E. 484; Thigpen v. Cotton Mills, 151 N. C. 97, 65 S. E. 750; Campbell v. Light & Power Co., 166 N. C. 488, 82 S. E. 842.

Applying these principles, it is clear that the demurrer ought to have been sustained.

[2] There are two plaintiffs, Owen H.

Roberts and D. B. Roberts, and there are at least three causes of action set out, all of which do not affect all of the parties to the action as required by the statute.

The plaintiffs allege: First, a breach of a contract made by the defendant with O. H. Roberts and assigned by him to the other plaintiff D. B. Roberts; next, a breach of a separate and distinct contract made by the defendant with both of the plaintiffs; and, in the third place, a breach of a contract made by the defendant with the plaintiff O. H. Roberts.

Reversed.

MUNICK v. CITY OF DURHAM et al.
(No. 332.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 6, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error \S 927(3)—Plaintiff's uncontradicted testimony taken as true on appeal from judgment of nonsuit.

On appeal from judgment of nonsuit granted on plaintiff's uncontradicted testimony, the testimony will be taken as true, with all the inferences from it in the most favorable light to the plaintiff.

2. Assault and battery \S 12—Tender of 50 cents in pennies in payment of bill no justification for assault.

The tender of 50 cents in pennies in payment of a $4.50 water bill did not justify an assault upon the consumer by the superintendent of the water plant, though the pennies were legal tender only to the amount of 25 cents, under U. S. Comp. St. \S 6574.

3. Municipal corporations \S 747(2)—City liable for assault on water consumer by superintendent of city's water plant while acting as city's agent in collecting water bill.

City operating water system was liable for assault by superintendent of the waterworks on consumer's tender of 50 cents in pennies in payment of water bill, since the assault was made by the superintendent while acting in his capacity as agent for the city, and since the city operated such water plant in its business capacity and not in its governmental capacity.

4. Master and servant \S 306—Principal liable for assault by agent.

The principal is liable to one who, coming on principal's premises in connection with business dealings or by invitation, is assaulted by one of its agents.

5. Municipal corporations \S 847 — Board of water commissioners required to protect one on its premises by invitation.

It was the duty of the board of water commissioners of a city, not only to refrain from assaulting or injuring one who has been invited upon its premises, but also to protect him from any violence which it could reasonably have foreseen if offered by others.

Appeal from Superior Court, Durham County; Calrut, Judge.

Action by H. Munick against the City of Durham and the Board of Water Commissioners. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

The waterworks in the city of Durham are owned by the municipality and are operated by it under the supervision of the defendant board of water commissioners. Among their employees was one Harvey Bolton, who had general charge and supervision of said water system, and among whose duties it was, assisted by others under his supervision, to keep the books continuing the accounts against all customers purchasing water, to render statements to said consumers for the water used by them and collect all sums due, and to give receipts upon payment of said bills. This is an action by the plaintiff against the city for damages for assault and battery upon him by said Bolton.

The plaintiff, H. Munick, testified:

"I live on Poplar street and conduct a grocery store. I have been living in Durham 11 years, coming here from New York. I came to New York from Russia, and am a Jew. I am married and have a family of four. I own my home and two more houses and buy water from the city of Durham. On April 17, 1919, I went to the water company's office, taking a bill which they had sent me for $4.50. No one was with me. I had been there a number of times before and paid my bills. Sometimes I would send the money and pay the bills by the children and sometimes I would take it myself. This time I took it myself. When I came to the office I saw only the lady who collected. This was in the spring of the year, about 12 o'clock, but I do not recall the day of the week. I do not know the name of the lady, but I took the money and the bills in my hand and handed them to the lady. I took from my pocket 3 paper dollars, 1 silver dollar, and 50 cents in pennies, and gave it to the lady with the bills. The 50 cents in pennies was in one package and were not loose. They were rolled up like the bank fixes them. I got the pennies in my retail business. The lady receipted my bills and I put them in my pocket and started to leave the office. I did not go outside of the door, and in about five minutes Mr. Bolton, who is manager of the water company, came in the office.

"I was standing beside the window which is the regular place to pay bills when he came in. I had the bills then in my pocket and the book-keeper started counting the pennies. Mr. Bolton came in and asked the lady, 'What are you counting? Nickels or dimes?' She told Mr. Bolton, 'Mr. Munick gave me 50 pennies.' Mr. Bolton then came around the counter inside the office to the desk where she was. I was on the outside by the front door. Mr. Bolton took the pennies and pushed them off the counter onto the floor where I was standing. He was at the back end of the counter and I was at the front, and he pushed all of these pennies on the floor, and came from the inside to where I was and said, 'Munick, pick up those pennies. They belong to you.' I said, 'Mr. Bolton, those pennies belong to you, not to me.' Mr. Bolton said, 'Munick, pick up those pennies; they belong to you.' I told him, 'The bill is paid and those pennies belong to you.' That is all I said to him. I said, 'Those pennies are just as good as the dollars.' Mr. Bolton then locked the front door and took me by the jacket and called me 'God damned Jew,' and said, 'Give me back my bills.' I did not say anything and he hit me in the face. I did not resist, and the door was locked and I could not get out. The pennies were still on the floor. After he slapped me another man came to pay his bill, and Mr. Bolton opened the door and let him in and the man then went out. Mr. Bolton was standing close to me and did not give me a chance to get out. Then I said, 'Please turn me loose, I have to go home.' I do not know where the other man was then.

"When this other man went out Mr. Bolton locked the door again, took me by my jacket, and pushed me in the back room where the tools belonging to the city water company were. I said, 'Please turn me loose;' begging him to turn me loose. I do not remember how many times. He did not close the door when he pushed me in the back room. The front door was closed but not the door in the back room. When he got me in the back room he took his two hands about my neck and choked me. He was standing in front of me and I said, 'Please turn me loose. I've got to go home.' He turned me loose for about five minutes, and then took hold of me again and choked me fast, until it interfered with my breathing. It hurt me and I told him to please turn me loose. When he turned me loose the second time he called to some one to bring a towel. A gentleman brought the towel and he took that towel and put it over my face. This interfered with my breathing, as I could not breathe with it over my face. A little later I told him, 'Maybe I got a dollar. I will take back the pennies, Mr. Bolton, turn me loose.' I started looking in my pockets and I found one paper dollar, and said, 'I am glad I got one dollar to settle with you.' Mr. Bolton took that dollar and gave me back the 50 pennies. I took them and Mr. Bolton opened the front door and said, 'Get out of here, and don't come no more to pay your water bill.' That is all he said to me, and I left his office.

"I had been feeling mighty bad. I do not know how long I was in there, but I begged Mr. Bolton to turn me loose, as I was sick and could not stand it. I had some kind of sickness in my head. I was back there in the office being subjected to this treatment about one half hour from the time I went in. I went to Mr. Lunsford's office and asked him to phone for me a doctor. I do not know what Mr. Lunsford said. He was busy in his office. I left his office and went home. I used to trade with Mr. Lunsford. I did not see a doctor. The treatment I had received made me sick. When he choked me it hurt me for from eight to ten days. His finger prints where he choked me could be seen on my neck by everybody for eight or ten days. Everybody asked me what was the matter. It made me feel very bad when he cursed me. I had Mr. Bolton indicted, and he was in court, and the court found him guilty and fined him. He did not resist. I have Mr. Lunsford, Mr. Speed, and Mr. Draughan for character witnesses."

On cross-examination, he said:

"I used to come to this water company's office before this, but had never been treated by any one that way before, and had never heard of any one being treated that way before or after I went there. This is the first time. I put my money on the counter and the young lady took the money and signed my receipt and gave me a receipt and I put it in my pocket. I paid my bill in full and all my matters were closed with the city. Mr. Bolton got mad because I paid the pennies. I was on the inside. I got to the door on the inside, and Mr. Bolton locked the door so I could not get out. I had never heard of folks being locked in; that was an unusual sort of thing. I do not know what he did with the key. I could not get out, and did not try. He grabbed hold of me and I said, 'Please turn me loose.' He got madder and madder all the time. I was yelling, and he got the towel to stop me from yelling. The young lady was inside the office while this yelling was going on. She was not doing anything. I do not know who the man was that brought the towel, but he worked in the office. He did not do anything but give the towel to Mr. Bolton. I do not know his name. He was white and not a very heavy man. I do not know him. I did not try the door. Mr. Bolton opened the door for another man who paid his water bill, and then Mr. Bolton locked the door again. The man who brought the towel stayed there in the back. He just gave the towel to Mr. Bolton and nothing else. The young lady who I gave the money to did not do anything. She stayed there in the office looking through the window. She was there while Mr. Bolton was cursing me, where she could hear it. I indicted Mr. Bolton in the recorder's court. He pleaded guilty, and I am suing the city, whose agent he was."

J. O. Lunsford testified that he had known the plaintiff for 12 or 15 years; had sold him flour for several years, and knew his general character and it was good; that on the day of this occurrence the plaintiff told him about having this trouble in the water company's office.

A. J. Draughan also testified that he had known the plaintiff 10 or 12 years; that he had sold him goods, and knows his general character and that it was good.

At the close of the above testimony the defendant offered no evidence, but moved for judgment of nonsuit, which was granted, and the plaintiff appealed.

R. O. Everett and William G. Bramham, both of Durham, for appellant.

S. C. Chambers, of Durham, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. [1] The testimony for the plaintiff presents one of the most singular occurrences that has come to this court. The defendant offered no evidence, and the nonsuit was granted on the uncontradicted testimony for the plaintiff as above set out. It is therefore taken as true, with all the inferences from it in the most favorable light to the plaintiff. But, indeed, there seems to be but one that could be drawn from it. The plaintiff, an old and feeble man, went to the water company on receiving a notice sent by it to pay his bill. He handed the clerk the money and she gave him a receipt. A part of the payment was 50 "pennies," that is, one-cent pieces, wrapped up together. While he was standing there and she was counting the pennies the manager of the water company came in, knocked the pennies off the counter on the floor, cursed the plaintiff, calling him a "G—d d—n Jew," told him to pick up the pennies, struck him, pulled him into another room, struck him repeatedly, interrupted this to admit another patron, and after the latter went out the superintendent resumed his beating of the plaintiff, who offered no resistance and begged to be turned loose to go home, shook him, choked him, put a towel over his face suffocating him, and finally, when the plaintiff tendered a dollar bill, he told him to take his pennies and to leave and not come back.

[2] The official (Bolton) was indicted in the criminal court and convicted and merely fined. Taking this occurrence to be as stated by the plaintiff, who is not contradicted and who proved a good character, a more brutal and unprovoked assault could not be presented. It was absolutely without justification. The pennies, under the United States statute, were a legal tender to the amount of 25 cents (U. S. Compiled Statutes 1918, § 6574), and if the clerk had objected the water company could not have been compelled to receive beyond that sum in pennies but it was no offense to tender a larger sum in one-cent pieces, and the lady clerk accepted them; and even if the tender of 50 of them was for any reason objectionable (which does not appear), it certainly did not justify the treatment the plaintiff received.

There is no explanation of the conduct of the company's superintendent, and the only provocation given which we can infer from the language used by Bolton is the fact that the plaintiff was a Jew. He made no other charge. The treatment which the plaintiff received is paralleled by that which is portrayed by Scott in Ivanhoe in the treatment of Isaac of York seven centuries ago, and by Shakespeare as meted out to Jews in the Merchant of Venice, also centuries ago. The world has long outlived this treatment of an historic race, except, perhaps, in "darkest Russia" when under the Czars. When Disraeli, later Prime Minister of the British Empire, was reproached in Parliament for being a Jew, he made the memorable reply, "When the ancestors of the right-honorable gentleman were painted savages roaming naked in the forests of Germany, my ancestors were princes in Israel and high priests in the temple of Solomon."

Every voter, every witness, and every official takes an oath upon a sacred book, every sentence and word in which was written by a Jew. When the Saylor was incarnated after the flesh he was of the tribe of Judah, and His mother, whom a great church holds immaculate, if not divine, has her name borne by millions throughout the civilized world. Whatever the shortcomings of any individual, it is strange that in this day of enlightenment such prejudices as were shown in this case should survive against the race to which the plaintiff belongs. This plaintiff proved, without contradiction, a good character, and certainly there is no evidence which justified in any degree the brutal assault made upon him, for which no excuse is offered. For some unexplained reason, the brutal assailant, though convicted, was punished only by a fine. It is to be presumed, however, that the city discharged him from its service.

[3] The ground upon which the nonsuit was asked and allowed, as presented in this court, is that the defendants and the city of Durham are not responsible for the act of its agent, Harvey Bolton, superintendent of the waterworks, or that at least in making the assault he was not within the scope of his authority, in that he had no instructions from the defendants to commit such violence. At the time that the assault was made by the said Harvey Bolton he was acting in his capacity as agent. Had he been acting for a water company under private ownership, it could not be contended that the corporation would not be responsible. He was there in the prosecution and furtherance of the duties assigned to him by the defendant municipality. Roberts v. Railroad, 143 N. C. 179, 55 S. E. 509, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 798, 10 Ann. Cas. 375. Indeed, the facts are very similar to those in Bucken v. Railroad, 157 N. C. 443, 73 S. E. 137. "Acting within the scope of employment means while on duty." Cook v. Railroad, 128 N. C. 336, 38 S. E. 926.

In Ange v. Woodman, 173 N. C. 33, 91 S. E. 586, it is said:

"It is now fully established that corporations may be held liable for negligent and malicious torts, and that responsibility will be imputed whenever such wrongs are committed by their employees and agents in the course of their employment and within its scope * * * in many of the cases, and in reliable text-books * * * 'course of employment' is stated and considered as sufficiently inclusive; but, whether the one or the other descriptive term is used, they have the same significance in importing liability on the part of the principal when the agent is engaged in the work that its principal has employed or directed him to do and * * * in the effort to accomplish it. When such conduct comes within the description that constitutes an actionable wrong, the corporation principal, as in other cases of principal and agent, is liable not only for 'the act itself, but for the ways and means employed in the performance thereof.'"

In 1 Thompson, Negligence, § 554, it is pointed out that, unless the above principle is maintained:

"It will always be more safe and profitable for a man to conduct his business vicariously than in his own person. He would escape liability for the consequences of many acts connected with his business, springing from the imperfections of human nature, because done by another, for which he would be responsible if done by himself. Meanwhile, the public, obliged to deal or come in contact with his agent, for injuries done by them must be left wholly without redress. He might delegate to persons peculiarly irresponsible the care of large factories, of extensive mines, of ships at sea, or of railroad trains on land, and these persons, by the use of the extensive power thus committed to them, might inflict wanton and malicious injuries on third persons, without other restraint than that which springs from the imperfect execution of the criminal laws. A doctrine so fruitful of mischief could not long stand unshaken in an enlightened jurisprudence."

This court has often held the master liable, even if the agent was willful, provided it was committed in the course of his employment. Jackson v. Tel. Co., 139 N. C. 347, 51 S. E. 1015, 70 L. R. A. 738.

[4] Indeed, the doctrine goes further, and the principal is liable if one coming on the premises in connection with business dealings, or by invitation, is assaulted by one of its agents. This is settled by the leading case of Daniel v. Railroad, 117 N. C. 592, 23 S. E. 327, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 485, and the numerous citations to the case in the Annotated Edition. Indeed, the same ruling has been uniformly made and was reaffirmed at this term in Clark v. Bland, 106 S. E. 491.

Not only is the corporation liable for injuries thus committed by its agents, but "it is the duty of a carrier to protect its passengers from injury, insult, violence, and ill treatment from its servants, other passengers, or third persons." Seawell v. Railroad, 132 N. C. 859, 44 S. E. 611, citing numerous cases. Indeed, as far back as 1883, Ruffin, J., in Britton v. Railroad, 88 N. C. 554, 43 Am. Rep. 749, in terms ever since deemed settled law, said:

"The carrier owes to the passenger the duty of protecting him from violence and assaults of his fellow passengers or intruders, and will be held responsible for his own or his servant's negligence in this particular when, by the exercise of proper care, the acts of violence might have been foreseen and prevented."

This is cited with approval in Seawell v. Railroad, supra. The same rule applies to any other corporation. In that case the passenger was assaulted by a mob, and the defendant was held liable because four employees were present and it was shown that none of them "made the slightest attempt to protect the plaintiff," and, indeed, there was "evidence that two of them actively participated in, or at least encouraged, the assault." This case was reheard and reaffirmed (183 N. C. 517, 45 S. E. 851), the court saying:

"A careful examination of all the authorities shows no case, and the appellants cite none, in which, under similar circumstances, the railroad company has not been held liable, unless it exerted what power it could to protect the passenger from the mob. * * * The cases are uniform, fastening liability upon a common carrier for failure to extend such protection as it can to a passenger against a mob," citing numerous cases.

[5] That the corporation is liable for the mistreatment of one invited upon its premises as this plaintiff was, or even if it fails to protect him as far as it can from violence by others while upon its premises, is beyond controversy. Indeed, the principle is so well settled that it needs no citations of authority.

We apprehend, however, that his honor did not nonsuit the plaintiff upon any views to the contrary, but doubtless upon the ground that the city was not liable. That contention by the defendant is equally untenable. In McIlhenney v. Wilmington, 127 N. C. 149, 37 S. E. 188, 50 L. R. A. 470, it is said:

"The law is too well settled to admit of debate. It may, on a review of the authorities, which are uniform, be thus stated: When cities are acting in their corporate character, or in the exercise of powers for their own advantage, they are liable for damages caused by the negligence or torts of their officers or agents; but where they are exercising the judicial, discretionary, or legislative authority conferred by their charters, or are discharging their duty solely for the public benefit, they are not liable for the torts or negligence of their officers, unless there is some statute which subjects them to liability therefor," citing numerous cases.

The distinction is very broad and clear and is settled by all the authorities substantially as follows: Wherever a city is exercising a governmental function or police power, it is not responsible for the torts or negligence of its officers, in the absence of a statute imposing such liability; but when it is acting in its business capacity, as in operating a water or lighting plant, or other business function, it is liable for the conduct of its agents and servants exactly to the same extent that any other business corporation would be liable under the same circumstances. The distinction thus laid down in McIlhenney v. Wilmington has been often cited with approval.

To sum up: The assault upon the plaintiff was of the most brutal and unprovoked nature. Indeed, there is no evidence set up in this case that tends to palliate or mitigate the assault, which, it appears, was entirely unprovoked. There is no question that Bolton was the officer of the corporation and was acting in the discharge of his duty, and that the plaintiff was on the premises at the invitation of the corporation, and, further, it was the duty of the corporation, not only to refrain from assaulting or injuring the plaintiff while there, but to protect him from any violence which it could reasonably have foreseen if offered by others; and, still further, the city operating the water plant in its business capacity and not under its governmental or police power, on these facts the same liability was imposed upon the city as if it were a business plant.

The judgment entering a nonsuit must be reversed.

WARE v. SOUTHERN POWER CO.
(No. 357.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 13, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error \S 1002—Verdict on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

A verdict on disputed fact issues will not be disturbed.

2. Appeal and error \S 1033(8)—Party not entitled to complain of error in his favor.

Where, in a suit to cancel a right of way deed and an agreement for compensation on the ground of fraud, all issues were decided in defendant's favor, but he tendered a sum for which plaintiff took judgment, though he was not entitled to such a judgment under the pleadings, plaintiff could not complain, though costs were taxed against him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Rockingham County; Finley, Judge.

Action by W. P. Ware against the Southern Power Company. From a judgment for plaintiff for an amount tendered by the defendant, plaintiff appeals. No error.

Civil action brought to set aside a deed for a right of way over plaintiff's lands and an agreement fixing the compensation or amount of damages therefor, plaintiff alleging that his signatures to said instruments were procured by the false and fraudulent representations of defendant's agent. Upon issues joined, the jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Was the execution of the damage agreement referred to in the pleadings procured by fraud and misrepresentation as alleged in the complaint? Answer: No.

"(2) Was the execution of the right of way deed referred to in the pleadings procured by fraud and misrepresentation as alleged in the complaint? Answer: No.

"(3) What damages, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover of the defendant? Answer: —."

Defendant admitted that under the contracts it was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $20 and tendered judgment for this amount. His honor gave judgment in favor of plaintiff for $20, but taxed him with the costs. Plaintiff appealed.

J. M. Sharp, J. R. Joyce, and E. B. Ware, all of Reidsville, for appellant.

Manly, Hendren & Womble, of Winston-Salem, and W. S. O'B. Robinson, Jr., of Charlotte, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. [1] The controversy between the parties in this action narrowed itself on the trial to questions of fact, which the jury have answered in favor of the defendant. We have carefully examined the record, and find no sufficient reason for disturbing the verdict.

[2] Technically, under the pleadings, plaintiff may not have been entitled to judgment for the $20; but this is not the basis of his appeal. Apparently he has been rewarded according to his own agreement. His honor below evidently took this view of the matter, and we think the plaintiff should be content with the result.

No error.

STATE v. ROUNTREE. (No. 273.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 6, 1921.)

1. Criminal law \S 752½—On motion to dismiss testimony to be considered in light most favorable to state.

On motion to dismiss prosecution, testimony is to be considered in its most favorable light to the state.

2. Homicide \S 268 — Guilt of manslaughter held for jury.

In a prosecution for manslaughter, held, that the court properly submitted the case to the jury.

3. Criminal law \S 752½—Motion to dismiss directed to sufficiency of evidence, and not credibility of witness.

A motion to dismiss action or for judgment as of nonsuit under the Mason Act is directed to the sufficiency of the evidence to state or warrant a verdict, and not to its weight or to the credibility of the witnesses.

4. Homicide \S 74, 282—Recklessness constituting killing manslaughter and evidence sufficient to carry case to jury stated.

The degree of negligence necessary to be shown on an indictment for manslaughter, where an unintentional killing is established, is such recklessness or carelessness as is incompatible with a proper regard for human life, and the negligence must be something more than is required on the trial of an issue in a civil action, but it is sufficient to carry the case to the jury in a criminal prosecution where it reasonably appears that death or great bodily harm was likely to occur.

5. Homicide \S 62—One engaged in unlawful act guilty of manslaughter.

Where one is engaged in an unlawful and dangerous act which is itself in violation of a statute intended and designed to prevent injury to the person, and death results, the actor would be guilty of manslaughter at least.

6. Highways \S 177 — Municipal corporations \S 707—Statute held not to fix lawful rate of speed for automobile.

C. S. \S 2618, in fixing the maximum rate of speed of motor vehicles within a city or on the public highway, does not purport to establish a rate of speed which will be lawful under all circumstances, and such speed must not be greater than is "reasonable and proper," considering the time and place, and "having regard to the width, traffic, and use of the highway," nor should it be such "as to endanger property or the life or limb of any person," as proper speed under given conditions may be excessive speed under others, and proper speed in the daytime might be grossly excessive at night.

7. Homicide \S 62—Automobilist violating statute held guilty of manslaughter.

An automobilist operating his machine in disregard of C. S. \S 2616, 2618, is engaged in an unlawful act, and is guilty of manslaughter where death results to a pedestrian.

Appeal from Superior Court, Cumberland County; Horton, Judge.

David Rountree was convicted of involuntary manslaughter, and appeals. No error.

Criminal prosecution, tried upon an indictment charging the defendant with manslaughter.

There was evidence on behalf of the state tending to show that on Sunday, April 25, 1920, about 6 p. m., James A. King was struck by an automobile and injured to such an extent that he died within three or four hours thereafter. At the time of the injury the deceased was on the north side of Hillsboro street extended, near a sharp turn or curve in the road, about one mile north of the corporate limits of the city of Fayetteville. It is mentioned in the record as the Hillsboro street road; and along this thoroughfare the defendant was driving his Ford car when he struck the deceased. The only eyewitnesses to the occurrence were the defendant, his wife, and two colored women who were riding in the machine when the injury occurred. None of these parties, however, gave any evidence in the case.

H. G. Bullock testified that he saw the deceased a few minutes after the injury; that Mr. King was lying on the north side of the street, just beyond the curbing in the road; that he was flat on his back and appeared to be unconscious, and that his left leg was broken; that David Rountree, his wife, and some colored women were there when he arrived; that the defendant was holding Mr. King's head up, and asked one of the colored women for something to put under his head, and she went into a house and got a pillow; that the defendant said he was driving the car that hit the deceased. Continuing, the witness stated:

"The car was 6, 8, or 10 feet ahead of where the injured man was lying. The two left-hand wheels were in the road and the two right-hand wheels were just across the waterway or berm ditch outside of the road. The used part of the road was a little to the south side near the inside bend. Mr. King's body was on the opposite side. The road at that point is straight, but soon turns at almost a right angle and was built for a width of 31 feet. It was a new clay road and had not been used a great while. Where the car was, it was moderately hard. I did not notice the track of the car particularly. It was headed westward. The view was unobstructed. I asked some one to phone for a doctor, but as Mr. Patterson drove up I sent Mr. King to the hospital in his automobile. I do not remember that the defendant said anything about how the deceased was traveling when the car struck him. The defendant was crying before we left."

Lacy Patterson testified:

"When we got there Mr. King was lying back of a Ford car about 4 or 5 feet, with his head on a pillow. His feet were down in a gutter, or waterway, and his head was pointed southward. I observed the track of the car. It left the center of the road that would be traveled by a car or buggy 35 or 40 yards off and came straight until it stopped. It showed there were several kinds of tires on the car, and I could trace it by that. When I saw the car the left-hand side was 12 or 15 feet from the beaten track or ruts of the road ordinarily taken by a car. Mr. King's body was right over in the gutter and his feet were down in it. Where his feet were I would say is about 15 or 18 feet from the beaten track. The width of the road at that point was about 20 feet. Over there on the right side of the road where the wheels were standing there was an onion patch; it was cultivated. After carrying Uncle Jim to the hospital I came back and put down some pegs, from which the measurements were taken when they made a map of it. The deceased made no statement as to how the occurrence happened. About two inches of the bone could be seen protruding through his pants where his leg was broken."

Leslie Smith testified that he was a civil engineer, and that he made a survey and map of the place where the deceased was injured and measured the distances on the road as pointed out by Lacy Patterson. The defect. The direction of this road from the Linden road is almost due west, with an open view all the way.

The defendant offered no evidence, but moved to dismiss the action, or for judgment as of nonsuit under the Mason Act (chapter 73, Public Laws 1913). Motion overruled, and defendant excepted.

The jury returned a verdict adverse to the defendant, finding him guilty of involuntary manslaughter. From the judgment pronounced thereon, the defendant appealed.

H. L. Brothers and Bullard & Stringfield, all of Fayetteville, for appellant.

J. S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

STACY, J. [1-3] We have not stated all the evidence, because the foregoing would seem to be sufficient to dispose of the defendant's appeal. Considering the testimony in its most favorable light to the state, the accepted position on a motion of this kind, we think his honor properly submitted the case to the jury. State v. Oakley, 176 N. C. 755, 97 S. E. 616; State v. Carlson, 171 N. C. 818, 89 S. E. 30. The court's inquiry upon such a motion is directed to the sufficiency of the evidence to support or warrant a verdict (State v. Hart, 116 N. C. 976, 20 S. E. 1014), and not to its weight or to the credibility of the witnesses (State v. Utley, 126 N. C. 997, 35 S. E. 428).

[4] The degree of negligence necessary to be shown on an indictment for manslaughter, where an unintentional killing is established, is such recklessness or carelessness as is incompatible with a proper regard for human life. State v. Gash, 177 N. C. 595, 99 S. E. 337; State v. McIver, 175 N. C. 761, 94 S. E. 682; State v. Tankersley, 172 N. C. 955, 90 S. E. 781, L. R. A. 1917C, 533. The negligence must be something more than is required on the trial of an issue in a civil action, but it is sufficient to carry the case to the jury in a criminal prosecution where it reasonably appears that death or great bodily harm was likely to occur. State v. Gray, 180 N. C. 697, 104 S. E. 647. A want of due care or a failure to observe the rule of the prudent man, which proximately produces an injury, will render one liable for damages in a civil action, while culpable negligence, under the criminal law, is such recklessness or carelessness, resulting in injury or death, as imports a thoughtless disregard of consequences, or a heedless indifference to the safety and rights of others. State v. Goetz, 83 Conn. 437, 76 Atl. 1000, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 458.

[5] Again, it is generally held that, where one is engaged in an unlawful and dangerous act, which is itself in violation of a statute, intended and designed to prevent injury to the person, and death ensues, the actor would be guilty of manslaughter at least. State v. McIver, supra. C. S. 2618, provides:

defendant's car left the center of the road at a point 274 feet west of the Linden road. From this point to where Mr. King's body was found it is 78 feet, and 93.5 feet to where the car stopped, which was 15½ feet from the point where the body was found. The width of the road where the car left the center of the track was 28 feet. The road was hard clay surface, but 10 feet from the center of the road the soil is sand. The tracks were visible four days afterwards and it had rained in the meantime. From the south side of the road to where Mr. Patterson said the body was found was about 31

"No person shall operate a motor vehicle upon the public highways of this state recklessly, or at a rate of speed greater than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the width, traffic, and use of the highway, or so as to endanger the property or the life or limb of any person."

Then follows an enumeration of certain rates of speed at given places which shall be deemed as violations of the section.

[6] But, in fixing the maximum rate within a city or upon the public highways, the statute does not purport to establish a rate of speed which will be lawful under all circumstances. It must not be greater than is "reasonable and proper," considering the time and place, and "having regard to the width, traffic, and use of the highways," nor should it be such "as to endanger property or the life or limb of any person." Proper speed, under given conditions, may be excessive speed under others; and proper speed in the daytime might be grossly excessive at night. State v. O'Brien, 32 N. J. Law, 169; Commonwealth v. Pierce, 138 Mass. 165, 52 Am. Rep. 264.

Section 2616 of the Consolidated Statutes also provides, in part, as follows:

"Upon approaching a pedestrian who is upon the traveled part of any highway, and not upon a sidewalk, * * * every person operating a motor vehicle shall slow down and give a timely signal with his bell, horn, or other device for signaling. Upon approaching an intersecting highway, a bridge, dam, sharp curve, or deep descent, * * * a person operating a motor vehicle shall have it under control and operate it at such speed, not to exceed ten miles an hour, having regard to the traffic then on such highway and the safety of the public."

[7] If the defendant was operating his machine in disregard of these regulations, and thus occasioned the death of deceased, he was engaged in an unlawful act. "Involuntary manslaughter," says Wharton, Am. Crim. Law (11th Ed.) § 426, p. 622, "is where death results unintentionally, so far as the defendant is concerned, from an unlawful act on his part not amounting to a felony." It does not appear from the evidence why the defendant left the central part of the road and ran out of the beaten path, or traveled portion of the highway, nor does it appear why he did not turn aside so as to avoid the collision. Under these circumstances, the jury might well have found that the injury occurred in consequence of the recklessness of the driver, amounting to criminal negligence. State v. Blewen, 169 Iowa, 256, 151 N. W. 102. See, also, State v. Stitt, 146 N. C. 643, 61 S. E. 566, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 308.

The deceased was walking on the outer edge of the road, far from the traveled part of the highway, where he had a right to be. There were no other machines near.

The view was unobstructed, and it is difficult to understand how the defendant could have struck the deceased with his car, under all the circumstances, without being guilty of culpable negligence. At any rate, the evidence was sufficient to be submitted to the jury, and they have so found.

No error.

(181 N. C. 205)

ACME MFG. CO. v. McPHAIL. (No. 298.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 13, 1921.)

1. Evidence ~~441~~(1) — Preliminary negotiations merged in written contract.

Negotiations and conversation preparatory to the execution of a written contract are merged in the writing, and evidence will not be received of a contemporaneous oral agreement which contradicts the terms of the writing.

2. Evidence ~~442~~(1) — Contract may be partly written and partly oral.

Except when forbidden by the statute of frauds, a contract may be partly in writing and partly oral, and in such cases the oral agreement may be shown, but in case of conflict the written agreement governs.

3. Evidence ~~445~~(2) — Parol evidence rule does not prevent modification of written contract by subsequent parol agreement.

The parol evidence rule does not prevent the modification of a written contract by subsequent parol agreement; consequently evidence of a parol agreement by a fertilizer manufacturer to pay freight, made after execution of the written contract, but before the defendant ordered fertilizer under the contract, is competent, though the written contract provided that the purchaser should pay part of the freight.

4. Evidence ~~444~~(6) — Parol evidence that seller was to credit notes with amount of freight permissible.

Where the purchaser of fertilizer claimed that the written contract which provided that he should pay part of the freight was modified, but it appeared that the purchaser executed notes including such portion of the freight which was prepaid by the seller, evidence that the notes were to be returned unless credited with the amount of freight is competent despite the parol evidence rule.

5. Principal and agent ~~166~~(1) — To bind a principal by ratification or assent it must appear that principal had knowledge.

To bind the principal by ratification, assent, or acquiescence in prior acts of his agent in excess of authority actually given, a knowledge of the material facts must be brought home to the principal, and he must have acted in the light of such knowledge, and the same rule applies where the contract of the agent has been performed.

6. Principal and agent \S 169(1)—Facts are liberally construed in favor of ratification where agency is shown to exist.

Where an agency is shown to exist, the facts will be liberally construed in favor of ratification by the principal of the acts of his agent, and ratification may be implied when the conduct of the principal constitutes an assent.

7. Principal and agent \S 174—Whether principal ratified agent's agreement that he should pay all the freight for the jury.

Where a written contract required the buyer of fertilizer to pay part of the freight, the question whether a subsequent parol agreement by the agent of the seller that the seller should pay all the freight was ratified held, under the evidence, for the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover County; Gulon, Judge.

Action by the Acme Manufacturing Company against Jonah McPhail. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and remanded for new trial.

See, also, 179 N. C. 383, 102 S. E. 611.

This is an action to recover $145.47 for the wrongful conversion of certain notes and accounts, and growing out of a contract for the sale of fertilizers entered into between the plaintiff, a manufacturer of fertilizers, and the defendant, on February 2, 1914.

By the terms of the contract the defendant did not agree to buy, but the plaintiff agreed to ship to the defendant, certain fertilizers in such quantities as might be thereafter agreed upon at prices and on terms named in the contract, "shipments to be made in not less than carload lots, and we [fertilizer company] to be at no expense after the delivery of the goods f. o. b. Dunn, N. C."

The shipments to the defendant were to be carried by rail to Dunn, N. C., and then over a logging road to the defendant, and the real dispute in this action is whether the plaintiff or the defendant should pay the freight on the logging road.

The defendant offered to show that at the time of making the contract and before it was actually signed the plaintiff agreed that it would pay the freight on the logging road if other reputable fertilizer companies did so, and that other companies did pay this freight. This evidence was excluded upon the ground that it contradicted the written contract; it being stipulated therein that the plaintiff was to be at no expense after delivery at Dunn. The defendant excepted.

The defendant offered evidence tending to show that before he ordered any fertilizers a salesman of the plaintiff agreed that the plaintiff would pay the freight on the logging road, and the jury has found that this agreement was made by the salesman. The plaintiff denied that the salesman had any authority to make this contract or that it had ratified it. His honor charged that there was no evidence of knowledge of the contract on the part of the plaintiff, and that there was no evidence that the plaintiff had ratified the contract, and the defendant excepted. All the fertilizers bought by the defendant were shipped after the agreement with the agent of the plaintiff, and the defendant prepaid the freight on the logging road.

At the close of the season for the sale of fertilizers the account of the defendant with the plaintiff was closed by the execution of four notes aggregating $2,574.48, all of which have been paid except $145.47, the amount in controversy in this action, which substantially includes the freight on the logging road.

The defendant offered to prove that at the time of the execution of these notes he signed the notes and delivered them to the agent of the defendant upon the understanding that the notes would be returned to him, and that the plaintiff might sue on the whole account unless the plaintiff allowed him credit for the freight on the logging road. This evidence was excluded, and the defendant excepted.

The jury under the instruction of his honor returned the following verdict:

"(1) After the execution of the contract for the shipment of fertilizer to defendant, did Woodward, agent for the plaintiff, agree that the company would pay the freight on the fertilizer from Dunn over the log road? A. Yes.

"(2) Did plaintiff have knowledge of such agreement and ratify the same? A. No.

"(3) What amount, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover of the defendant? A. $145.47."

Judgment was entered upon the verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant excepted and appealed.

Wright & Stevens, of Wilmington, for appellant.

Rountree & Davis, of Wilmington, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. [1, 2] Negotiations and conversations preparatory to the execution of a written contract are merged in the writing, and evidence will not be received of a contemporaneous agreement which contradicts its terms. To do so would be "contrary to the well-settled rule, as stated by the Chief Justice in Walker v. Venters, 148 N. C. 388, where he said: 'It is true that a contract may be partly in writing and partly oral (except when forbidden by the statute of frauds), and that in such cases the oral part of the agreement may be shown. But this is subject to the well-settled rule that a contemporaneous agreement shall not contradict that which is written. The written word abides and is not to be set aside upon the slippery memory of man'—citing Basnight v. Jobbing Co., 148 N. C. 350." Cherokee County v. Meroney, 173 N. C. 655, 92 S. E. 617.

It follows, therefore, that his honor cor-ctly excluded the evidence offered by the defendant tending to prove an agreement on the part of the plaintiff to pay the freight on the logging road, made at the time, because in direct contradiction of the contract, which imposed this duty on the defendant.

[3] The principle excluding parol evidence has no application to subsequent agreements which change or modify the original contract, and consequently it was competent to offer evidence that, after the making of the contract, the plaintiff agreed to pay the freight. McKinney v. Matthews, 166 N. C. 580, 82 S. E. 1036.

[4] Nor does the rule require the exclusion of the evidence of the defendant that he delivered the notes to the agent of the plaintiff upon the agreement that the notes were to be returned, if the plaintiff refused to credit them with the amount of the freight on the logging road, such evidence being received, not for the purpose of changing or modifying the contract represented by the notes, but to show that the contract was never in existence, because the condition upon which the delivery was made had not been performed, and the evidence was very material, as the freight was included in the notes, and without explanation the defendant was in the position of trying to avoid payment of the freight when he had deliberately included the amount in his notes. The authorities in support of this principle are numerous. See Pratt v. Chaffin, 136 N. C. 350, 48 S. E. 768; Bowser v. Tarry, 156 N. C. 38, 72 S. E. 74; Garrison v. Machine Co., 159 N. C. 285, 74 S. E. 821, and cases cited.

We are also of opinion that it was error to instruct the jury, in the present state of the record, that there was no evidence of ratification by the plaintiff of the agreement by its agent to pay the freight on the logging road.

[5-7] It is true that "in order to bind a principal by ratification, assent, or acquiescence in prior acts of his agent in excess of authority actually given, a knowledge of the material facts must be brought home to him. He must have been in possession of all of the facts and must have acted in the light of such knowledge." 21 R. C. L. 928. And the same rule, requiring knowledge, ordinarily prevails when the contract of the agent has been performed, unless the performance shows knowledge, but, "where an agency has been shown to exist, the facts will be liberally construed in favor of the ratification by the principal of the acts of the agent, and very slight circumstances and small matters will sometimes suffice to raise the presumption of ratification, particularly where the act is for the benefit of the principal" (2 C. J. 492), and ratification may be "implied when the conduct of the principal constitutes an assent to the acts in question" (21 R. C. L. 927).

Let us then see, not whether the contract of the agent has been ratified, but is there evidence of ratification fit to be considered by a jury.

The contract was executed February 2, 1914. The defendant did not order out any fertilizers until about the middle of March, and not until the agent of the plaintiff had agreed that the plaintiff would pay the freight on the logging road. The defendant then sent his orders to the plaintiff for fertilizer, which showed that they were to be shipped over the logging road.

The plaintiff accepted the orders and prepaid all of the freight, which was contrary to the provisions of the contract, and in accordance with the agreement made by the agent. All of the fertilizers were shipped under this arrangement and the freight paid by the plaintiff, and the plaintiff made no demand on the defendant to repay the logging road freight until some time in July or later.

It does not appear that the plaintiff was compelled to pay the freight in order that shipments might be made, nor is there any evidence of any custom for the manufacturers of fertilizers to prepay freight when the contract requires the purchaser to do so, and leave the question of the payment of freight for final adjustment between the parties, and, on the contrary, the defendant offered evidence tending to prove that consignee paid freight on shipments when the contract required them to do so, and that the manufacturer was not required to make payment in order that delivery might be made.

The letter of the plaintiff of August 6, 1914, also furnishes some evidence that the agent was not without authority because the plaintiff, instead of saying that the agent had no authority to make the agreement with the defendant, says that he was "without sufficient information," and it may also be inferred from it that the agent informed the plaintiff of his contract with the defendant because it is said therein, "He was later directed to notify you that this freight would not be paid."

The fact that the plaintiff paid the logging road freight is not conclusive and may be explained, but, in the absence of explanation, taken in connection with the other circumstances, it furnishes evidence for the consideration of the jury that the plaintiff consented to the modification of the contract in accordance with the agreement with the agent, and this should have been submitted to the jury.

For the errors pointed out, there must be a new trial.

New trial.

TYREE v. TUDOR et al. (No. 356.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 13, 1921.)

1. Parent and child §13(1)—Father owner of automobile not liable for son's negligence.

The mere fact that the owner of an automobile was the father of the driver whose negligence caused an accident does not make such owner liable in damages for his son's acts.

2. Master and servant §301(1)—Son driving automobile held father's servant.

Where a 16 year old boy drove his father's automobile with the latter's permission to convey a young lady to and from a dance, in so doing he was operating the car as the servant of his father, who was responsible for injuries inflicted by the son's negligence in driving.

3. Master and servant §332(1)—Parent's responsibility for son's negligent driving held for jury.

Where there was evidence that the negligence of defendant's son driving his automobile with permission was the proximate cause of the death of plaintiff's intestate, the case should have been submitted to the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; Fruley, Judge.

Action by L. P. Tyree, administrator, against George O. Tudor and others. From judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

The defendant Geo. O. Tudor is the father of Bynum Tudor, who at the time the plaintiff's intestate was killed in the automobile wreck was something over 16 years of age, "living at the home of his father and under his care, custody, and control." Geo. O. Tudor was the owner of two automobiles which he kept on his premises for business purposes and for the comfort and pleasure of his family—one a large Hudson touring car, and the other a Buick Six roadster. Bynum Tudor was the chauffeur for the family, drove both of the cars, sometimes driving out with his mother in the large car, and at other times with his father in the small car, and at other times alone, sometimes driving alone in the large car, and at other times in the Buick Six roadster.

On the night of June 19, 1918, there was a dance for the young people at the Country Club, which was situated on a concrete road about three miles west of Winston. Bynum Tudor invited Ruth Tyree, the plaintiff's intestate, a young girl nearly 16, to go in the car with him, and it is admitted in the pleadings that he procured the consent of his father to use the Buick Six roadster for the purpose of taking her to the dance. There is evidence that he asked permission of his father to use the large car, but his father required him to take the small car. After the two young people arrived at the dance it is in evidence that he did not dance, but while the others were dancing he was driving his car on the concrete road extending from Winston to the Country Club at a speed of 50 to 60 miles an hour, sometimes racing with other automobiles and sometimes with motorcycles.

The dance broke up about 1 o'clock a. m., and Bynum Tudor was among the last to leave the club. In this car besides himself as chauffeur, was his older brother, George, and Ruth Tyree. The evidence is that he drove at a speed of 50 to 60 miles an hour, with the sparks coming out of the Buick's manifold some 7 or 8 inches long, passing car after car on this crowded thoroughfare on his way to the city. In passing Martin Goodman's car at this speed, he turned in too short and side-swiped the Goodman car. The impact of the light Buick Six roadster with the heavier car of Goodman, threw the Buick roadster out of the road, whirling it over and over through the barb wire fence into a field alongside the road, cutting down three posts, one of them 6 inches square, throwing the car 36 feet, leaving it upside down with its wheels in the air and its front pointed in the opposite direction to that it was going. Bynum and his elder brother, who was in the car with them, were thrown out in a senseless condition and the body of the young lady was found hanging on the strands of the barb wire fence in a condition so distressing and mangled that one of the men who attempted to move it fainted. The practically lifeless body was rushed to the hospital, where she died almost immediately. Its condition was such that the authorities would not permit her parents to view it.

The road was 50 feet wide, 20 in the center being concrete and 15 feet on each side being dirt road. Goodman testified that he was driving on the right-hand side of the concrete in 2 feet of the edge, and that Tudor came up from behind without blowing any horn and struck his car, and at the time going probably 60 miles an hour. The distance to which Tudor's car was thrown is also some evidence of the great speed he was going. There was evidence that Tudor was in the habit of driving his father around town in his car.

At the close of the plaintiff's evidence, the court rendered a judgment of nonsuit, and the plaintiff appealed.

Swink, Korner & Hutchins and Jones & Clement, all of Winston-Salem, for appellant.

Manly, Hendren & Womble, Parrish & Deal, and Holton & Holton, all of Winston-Salem, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. The plaintiff bases his cause of action upon the relation existing between Geo. C. Tudor and his minor son as master and servant in two aspects:

(1) That on this trip Bynum Tudor was acting as chauffeur under or with the consent and approval of Geo. C. Tudor.

(2) That, where the parent maintains an automobile for social purposes by his family, he should be held liable for an injury sustained through its negligent operation while being used by a member of the owner's family, upon the theory that the car under such circumstances is being used for the purpose for which it was kept, and that the person—a member of the family—is operating it as the owner's agent. This includes cases where, the parent keeping the automobile for the comfort and pleasure of his family, a member of the family who is authorized, expressly or impliedly, to use it for such purpose, by his negligent operation of it causes an injury to another. This renders the owner liable.

[1] This court has often held that the mere fact that the defendant, the owner of the car, was the father of Bynum Tudor does not make him liable in damages for his acts. Linville v. Nissen, 162 N. C. 95, 77 S. E. 1096; Bilyeu v. Beck, 178 N. C. 481, 100 S. E. 891. But in Linville v. Nissen the father not only did not authorize, but expressly forbade, his son to use the machine, and in Bilyeu v. Beck the daughter acting as chauffeur was more than 21 years of age, and the evidence tended to show that she was acting solely for herself, and not in any manner for her father or by his permission. In Wilson v. Polk, 175 N. C. 490, 95 S. E. 849, the evidence was that the owner was in the car at the time of the injury and was going for her own purposes to her farm.

On the other hand in Clark v. Sweaney, 175 N. C. 280, 95 S. E. 568, reaffirmed on rehearing 176 N. C. 529, 97 S. E. 474, the minor son was driving the automobile with the implied consent of his father, who was therefore held liable for his negligence. This consent was implied by the fact that the automobile was purchased for the use of the family and the minor son was permitted to operate it as a member of the family and had his mother with him in the automobile and the father was held responsible. In the present case permission was expressly given to the son to use the car for a social purpose and his invitation to the young lady to go with him was extended by the permission of his father to him to use the car for that purpose. He also carried in the car his older brother, and was in the habit of driving his father in this car.

In Brittingham v. Stadlem, 151 N. C. 300, 66 S. E. 128, it was held that, while the mere relationship of parent and child does not make the former liable for damages for the tort or negligent act of the other, the parent is liable when he authorized or permitted the child to do the act, or the child was acting as his servant or his agent. In that case the defendants employed their 12 year old son as a clerk in a pawnshop, where, among other things secondhand pistols were dealt in, and while the boy was carelessly handling a pistol on which a loan was asked, he unintentionally shot and injured another customer in the store, and it was held sufficient to submit the case to the jury upon the question of the parents' actionable negligence.

In Taylor v. Stewart, 172 N. C. 203, 90 S. E. 134, the court held that it is negligence per se for one under the prohibited age (16) to run an automobile; still the father would not be liable unless the negligence of the minor son was the proximate cause of the injury; and, while ordinarily a father is not held responsible for the injury caused by the negligence of his minor son done without his knowledge and consent, such consent may be inferred as in that case. In that case Brown, J., says as follows:

"A somewhat similar case has been decided in South Carolina, where it is held that a person who provided an automobile for the pleasure of his family, which his son was authorized by him to operate, is held liable for his son's negligence when driving the car for the pleasure of himself and his friends. Davis v. Littlefield, 97 S. C. 171."

On the second appeal, in Taylor v. Stewart, 175 N. C. 199, 95 S. E. 167, the verdict in favor of the father was sustained, there appearing evidence:

"That death of plaintiff's intestate was an unavoidable accident, which a prudent chauffeur, authorized by law to run a machine, could not by exercising reasonable care have avoided."

In the case at bar it is admitted in the answer that Bynum Tudor was acting as an escort for the plaintiff's intestate, taking her to and bringing her home from the dance, and that as a result of a collision the plaintiff's intestate received injuries from which she died, and it is also in evidence that the defendant Geo. C. Tudor the day after the occurrence stated that his son Bynum had asked his permission to take his car to carry Ruth to the dance at the Country Club and wanted his large car, but the father had another engagement that night and could not let his son have that car, but he did let them have his small car to take Ruth to the Country Club to the dance. There was ample evidence to go to the jury; if believed, that the negligence of Bynum was the proximate, and indeed the sole, cause of the injury.

[2, 3] Upon the evidence the plaintiff was driving the car by the permission of the father, knowing that it was to be used for the conveyance of the young lady to and from the dance, a social purpose. He was therefore operating the car as the servant of his father, and for the negligent injuries inflicted by him his father was responsible; it being within the scope and purposes for which the car was bought and used. There being evidence that the negligence of the son was the proximate cause of the death, the case should have been submitted to the jury.

In another recent case, Reich v. Cone, 180 N. C. 267, 104 S. E. 530, the owner of an automobile who had loaned his machine to his servant to use solely for his own purposes was held not liable in damages for the servant's negligence because it appeared that the servant was competent to drive the car and it was not being used by him in the employer's service. In the present case the car was being used for the social purposes of the family, and with the knowledge and consent of the father for that purpose, and there is no evidence that the minor son was competent to drive the car. Indeed, the evidence of his conduct that night, and in this very occurrence, tends to prove that he did not have sufficient discretion for that purpose, and his father is liable on that ground also if the jury should so find the fact. It was his duty not to intrust the safety of the young lady to his son unless he knew that he was careful and prudent in the operation of the machine. To hold otherwise would be dangerous to the safety of life and limb.

We will not lengthen this discussion by citations of numerous authorities from other states in which the decisions cannot all be reconciled or cases where the facts may more or less differ from the one at bar.

Upon our own authorities, and upon the reason of the thing, we think this case should have been submitted to the jury, and the judgment of nonsuit is reversed.

(181 N. C. 530)

STATE v. MILLS. (No. 50.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 6, 1921.)

1. Highways §186 — Municipal corporations §707—One may be guilty of reckless or careless driving within the statute without exceeding speed limits.

The proviso of C. S. § 2618, was intended to define three acts as per se constituting reckless and careless driving where certain speed limits on highways and streets are exceeded and each of these acts is a separate and distinct crime, but it was not intended to restrict reckless or careless driving to the acts enumerated, so that one may violate the law by driving carelessly or recklessly without exceeding the speed limits.

2. Criminal law §260(13)—Superior court may permit amendment making affidavit more certain upon appeal from recorder's court.

Where the original affidavit in recorder's court charged the defendant with reckless and careless driving and with driving faster than allowed by law, and also with the commission of an assault upon a person struck by the automobile, and the defendant appealed from his sentence upon conviction thereunder, the statute gives the superior court ample power to permit an amendment making the affidavit more certain and particular as to the special accusation (C. S. 1919, § 1500, rule 12), the matter being within the court's discretionary power (Rev. Code, c. 62, § 22; chapter 8, and Code, § 908).

3. Criminal law §260(13)—Original warrant in recorder's court, charging violation of road laws, may be amended in superior court.

Where the original warrant in recorder's court charged defendant in a general way with all that is charged in the amendment allowed by the judge of the superior court, upon appeal, in the form of a bill of indictment, each count specifying a different offense, but all embracing an assault, reckless driving, and driving at an unlawful speed, the original warrant should be construed liberally, and the meaning of the law being there the amendment making it more clear, is proper, the trial being anew (C. S. § 4647).

4. Indictment and information §130—Counts for violation of speed law on highway outside of and in town may be joined.

The right to join three separate counts, alleging three different crimes at three different places, namely exceeding 25 miles an hour on public highway outside of a city, 18 miles an hour in the residential section, and 10 miles an hour in the business section of a city, is given by C. S. § 4622; the offenses being of the same general class.

5. Criminal law §378(1), 1216(2)—Separate verdicts proper on conviction for exceeding speed law on three counts, and each sentence may begin at expiration of preceding one.

Where three separate counts accused defendant of exceeding the speed allowed by law on a public highway and on a street in residence section and a street in a business section, each count is in fact and theory a separate indictment, and it was proper for the jury to give a separate verdict on each count, and each sentence could be made to begin at the expiration of a preceding one.

6. Highways §186 — Municipal corporations §707—Conviction of driving on country road and in residence and business district of town held to be of three offenses, and not one.

Accused was convicted of three and not one offense, where he was convicted on a warrant under C. S. § 2618, charging violation of the speed law in driving on a country road and in the residence and business districts of a town, since the three acts constitute three separate offenses.

7. Criminal law \Leftrightarrow 90(5)—Recorder's court of Nash county has concurrent jurisdiction with justices of the peace in the matter of violation of speed law on roads and streets.

The recorder's court of Nash county, N. C., has concurrent jurisdiction with justices of the peace of offenses within the jurisdiction of the latter, and also jurisdiction of other offenses which are made petty misdemeanors (Pub. Loc. Laws 1911, c. 176), and the recorder's court had jurisdiction of the offenses of exceeding the speed limit on the public highways and in a town, and also of the same offenses as alleged by the amended warrant on appeal to the superior court, and such jurisdiction is sustained, not only under the local statute, but also under the general statute concerning the recorder's courts.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nash County; Cranmer, Judge.

G. V. Mills was convicted in the recorder's court of driving an automobile in a manner in violation of law and committing an assault and battery while doing so, and he appealed to the superior court, and from a conviction therein he appeals. No error.

Defendant was charged before the recorder's court of Nash county with "unlawfully, willfully, and feloniously driving an automobile recklessly, carelessly, and faster than allowed by law, and committing an assault and battery while so doing upon J. R. Wheelless and others, with intent to kill, injure and maim, and damage said J. R. Wheelless, contrary to the form of the statute," etc. He was tried upon the charge before the recorder's court, and convicted and sentenced to six months' imprisonment, and assigned to work on the public roads, and he appealed. The law alleged to have been violated is section 2618 of the Consolidated Statutes. The statute creates several different offenses as to driving motor vehicles on the public highways of the state, that is, driving recklessly, or at a rate of speed greater than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the width, traffic, and use of the highway, or so as to endanger the property or the life or limb of any person. The proviso is that operating a motor vehicle at a rate of speed exceeding 25 miles per hour on any public highway outside the limits of any incorporated city or town, or at a rate exceeding 18 miles per hour in the residential portion of any city, or at a rate exceeding 10 miles per hour in the business section, shall be a violation of the statute.

W. M. Person, of Louisburg, for appellant. James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The proviso was intended to define three acts which should per se constitute reckless or careless driving, and the commission of each of these acts is a separate and distinct crime. There may be other acts of reckless or careless driving within the meaning of all that goes before the proviso, as it was not the purpose of the Legislature to restrict reckless or careless driving to those acts enumerated in the first proviso of section 2618. A person may drive carelessly, or even recklessly, without exceeding the prescribed speed limits, and this case furnishes a clear illustration of it.

[2] Now as to the power of amendment. It will be observed that in the original affidavit upon which the warrant was issued by the recorder, defendant was charged with reckless and careless driving, and with driving faster than is allowed by law, and also with the commission of an assault. The defendant appealed from the sentence of six months in prison, and in the superior court the presiding judge was requested to allow an amendment of the affidavit, and of the warrant which refers to it, so that the charge might be made with greater certainty and particularity, and the defendant was thereby informed of the special accusation made against him. We do not see why he should complain of this, as it favored him, because it enabled him to make better preparation for his defense. But whether so or not, the statute gives the judge ample power to permit such amendments to be made. Its terms are very broad and inclusive, as will appear on its face. This is the law, it being in Consolidated Statutes of 1919, § 1500, rule 12 (Revisal of 1905, § 1467, rule 11), and reads as follows:

"No process or other proceeding begun before a justice of the peace, whether in a civil or a criminal action, shall be quashed or set aside for the want of form, if the essential matters are set forth therein; and the court in which any such action shall be pending shall have power to amend any warrant, process, pleading or proceeding in such action, either in form or substance, for the furtherance of justice, on such terms as shall be deemed just, at any time either before or after judgment."

In the note to section 1500 (rule 12) of the Consolidated Statutes will be found the cases in which the exercise of the power in a very liberal manner has been upheld. It was contended that under this section the court has no power to strike out the offense charged in the lower court, and insert an entirely new and different one. State v. Taylor, 118 N. C. 1262, 24 S. E. 526; State v. Vaughan, 91 N. C. 532; State v. Crook, 91 N. C. 536. The reason for the change in the statute extending the power of amendment so as to embrace both civil and criminal cases, matters of substance as well as matters of form, and the power to amend before or after judgment is perfectly obvious. It was because a justice of the peace was supposed to lack technical learning and skill in framing process and pleadings, whereas the lawyer who practiced in the superior courts, and the solicitor, were supposed to have both, and also the judge, and no harm could be done to the defendant, or to the opposite party, by making the process or pleading conform, in some degree, to the rules of law. It produced, at least, greater certainty in legal procedure. No party could be prejudiced by it unless there was a departure from the original charge in the warrant. A clear analysis of this section (which was section 908 of the Code) is made by Justice Ashe in State v. Vaughan, supra, showing that the exercise of the power is discretionary, and that the power itself, by gradual amendment of the statute, is very broad, and finally was extended to matters of substance, whereas formerly it related only to matters of form and was confined to civil actions. Rev. Code, c. 62, § 22, chapter 3, and the Code, § 908.

[3, 4] Applying these well-settled principles to this case, we find that the original warrant, while somewhat informal in its allegations, embraced, in a general way, all that is charged in the amendment allowed by the judge, in the form of a bill of indictment, each count specifying a distinct and different offense, but all embracing an assault, reckless driving, and driving at an excessive speed or a speed prohibited by the law. We should construe the original warrant with some liberality rather than with technical rigidity and, if the meaning of the law is there, it may be amended to express it more clearly in the appellate court, where the trial is anew. Consolidated Statutes, § 4647. The charges here are for reckless driving and overspeeding in the three several respects mentioned in the statute. Defendant was acquitted of the assault, and properly convicted of the three acts of driving at an unlawful rate of speed. The latter were committed on three different occasions and at three different places on the public highway and on the streets of Spring Hope, defendant driving more than 18 miles in its residential and more than 10 miles in its business section. They were therefore separate and distinct crimes.

On the question of the power to amend the warrant and the duty of the court to pursue a liberal policy with respect thereto, the following cases are pertinent: State v. Cauble, 70 N. C. 62; State v. Smith, 103 N. C. 410, 9 S. E. 200; State v. Baker, 106 N. C. 758, 11 S. E. 360; State v. Yellowday, 152 N. C. 793, 67 S. E. 480; State v. Currie, 161 N. C. 276, 76 S. E. 694; State v. Poythress, 174 N. C. 809, 93 S. E. 919; State v. Price, 175 N. C. 804, 95 S. E. 478; State v. Gillikin, 114 N. C. 832, 19 S. E. 152; State v. Telfair, 130 N. C. 645, 40 S. E. 976; Stone v. Railroad, 144 N. C. 220, 56 S. E. 932. The later cases: State v. Hyman, 164 N. C. 411, 79 S. E. 284;

State v. Publishing Co., 179 N. C. 720, 102 S. E. 318. The warrant in this case is quite as amendable, under the provisions of Consolidated Statutes, § 1500, rule 12, as were the warrants in any of the cases just cited. The right to join the counts in one warrant is specially given, and the offenses are all of the same general class. Consolidated Statutes, § 4622.

[5] Each count, is in fact and theory, a separate indictment, and a general verdict of guilty applies to each and every count. State v. Toole, 106 N. C. 736, 11 S. E. 168. But here the jury has given, not a general verdict, but a separate verdict on each count. The punishment was properly imposed, and each sentence could be made to begin at the expiration of a preceding one. State v. Hamby, 126 N. C. 1066, 35 S. E. 614; State v. Cathey, 170 N. C. 794, 87 S. E. 532; In re Black, 162 N. C. 458, 78 S. E. 273.

[6] The defendant contends, though, that only one offense was committed, but we cannot accede to this proposition, as it is untenable, if the evidence is to be accepted as true. Each of the three acts denounced by the statutes, driving at a rate of speed exceeding 25 miles, 18 miles and 10 miles in the three several places mentioned constitutes a separate case of careless or reckless driving, the latter being but an intensive expression of the former, meaning rashly negligent, or utterly careless, as if heedless, or as if indifferent to or regardless of consequences. As we have said, a person may drive carelessly, or even recklessly or heedlessly without necessarily driving with excessive speed, though if he does overpass the speed limit, he violates the statutes by its express terms. Each of these offenses relating to speed have different elements, and it would be physically impossible to commit all of them at one and the same time or at one and the same place, because they refer to different localities, which are separated from each other. Defendant could not be in two places at one and the same time, and certainly not in three. He might drive at an excessive speed, over 25 miles per hour, on a public highway in the country for only a half mile, and at all other times he may keep his motorcar within the speed limit, and yet he would violate the law, and the same would equally apply to a street in the residential or business section of a town, using only a part of the street for the unlawful purpose, and his act would likewise be a violation of the statute. So that there were three violations in this instance. The motion to quash was properly overruled, as the statute cited allows a joinder of the counts upon which he was convicted. Consolidated Statutes, § 4622 (Laws of 1917, c. 168).

[7] As to the jurisdiction: The recorder's court in Nash county has concurrent jurisdiction with justices of the peace of offenses within the jurisdiction of such justices, and also jurisdiction of other offenses which are made petty misdemeanors. Pub. Loc. Laws 1911, c. 178. The recorder's court had jurisdiction then of the offenses charged in the warrant, and also of those alleged in the superior court, by way of amendment. If there was no local statute, the general statute concerning recorder's courts would sustain the jurisdiction.

Reviewing the entire case, and record, we find that no error was committed by the judge at the trial.

No error.

(181 N. C. 180)

ROE v. JOURNIGAN. (No. 249.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 6, 1921.)

1. Deeds ¶66—Evidence of a tender and refusal of a deed 3½ years after recording held not sufficient to rebut presumption of delivery.

Evidence that a deed was tendered and refused 3½ years after it was recorded held not sufficient to go to the jury to rebut the presumption of delivery arising from its registration, especially when a second deed recited it was intended to cancel the first.

2. Evidence ¶273(3) — Testimony held inadmissible as declaration in interest of vendor.

In an action involving the validity of a deed granting a life estate to defendant's grantor, evidence of vendor's declaration that such grantor had refused to accept the deed because it did not convey a fee-simple estate, not shown to have been made prior to the registration to such deed, was inadmissible, being also a declaration in the interest of such vendor, who had subsequently made another deed granting the fee.

3. Life estates ¶23 — Full warranty deed by life tenant conveys only life estate.

Where defendant received a warranty deed and his grantor had only a life estate, such deed conveyed such life estate.

4. Deeds ¶177 — Deed conveying to person not in being held not revocable under law at time made.

Acts 1893, c. 498 (C. S. § 996), providing that a deed conveying an interest to a person not then in being is revocable, is without application to a deed made prior to such act; the rights to the parties thereunder being fixed by prior statute, under which it is not revocable.

5. Deeds ¶66 — Evidence rebutting presumption of delivery held insufficient to go to jury.

Where owner of land made a deed to his son, defendant's grantor, giving a life estate, and the deed was recorded, and valid if accepted, and subsequently the father gave the son a warranty deed, testimony, offered to rebut the presumption of delivery arising from the registration of the former deed, held insufficient to go to the jury.

6. Infants ¶116—Counsel fees for service for infant must be arranged by agreement between counsel and guardian.

In an action by an infant for the recovery of a right to land, the court may not fix compensation for counsel; the matter of attorney's fees being for adjustment between counsel and the infant's guardian.

Appeal from Superior Court, Franklin County; Kerr, Judge.

Action by Bennie Roe by his next friend against James C. Journigan. Directed verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals. No error.

This case has been before us twice heretofore. Roe v. Journigan, 175 N. C. 261, 95 N. E. 495, and a. c., 179 N. C. 687, 102 S. E. 498.

The facts are fully stated in the first appeal. 175 N. C. 262, 95 S. E. 495. William Roe executed a deed August 26, 1881, to plaintiffs' father, W. S. Roe, by which he conveyed to him a life estate, with remainder to his then wife for life if she survived him, and then to his children. This deed was recorded May 27, 1882. On January 2, 1886, he made a second deed to his said son W. S. Roe, in fee simple, for the same tract of 50 acres which was recorded. Thereafter W. S. Roe married a second time, and died July, 1915, leaving the plaintiffs, his children by his second wife, surviving him. The controversy is as to the validity of the deed of 1881.

W. S. Roe and his second wife conveyed the land to the defendant, and the deed was duly recorded. This action by the grandchildren of William Roe, who are the children of W. S. Roe by his second wife, against Journigan, the grantee of the deed by W. S. Roe, raises the question whether the deed for life estate to W. S. Roe was ever delivered. On this trial the court excluded testimony offered, and directed a verdict for the plaintiffs, and the defendant appealed.

B. T. Holden and W. H. Yarborough, Jr., both of Louisburg, for appellant.

W. H. & Thos. W. Ruffin and W. M. Person, all of Louisburg, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. The real controversy in the trial is as to whether the excluded evidence was competent as tending to rebut the presumption of the delivery of the deed of 1881, which was raised by its registration. When the case was first here (175 N. C. 261, 95 S. E. 495), the court held that evidence of the declaration by W. S. Roe that he would not accept the deed of 1881, conveying a life estate, was incompetent, because he was not a party to the action, nor was he one under whom the plaintiff claims, as he derives his title from the deed of William Roe, and not from W. S. Roe, and, if admissible at all, it could only be so as a declaration against interest, which it was not, but was a self-serving declaration on the part of W. S. Roe, and therefore incompetent.

On the second appeal (179 N. C. 686, 102 S. E. 498) the judge admitted the testimony of W. S. Roe to the same purport, upon the ground that it appeared that W. S. Roe was not the sole heir of his father, and had moved from the land in controversy, and therefore it was not a self-serving declaration, but the court again held there was error, because this did not show that the declaration was against the interest of the declarant.

[1] On the trial from which this appeal is taken the defendant offered to prove by Robert Harris that between 1881 and prior to 1886—that is, after the execution of the first deed and before the execution of the second—the witness was at William Roe's house, W. S. Roe being present; that William Roe had the deed of 1881 in his possession, and offered it to W. S. Roe, who refused to take it, saying he did not want any land, unless he could have it absolutely to do as he pleased with, and that he would not take a life estate.

On both the former trials we held that what W. S. Roe said to another witness was not competent, because not a declaration against interest, but here the defendant offered to show what William Roe and W. S. Roe did in respect to the delivery of the deed and the words accompanying such act, not as declarations against interest, but as part of the res gestae, showing that in fact there was no delivery, and the defendant contends that this evidence was therefore competent. But the witness also stated that this occurrence took place about 12 months before Journigan bought the land in December, 1886 (which would have been about December, 1885), and therefore $3\frac{1}{2}$ years after the first deed had been recorded, and we do not think the evidence of a tender and the refusal by W. S. Roe of the deed at that date was sufficient evidence to go to the jury to rebut the presumption of delivery arising from the registration of the deed, May 27, 1882, especially when the second deed to W. S. Roe recites that it was intended as a cancellation of said first deed.

[2] The defendant also excepts because of the rejection of the testimony of Edward L. Harris, which was offered to prove that "some time between August, 1881 and January, 1886," William Roe stated to the witness that the tract of land belonged to himself, William Roe, and that W. S. Roe had refused to accept the deed because it did not convey a fee-simple estate. It does not appear therefore that this declaration by William Roe was made prior to the registration of the first deed, and, further, it was a declaration in the interest of William Roe.

[3, 4] It appears that the defendant, Journigan, obtained a deed with full warranty from W. S. Roe in December, 1886, and has been in possession 32 or 33 years, claiming it his own in good faith, and at the time of this conveyance W. S. Roe had no children. The defendant also pleads the statute of limitations, but this deed was certainly a conveyance of the life estate of W. S. Roe, who survived until 1915, and this action was begun in November, 1915. At that time the plaintiff was, and still is, an infant. The brother was then 25 years of age, and is not a party to this action, except as a next friend to the infant plaintiff, who alone recovers. It seems to be a hardship upon the defendant, especially as under Act 1893, c. 498, now C. S. 996, a deed such as this, conveying an interest to a person not then in being, is revocable. It is true that according to the evidence the plaintiff has been born since the act of 1893, but the rights conferred under that deed were fixed by the statute in force at the date of its registration in 1882. Roe v. Journigan, 175 N. C. 263, 95 S. E. 495.

[5] What the defendant may be entitled to recover for betterments placed upon the land under bona fide belief of the ownership of the legal title (C. S. 701), and by reason of the warranty of the father, to the extent of property, if any, descended upon the plaintiff from the estate of his father (C. S. 1741), are matters not now before us. We can only declare that the testimony offered to rebut the presumption of delivery arising upon the registration of the deed in 1882 was not sufficient to go to the jury.

[6] The allowance of $500 to counsel for the infant is irregular, and must be stricken out. The compensation should be fixed by proper proceedings before the clerk (Speight v. Railroad, 161 N. C. 87, 76 S. E. 684), and the making the allowance a lien upon the land and directing a sale, if not paid, is not authorized, so far as we know, by any precedent. The counsel who so faithfully and ably represented the infant plaintiff in this case are entitled to compensation, but it must be adjusted with the guardian. It may be that the infant already has other property and a guardian, or, if not, one must necessarily be appointed to take charge of the property recovered in this case, and in either event the guardian will adjust the fee with the counsel, which will be passed upon by the clerk in approving the accounts.

In Midgett v. Vann, 158 N. C. 130, 78 S. E. 802, the court says that:

Counsel fees in favor of the successful party "were abolished by statute in 1871. In many states attorney's fees are allowed to the successful litigant, but it is not so in this state and in some others, nor in the federal courts. Railroad v. Elliot, 184 U. S. 530; Hyman v. Devereux, 65 N. C. 589; Stringfield v. Hursh, 94 Tenn. 425. The opinion in this latter case is an elaborate discussion on this subject, and gives the states where attorney's fees are recoverable and those where they are not, placing North Carolina in the last-named class. See, also, Dolman v. Trust Co., 139 N. C. 212."

In regard to allowance of fees to counsel against their own client, it was said in Mordcau v. Devereux, 74 N. C. 673:

"The question is decided. Patterson v. Miller, 72 N. C. 516. This court has never interfered between attorney and client in making allowances for professional services, and we are not inclined at this late day to assume the power to do so. We make allowance to a clerk for stating an account, or to a commissioner for making sales, on the ground that the work is done by order of the court. But we have never supposed that we could be called on to settle fees between client and attorney, although there be a fund in the keeping of the court."

In this present case there is no fund in the keeping of the court even, and this matter should be adjusted as above indicated, when the infant can be represented by his guardian subject to the approval of the proper tribunal in passing upon his accounts.

No error.

(115 S. C. 495)

WALKER v. LEE et al. (No. 10579.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 10, 1921.)

1. Negligence §80—Contributory negligence precludes recovery.

Generally contributory negligence prevents a recovery.

2. Highways §172(1)—Traveler not required to keep to right of center unless other traveler is approaching from opposite direction.
Cr. Code 1912, § 617, and Civ. Code 1912, § 2157, requiring travelers on roads to keep to the right of the center, do not require a traveler to stay to the right of the center at all times, but merely requires him to travel to the right of the center when a traveler is approaching from the opposite direction.

3. Highways §175(1) — Driver of automobile to right of center not excused from exercising ordinary care to avoid injury.

The mere fact that automobile driver was driving to the right of the center of the road did not relieve him from exercising due and ordinary care to prevent a collision.

4. Highways §175(1) — Automobile driver required to drive to left of center if necessary to avoid collision.

Automobile driver who was driving to the right of the center of the road, on approach of automobile from opposite direction, was required to drive to opposite side of road if in so doing he could have avoided collision notwithstanding Cr. Code 1912, § 617, and Civ. Code 1912, § 2157 requiring traveler on road to keep to right of center.

5. Negligence §6—When violation of statute or ordinance is negligence per se, technical violation required to avoid injury to person or property.

While the violation of a statute or ordinance is negligence per se, a person is bound to technically violate either, if by so doing he can avoid inflicting injury to person or property.

Fraser, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Richland County Court; M. S. Whaley, Judge.

Action by Albert Walker against Robert E. Lee and another. Judgment for plaintiff and defendants appeal. New trial granted.

Melton & Belser, of Columbia, for appellants.

D. W. Robinson, of Columbia, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment entered in this case for a verdict for $400 actual damages. The action was for damages in tort for injuries caused by the alleged negligence of defendants in driving their automobile. The defense was a general denial and alleged contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. The cause was tried by Judge Whaley and a jury in the county court for Richland county in March, 1920. The exceptions, seven in number, complain of error in his honor's charge to the jury and in failing and refusing to charge certain requests submitted by defendants, and that the verdict was contrary to law and evidence.

The principal point raised by all of the exceptions, and the question that underlies all of the exceptions, is whether, under section 617 of the Criminal Code of 1912, the plaintiff is to be held free from contributory negligence when by the exercise of due care he should have gone around behind defendant's automobile.

[1] Under the general principle of law, contributory negligence prevents a recovery, and his honor so declared, but his honor made an exception in this case, and held that under section 617, Criminal Code, and section 2157, Civil Code, 1912, the plaintiff, even if in the exercise of due care he should have gone around behind defendant's automobile and to the left of the center of the road, in so doing was under no obligation to do so by reason of the statutes, and was not guilty of contributory negligence. His honor was clear-cut and concise on this point and made it clear to the jury.

[2-5] We think his honor was in error. A proper construction of the statutes does not require that one should at all times stay in the right of the center of the road, but it means that a party must take the right when he is meeting one, so as to give the party coming from the opposite direction his right of way unobstructed. A party has a right to travel on either side of the road, provided no one is coming from the opposite direction, and provided he is not obstructing the passage of any other person. A traveler can cross from one side to the other, provided no one is there, provided he obstructs no one's passage, and provided he injures no one by so doing, in person or property. When one violates a statute or ordinance, he is guilty of negligence per se, but he is bound to technically violate either if by so doing he can avoid inflicting injury to person or property. The question should have been submitted to the jury whether Walker could by the exercise of reasonable care have avoided the collision. In this case the mere fact that he was where he had a right to be under the law does not relieve him from exercising due and ordinary care, such as an ordinarily prudent person is required to do, to prevent a collision and avoid injury to person and property. Even though a person is driving where he has a right to, he must act under the emergencies of any case and exercise due care and circumspection, so as to prevent collisions and injuries, provided he does not obstruct the rights of the others traveling in a different direction.

The exceptions are sustained, and a new trial granted.

New trial.

GARY, C. J., and COTHRAN, J., concur.

FRASER, J. (dissenting). I cannot concur in the majority opinion in this case. Both the plaintiff and the defendant were using on a public highway dangerous machines. They were not only dangerous to foot passengers who must cross the highway, but to other persons who use these dangerous machines along the highways. The state and city governments have found it necessary to enact stringent rules for the use of the highways by these machines. There is no such thing as absolute safety, but, in order to secure a reasonable degree of safety to the traveling public, it is necessary that the rules be clear and their observance strictly enforced. The rule has, so far as this case is concerned, been made clear, and the courts should strictly enforce it. The defendant was not only where he had no right to be, but where he was forbidden to be. The plaintiff was not only where he had the right to be, but where the law commanded him to be. If under this condition the defendant has the right to the defense of contributory negligence, all the protection afforded by the law is lost. Every lawbreaker will be permitted to take the forbidden side of the highway and force the man who is trying to observe the law to become himself a lawbreaker, or take the consequence at his peril. I do not mean to say that a man on the right of the highway has the right to willfully ride down and intentionally injure the wrongdoer, but I do not think that the lawbreaker is entitled to the protection of the doctrine of contributory negligence. I think that the only duty a law observer owes to a lawbreaker is "not to intentionally injure him." The disposition of many drivers of dangerous machines is to proclaim to the rest of the world:

"You see me coming, or, by reasonable diligence, can see me coming. Get out of my way at your peril."

I do not think the courts should sustain the claim, and yet that is, in my judgment, just what the court is doing when it allows the defense of contributory negligence.

It may be that, the object of the law being to prevent accidents from collisions, one may go to the left, on some unfrequented road, where there is no apparent danger of collision, but even then he assumes the risk of an error of judgment. This may be strict and harsh, and at times inconvenient, but the strictness, harshness, and inconvenience does not compare with trail of the lawbreaker, marked as it is by broken laws, broken heads, broken bones, and the graves of the dead. There may be such a thing as discretionary obedience to law (I doubt it), but in my judgment it does not apply to the observance of traffic laws when dangerous machines are used.

The charge of Judge Whaley was, in my judgment, more favorable to the appellant than they had the right to ask. He charged the jury that the plaintiff was liable for contributory negligence unless, in order to avoid the accident, he would have been required to cross the center of the street, which was forbidden by law. I am very clear in my own mind that the law does not require a man to violate the law in order to avoid the unlawful acts of another. Judge Whaley charged the jury that the plaintiff was not required to violate the law in order to avoid the admittedly unlawful conduct of the defendant. I think he was clearly right, as far as he went, and, if he erred, it was in favor of the appellant.

For these reasons, I dissent.

BOARD OF SUP'RS OF LOUISA COUNTY
v. BIBB, Commonwealth's Atty.(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
April 1, 1921.)Counties ⇨ 174—States ⇨ 116, 119—Statutes authorizing county bond issue to improve state highways, and providing for reimbursement of county by state, held constitutional.

Acts 1920, c. 213, authorizing bond issue by county for improvement of state highways, and Acts 1920, c. 184, authorizing the county to improve a section of the state highway system, and providing for reimbursement of county by state for amount expended therefor, held not violative of Const. § 184, as it existed at time of their enactment, prohibiting the state from contracting debts for other than specified purposes, or of section 185, prohibiting state from assuming indebtedness of any county, or of section 187, requiring every law creating a debt to provide for a sinking fund for its payment.

Error to Circuit Court, Louisa County.

Proceeding by W. C. Bibb, Commonwealth's
Attorney, against the Board of Supervisors of Louisa County. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

W. C. Bibb, of Louisa, in pro per.

PER CURIAM. The order of the court below under review in this case contains the following decision, namely:

" . . . That the act of the General Assembly of Virginia under which the board of supervisors of Louisa county, Va., propose to issue the $200,000 of bonds, entitled 'An act to authorize the county of Louisa to borrow money and issue bonds for a sum not exceeding two hundred thousand dollars ($200,000.00),' which act was approved March 16, 1920, and is chapter 213 of said Acts of 1920 (pages 308, 309), is unconstitutional, and that the board of supervisors of Louisa county, Virginia, have no right to issue any bonds under said act, nor to make any levy upon the property in the county of Louisa under the provisions of said act, and that their order of March 12, 1921, is illegal, because of the unconstitutionality of the said act, and the said order is hereby annulled by this court."

It appears from the record that the questions raised in the court below with respect to the validity of the statute aforesaid were based on the position that, as such statute was enacted for the purpose of enabling the county of Louisa to obtain the benefit of the statute contained in Acts 1920, p. 268, entitled "An act to anticipate by counties, or otherwise, the construction of the state highway system," they are both in conflict with section 184 of the Constitution of Virginia as it stood at the time such statutes were enacted, and with sections 185 and 187 of such Constitution as they stood and now stand. The court is of opinion that the position mentioned is not well taken, that neither of the statutes in question are in conflict with the sections of the Constitution of the state aforesaid, but that both of such statutes are constitutional and valid.

The order of the court below under review will therefore be reversed and annulled, and this court will enter such order as that court should have entered, namely, to the effect that the board of supervisors of Louisa county have the right to issue bonds under the aforesaid act approved March 16, 1920 (being chapter 213 of the Acts of 1920, pp. 308, 309), and that the order of such board, aforesaid, of March 12, 1921, is in that and in all other particulars drawn in question upon this appeal legal and valid in all respects.

Reversed.

(129 Va. 695)

NEW YORK, P. & N. R. CO. v. CHANDLER.(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan.
20, 1921. Rehearing Denied April
6, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨ 525(1), 538—Instructions are not part of record unless made so by bill of exceptions or certificate.

Instructions are no part of the record in an action at law unless made so by bill of exceptions or certificate in accordance with the statutory requirements on that subject (Acts 1916, c. 416, now Code 1919, § 6252; Acts 1916,
c. 406, now Code 1919, § 6253), and instructions could not be certified after 60 days under Code 1919, § 6341, which merely authorizes selections from the record as already completed.

2. Carriers ⇨ 177(3)—Loss suffered by reason of delay held within Carmack Amendment, rendering initial carrier liable.

Loss for consequential damage which shipper suffered of the whole of the value of potatoes by reason of his loss of the sale of them which he had made at a stipulated price, caused by negligent delay in the transportation, followed by the subsequent conversion of the goods by the wrongful sale of them by the terminal carrier, was within the operation of the Carmack Amendment (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa) which makes the initial carrier liable for any loss, damage, or injury to such property, etc.

3. Carriers ⇨ 98—Liable for damages resulting from delay.

If damage results from failure, without good cause, to deliver goods, at their destination within a reasonable time, the carrier is liable for such damage, since the law implies a contract that goods shall be delivered within a reasonable time in absence of special agreement.

4. Carriers \S 123 — Delay held proximate cause of loss from subsequent wrongful sale by carrier preventing sale by shipper.

Where a delay in the transportation has caused the loss of a sale at a stipulated price, such delay is the proximate cause of the loss to the shipper of the full value of the goods, where the subsequent action of the carrier in the wrongful sale of the goods has prevented the plaintiff from himself selling the goods on the market or taking any other steps to minimize the damage which he has suffered.

5. Carriers \S 178—Carmack Amendment does not make initial carrier liable for injury by succeeding carrier as warehouseman.

The Carmack Amendment (U. S. Comp. St. \S 8604a, 8604aa) does not make the initial carrier liable for a loss of or injury to goods proximately caused by the conduct of a succeeding carrier while occupying the relationship of warehouseman.

6. Carriers \S 139—Refusal to receive goods by third person to whom goods were to be delivered on shipper's order held not to render carrier liable only as warehouseman thereafter.

Where shipper consigned goods to himself to be delivered to a third person on the shipper's order, refusal of such third person to receive the goods when he had no written order from the shipper authorizing delivery to him did not terminate carrier's liability as a carrier, or render it only liable as a warehouseman thereafter, since on such refusal the shipper became the unconditional consignee, and as such was entitled to notice of arrival of the goods and a reasonable time thereafter within which to make other disposition thereof so as to have them taken from the carrier's hands.

7. Carriers \S 185(3)—Finding that consignee had not a reasonable time to dispose of goods sustained.

In an action to recover the value of potatoes shipped by plaintiff and wrongfully sold by terminal carrier, which defendant claimed was holding them as a warehouseman, evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that four days given plaintiff within which to make disposition of the goods at point of destination was not a reasonable time, and defendant was not absolved from liability as carrier.

8. Carriers \S 104—Finding of unreasonable delay in transportation sustained.

Evidence held sufficient to support a finding that there was unreasonable delay in the transportation of potatoes, and that such delay caused the loss of a sale thereof by the shipper.

9. Carriers \S 104—Burden on carrier to explain unusual delay shown by evidence.

When evidence of unusual delay is adduced, a prima facie case of negligence is made out, and the burden then devolves on the carrier to explain the delay, and to show it arose from some other cause than the defendant's negligence, or that of its agents or servants.

10. Carriers \S 158(3)—Damages for delay in shipment held properly estimated by jury in case where bill of lading provided how loss should be computed.

Where shipper lost sale of goods under contract through carrier's negligent delay as to a shipment wrongfully sold by the carrier, the jury properly estimated the damages on the basis of the price the shipper was to receive under the contract of sale, instead of following the general rule that the measure of damages for loss of entire value of goods occasioned by delay in transportation is the market value of the goods at destination when delivery should have been made, plus other proximate damage, where the contract price was less than the market price, though bill of lading provided that loss should be computed on basis of value of property at place and time of shipment.

On Petition for Rehearing.

11. Carriers \S 157—Provision in bill of lading as to liability after notice of arrival of goods held not to change rule under Carmack Amendment.

A provision in a bill of lading, "Property not removed by the party entitled to receive it within 48 hours (exclusive of legal holidays) after notice of its arrival has been duly sent or given may be kept in car, depot, or place of delivery of the carrier, or warehouseman, subject to a reasonable charge for storage and to carrier's responsibility as warehouseman only," held not to change the established rule that, where the goods are not accepted, the liability of the carrier as carrier under the Carmack Amendment does not cease until the expiration of a reasonable time for the removal of the goods after the giving of the notice to the party entitled to receive them, especially where the Carmack Amendment, as amended by the first Cummins Amendment (U. S. Comp. St. \S 8592, 8604a), was in effect.

Error to Circuit Court, Northampton County.

Action by J. W. Chandler against the New York, Philadelphia & Norfolk Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

This action is upon the special contract of carriage set out in the notice of motion by which the suit was commenced. The plaintiff in error was the defendant and the defendant in error the plaintiff in the court below. The latter will be hereinafter referred to as the plaintiff and the former as the railroad company.

The contract of carriage alleged in the notice of motion was of one carload of Irish potatoes, containing 219 barrels, delivered by the plaintiff to the railroad company, as the initial carrier, at Cape Charles, Va., on July 16, 1917, to be carried to Atlanta, Ga., to the plaintiff himself as consignee to be there delivered on written order to G. A. De Wald & Co.

The notice of motion values the potatoes at $4.10 per barrel f. o. b. Cape Charles, Va., aggregating $897.90, that being the price at which they had been sold by the plaintiff to G. A. De Wald & Co., and alleges that the railroad company and its agents "negligently failed to transport said carload of Irish potatoes with reasonable dispatch, and by reason of said negligence said carload of potatoes was refused by said G. A. De Wald & Co. upon arrival at Atlanta, Ga."; that "upon refusal of said carload of potatoes by said G. A. De Wald & Co., at Atlanta, Ga., [the railroad company and its agents] negligently and wrongfully sold said carload of potatoes without notifying [the plaintiff and his agents] and without any authority from [the plaintiff or his agents]"; that, "by reason of [the railroad company's] said negligence [the plaintiff] has received nothing for said carload of potatoes," and accordingly judgment is sought against the railroad company for the said sum of $897.90, with interest thereon from July 16, 1917, until paid, being the amount of loss to the plaintiff occasioned by the railroad company's breach of contract of carriage aforesaid.

There was a trial by jury, which resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for the said $897.90, with interest thereon from July 16, 1917, until paid.

All of the evidence introduced both by the plaintiff and defendant is duly certified and appears in the record before us.

It also appears from the record that on the trial of the case instructions were given to the jury to which no exceptions were taken by the railroad company or the plaintiff at the time they were given, as the trial court certifies, and such court further certifies that not only were no such exceptions taken, but, "on the contrary, counsel for plaintiff and defendant expressly stated to the court at the time they presented them to the court that they had agreed on the instructions."

On the return of the verdict aforesaid the railroad company moved the trial court to set it aside as contrary to the law and the evidence and for misdirection by the court of the jury. The record states that these motions were overruled by the trial court, and that the court overruled "the motion which was made on the ground of error of the court in granting the instructions," because no exceptions were taken thereto at the time they were granted, and because they were presented to the court as agreed instructions as aforesaid.

The judgment under review was entered on the 22d of November, 1919.

On the 24th day of November, 1920, more than one year thereafter, the following order was entered in vacation by the honorable judge of the trial court, namely:

"J. W. Chandler v. New York, Philadelphia & Norfolk Railroad Company.

"It appearing to the court from an examination of the petition and record filed in the Supreme Court of the state of Virginia in the above case that the instructions given at the trial of said case in the circuit court were not made a part of the record by the clerk, and instructions having been expressly agreed to by counsel for plaintiff and counsel for defendant in the circuit court, and it further appearing that counsel for the New York, Philadelphia & Norfolk Railroad Company has had due notice that an application would be made, under section 6341 of the Code of Virginia, to have said instructions made a part of the record, upon motion of J. Brooks Mapp, attorney for J. W. Chandler, it is hereby ordered that said instructions shall be, and the same are hereby, made a part of the record."

A certified copy of this order is presented to us, accompanied with what are certified by the clerk of the trial court to be two instructions offered by the plaintiff and one instruction offered by the defendant in the instant case. Their contents are not here given, as in the opinion of the court, as will more fully below, they cannot be considered as a part of the record before the appellate court.

It should be stated that different counsel appeared for the railroad company in the trial court from counsel for the railroad company on the appeal before us.

Of the evidence in the case the following only need be said:

There was a bill of lading covering the shipment of the potatoes which conformed to the allegations aforesaid with respect to it in the notice of motion. It was not what is commonly known as an "order notify" bill of lading, but a species of what is commonly known as a "shipper's order" bill of lading. The consignee was the plaintiff himself, with notation in the bill of lading, "Deliver on written order to G. A. De Wald & Co." One of the railroad company's witnesses refers to this as an unusual consignment in the following language:

"* * * This car was consigned to J. W. Chandler, to deliver on written order, and very few—in fact that is about the only case that I remember of a carload of potatoes being shipped that way, to deliver on written order."

The plaintiff in his testimony, in explaining what the notation aforesaid means, makes this statement in his testimony:

"The meaning of that is Mr. G. A. De Wald would have to pay for the car of potatoes to get possession of it. Instead of making it an order bill of lading shipment, where the bill of lading is to be produced to the railroad to secure the shipment, we simply attach our order to our draft, and when they pay the draft they obtain the order, and the order is delivered to the railroad company for the goods.

"Q. That also explains, does it not, why the shipment was consigned to you instead of G. A. De Wald & Co., so you could get your money before the delivery of the shipment? A. Yes, sir."

The defendant railroad company's line does not extend to Atlanta. Its line connects with that of the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company, which does extend to Atlanta, and the shipment in question was thus transported, the last-named company being the terminal carrier.

There is no conflict in the evidence as to the following facts:

The bill of lading contained the following notation on its face:

"Abnormal conditions prevail on the lines of the carriers which will handle this shipment and it is subject to delay."

But during the period when the shipment in question was made four days was the usual running time of shipments of the same character from Cape Charles to Atlanta. The plaintiff himself shipped another car of potatoes from Cape Charles to Atlanta on the day after the car was shipped which is involved in this action, to wit, on July 17, 1917, and that car arrived in Atlanta on the 21st. The car of potatoes involved in the instant case arrived on the yard of the terminal carrier, approximately five miles west of Atlanta, which is used as a part of the system of that carrier at Atlanta, as a "delivery yard for Atlanta," at 5:30 a. m. July 22, 1917. It was not placed at "foot of Spring street where all deliveries are made" until "the night of the 23d or the morning of the 24th prior to 7:30 a. m." The terminal carrier thereupon, on July 24, 1917, at noon, notified G. A. De Wald & Co. that the shipment was ready for delivery to them. This notice was given over the telephone, and confirmed by postal card. De Wald & Co. in reply to the notice over the telephone refused to accept delivery of the shipment. There is some conflict in the testimony as to the reason given by De Wald & Co. for such refusal, but of this it is sufficient to say that there is ample evidence in the record to have warranted the jury in finding that the refusal was on account of the delay in the transportation over the usual and expected period of four days from July 18th, the date of the shipment from Cape Charles, such delay affecting De Wald & Co. in this, that the market price of potatoes in Atlanta materially declined after the expiration of such period.

On the refusal of De Wald & Co. to accept delivery of the potatoes, the terminal company on July 24th promptly wired the agent of the defendant railroad company at Cape Charles that the car of potatoes, giving its number, "consigned to J. W. Chandler had been refused, and asking" that J. W. Chandler "advise disposition." Meanwhile the plaintiff had been informed by his New York broker, through whom the sale of the potatoes had been made to De Wald & Co., of the refusal of the latter to accept them on account of said delay in transportation. Thereupon the plaintiff took the matter up at once (by wire it is presumed) with De Wald & Co., through the broker, with the view of making an adjustment or reaching an understanding with Mr. De Wald by which the latter would accept delivery of the potatoes. This was on the 24th. Later on the same day the agent of the defendant railroad company at Cape Charles, Mr. Savage, having received the telegram aforesaid from the terminal carrier, called the plaintiff over the telephone and told him the contents of the telegram. Just here there is a conflict in the testimony for plaintiff and that for the railroad company as to what the plaintiff's reply to this notification was. The plaintiff's testimony on this subject is as follows:

"My recollection is that I told Mr. Savage that the car in question would be handled; that is, it would be taken care of. We can't always give disposition the very minute they ask disposition, because it is very detrimental to do anything of that kind. We do not know that it is refused until we are notified, and we have to make other arrangements. Q. Is it or not along about this time a very busy season with you, not only this year, but in 1917? A. Yes, sir."

Mr. Savage testifies that in reply to his said notification over the telephone of the contents of said telegram the plaintiff said that "the car [of potatoes] had been disposed of." Mr. Savage still later in the day on the 24th wired the terminal carrier in Atlanta that the plaintiff said that "the car [of potatoes] had been disposed of."

The terminal carrier on the 25th wired the agent at Cape Charles, Mr. Savage, that the car of potatoes (giving its number) "has not been disposed of. Should be handled immediately." After 4:55 that afternoon Mr. Savage saw the plaintiff in person at Cape Charles and informed him of the contents of this second telegram. Here again there is a conflict in the testimony as to what reply the plaintiff gave on the subject of the disposition to be made of the car of potatoes. Mr. Savage testifies that plaintiff told him in reply to the second telegram precisely what he (Savage) wired back to the terminal carrier, and that was this:

"Shipper claims consignee refusing shipment account of some one advising car forwarded July 18th, while it actually left here July 18th; declines to give disposition."

The plaintiff's testimony on this subject is as follows:

"Q. You have heard Mr. Savage's testimony as to what took place on the 25th; what is your recollection of what took place at Cape Charles?

"A. My information was that the transportation company had told Mr. De Wald that that car was not shipped until the 18th, and I told Mr. Savage, if the transportation company had made that statement, the car was shipped on the 16th, and until I knew better I refused to give disposition of it.

"Q. Mr. Chandler, did you abandon the car, or give it up for the railroad company to handle?"

"A. No.

"Q. Did you notify Mr. Savage or any one to that effect?"

"A. No. * * *

"Q. I believe you testified that you were handling this car as rapidly as you could after you got notice of it?"

"A. Yes, sir."

As the result of the negotiations set on foot as aforesaid by the plaintiff on the 24th with De Wald & Co. through the plaintiff's broker, the plaintiff subsequently (within what time precisely does not appear from the record) reached "a satisfactory understanding with Mr. De Wald," as the plaintiff testifies, by which De Wald & Co. agreed to take the potatoes and called for them, but they were not and could not be delivered to him because of the following fact, namely: The terminal carrier on July 28th turned over the car of potatoes to McCullough Bros., potato dealers in Atlanta, for sale, who promptly thereafter sold them on the market in Atlanta.

The plaintiff in his testimony states that he could not say whether, under the arrangement made with De Wald & Co. aforesaid, as a result of the negotiations set on foot by the plaintiff on July 24th, he would or would not have gotten the full amount of $897.90.

The potatoes sold on the market as just stated for $508.60, after deducting the commissions of McCullough Bros. of $57.40 and $8 for labor in assorting them. This amount was received by the terminal carrier, from which the latter deducted freight charges and demurrage, leaving $312.18, net balance in hand. No part of this has ever been paid to the plaintiff or offered to be paid.

The uncontradicted testimony for the plaintiff is to the effect that but for the delay in transportation aforesaid he would have received said $897.90 for the potatoes as of July 17, 1917.

The following letter of the claim agent of the said terminal carrier is in evidence:

"Seaboard Air Line Railway Company.

"Portsmouth, Va., August 28th, 1917.

"CL-25523.

"Mr. J. W. Chandler, Exmore, Va.—Dear Sir: I have before me your letter of August 18th to our Agent at Atlanta, Ga., regarding DI&W car 39485, loaded with potatoes, consigned to you to be delivered to G. A. De Wald, on written order, in which you claim that Mr. De Wald called for his car of potatoes, and same had been delivered to McCullough Bros., beg to advise that the car arrived at destination on July 22d, and Mr. De Wald was notified by phone; same was refused by him on July 24th, at noon, claiming delay in transit, and stating that shipment was routed Ga. Ry. We immediately handled with the agent of the NYP&NRR., at Cape Charles, Va., and wrote you direct requesting disposition, before disposal orders could be obtained, then shipment began to deteriorate and I found it necessary to turn over to McCullough Bros. for handling, in order that the shipment might not become worthless, and same was sold for $312.18 net, for which we will entertain claim."

The railroad company introduced evidence tracing shipment in question while on its line, showing delivery to the Belt Line, at Pinners Point, for the said terminal carrier, on July 17th at noon, which evidence tended to show that there was no unreasonable delay in transportation up to that time. But it introduced no evidence whatever, and there is none in the record, explaining the subsequent unusual delay in the transportation. As aforesaid, the car of potatoes arrived on the yard of the terminal carrier within five miles of Atlanta at 5:30 a. m. of July 22d. The car had then been delayed in transit approximately two days longer than the usual period required therefor aforesaid, and approximately two days longer than the subsequent shipment which plaintiff made to the same place from Cape Charles on July 17th as aforesaid. There is no evidence introduced by the railroad company or in the record explaining this delay. It appears in evidence that July 22d was Sunday, but there is no evidence that such freight was not customarily moved on Sunday; and there is no evidence explaining why the shipment was not moved on to the delivery station in Atlanta during the day of Monday the 23d instead of being delayed there, as it was, until the movement of the car that night or "the morning of the 24th prior to 7:30 a. m." to the delivery station. And the further delay in not notifying De Wald & Co. of the arrival of the shipment until noon of the 24th is in no way explained. The unexplained delay in the transportation therefore was four days beyond the usual time required therefor at that time.

There is no evidence tending to show that the potatoes were damaged or in any way injured physically by the delay in transportation up to noon of the 24th of July. Nor, indeed, is there any evidence whatever that they were at all in a damaged or injured physical condition at the time they were sold by the terminal carrier, as aforesaid, immediately following the 28th of July. There is the statement contained in the aforesaid letter of the claim agent at Portsmouth, Va., of the terminal company of August 28th which says that "before disposal orders could be obtained then shipment began to deteriorate," etc. But this agent could have had no personal knowledge of such deterioration. Mr. McCullough, of the firm of McCullough Bros., who sold the potatoes as aforesaid, testified as a witness for the railroad company, and he does not say or indicate in any part of his testimony that the potatoes were in a damaged or injured condition when sold. On the contrary, on being asked what was the reason for the general decline in the market price of potatoes "from and after July 22d or 23d," he said, "Well, just the extra supply of potatoes on the market and the general decrease all over the country; Georgia potatoes were coming freely in at that time," leaving as a reasonable inference to be drawn from his testimony that the reduced price he had just testified he obtained for the shipment of potatoes in question was due solely to the decline in the market price by the time he sold them. And no other witness testified that the potatoes were physically injured or damaged up to the time they were thus sold.

The testimony for defendant shows that the market price in Atlanta of such potatoes as those of the shipment in question was $6 to $0.25 per barrel up to and including July 20, 1917, $5 to $5.25 per barrel on July 21st and 23d, and $5 to $5.50 on July 24th; that there was a general decline in such market price after July 22d or 23d, but no figures are given in the evidence of such prices after July 24th, except that it appears from the gross price obtained by McCullough Bros. immediately following July 28th for the 219 barrels of plaintiff's potatoes as aforesaid were $508.60 and $57.40 and $9-$574, or $2.62 per barrel.

Jas. G. Martin, of Norfolk, for plaintiff in error.

Mapp & Mapp, of Accomac, for defendant in error.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement, delivered the following opinion of the court:

The questions presented for our decision by the assignments of error will be disposed of in their order as stated below.

[1] 1. Are the instructions referred to in the statement preceding this opinion, which were not certified by the judge of the trial court within the period of 60 days fixed by statute (Acts 1916, p. 722, now Code 1919, § 6252), a part of the record before us in this case?

This question must be answered in the negative.

The instructions are no part of the record in an action at law unless made so by bill of exceptions or certificate in accordance with the statutory requirements on that subject. Acts 1916, p. 722, now Code 1919, § 6252, or Acts 1916, p. 708, now Code 1919, § 6253. Section 6341 of the Code of 1919, under which the instructions in question were certified, has reference only to what is already a part of the record, and merely authorizes selections from the record as already completed. It does not authorize any additions to the record. Barksdale v. Parker, 87 Va. 141, 12 S. E. 344.

106 S.E.—44

[2] 2. Is the loss and consequential damage which the plaintiff has suffered of the whole of the value of his goods by reason of his loss of the sale of them which he had made at a stipulated price caused by negligent delay in the transportation, followed by the subsequent conversion of the goods by the wrongful sale of them by the terminal carrier, within the operation of the "Carmack Amendment," which makes the initial carrier who receives goods for interstate transportation liable "for any loss, damage or injury to such property, caused by it or by any common carrier * * * to which such property may be delivered or over whose line or lines such property may pass"? U. S. Comp. St. § 8604a. (The question assumes for the present that the delay was negligent, and that the conversion was wrongful.)

This question must be answered in the affirmative.

Indeed, such question is expressly decided in this state by the case of Norfolk Truckers' Ex. v. Norfolk Co., 116 Va. 466, 82 S. E. 92. There, as in the instant case, the action was for the loss suffered by the plaintiff of the whole of the value of his goods, by reason of his loss of sale of the goods, which he had made at a stipulated price, caused by the negligent delay in the transportation, followed by the subsequent wrongful sale of the goods by the terminal carrier. In the opinion of this court in that case, delivered by Judge Harrison, in reference to the Carmack Amendment and its application to such case, this is said:

"We are of opinion that the amendment, which makes the initial carrier responsible for 'loss or damage or injury to goods,' is broad enough to cover a case of damage to the shipper by reason of delay. It would be a narrow construction of the statute to confine its operation to the actual loss of goods, or to their physical injury. The wrong for which the statute undertook to give a remedy was that done the shipper, and if the shipper has suffered loss by reason of the negligent or unreasonable delay of the carrier in the performance of its contract; it is just the same as though the loss had resulted from a physical injury to the goods or from the actual loss or disappearance of specific articles."

[3] As said in 10 C. J. § 404, A, pp. 284, 285:

"* * * If damage results from failure, without good excuse, to deliver the goods at their destination within a reasonable time, the carrier is liable for such damage. * * * When a carrier undertakes to convey goods, the law implies a contract that they shall be delivered at destination within a reasonable time, in the absence of any special agreement as to the time of delivery. This duty, it is said, is as obligatory as the duty to deliver safely. And the principle applies although there is a written contract for the shipment which contains no stipulation as to the time within which the goods are to be delivered. The law will nevertheless imply an understanding to carry within a reasonable time."

[4] Where, as in the Norfolk Trucker's Ex. Case and in the instant case, delay in the transportation has caused the loss of a sale at a stipulated price, such delay is the proximate cause of the loss to the plaintiff of the full value of the goods, where the subsequent action of the carrier in the wrongful sale of the goods has prevented the plaintiff from himself selling the goods on the market or taking any other steps to minimize the damage which he has suffered. It is true, with respect to the elements and measure of damages in actions involving the liability of carriers for delay in the delivery of goods, as said in 10 C. J. § 4448, pp. 307, 308, cited and relied on for the railroad company:

"Ordinarily" the measure of damages is "not the value of the goods. * * * Delay in delivery of the goods, even though it is such as to render the carrier liable, does not constitute conversion, and the person entitled to the goods cannot on that account refuse to receive them and sue for the full value. The measure of damages is not the full value, since the bailor still retains the ownership, but the loss proximately caused by the delay. The carrier's liability is to compensate for the damages growing out of the delay, and not for loss; and the remedy of the party entitled to the goods is to sue for the damages he has sustained by reason of the delay. The rule proceeds on the theory that a party injured by the breach of a contract by another should take all reasonable steps to minimize the damage he will suffer."

But this is where there is the delay referred to merely, and the plaintiff still retains the ownership and control of the property, so that it is within his power to take some steps, such as aforesaid, to minimize the damages. Manifestly such rule has no application to such a case as that before us.

It is urged in argument for the railroad company that in the instant case the consignee refused to accept delivery at noon on July 24th, and that the consignor on July 25th refused to give any instructions for the disposition of the goods, or, if the latter be not true, that certainly the consignor did not give any instructions for the disposition of the goods within a reasonable time after the 24th of July, when he was notified of the arrival of the goods in Atlanta and the refusal of De Wald & Co. to accept delivery of them, which conduct of De Wald & Co. and the plaintiff, as is urged for the railroad company, terminated the relationship of the railroad company to the plaintiff as that of a carrier and reduced such relationship to that of a warehouseman, and that the subsequent action of the terminal carrier in selling the goods was that of a warehouseman, for which, even if wrongful, the defendant railroad company is not liable under the Carmack Amendment (U. S.

Comp. St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa)—citing N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Stuart Draft Co., 109 Va. 184, 63 S. E. 415; Hogan Milling Co. v. Union Pac. R. Co., 91 Kan. 783, 139 Pac. 397; Adams Express Co. v. Croninger, 226 U. S. 491, 506, 507, 33 Sup. Ct. 148, 57 L. Ed. 314, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 257; Adams v. Great Western R. Co., 181 Iowa, 1052, 165 N. W. 387, L. R. A. 1918B, 622.

[5] The law is unquestionably settled, as appears from these authorities, that the Carmack Amendment does not make the initial carrier liable for a loss of or injury to goods proximately caused by the conduct of the succeeding carrier while occupying the relationship of warehouseman; and if, in the instant case, prior to July 28th, when possession of the goods was delivered to another for the sale of them, the liability of the railroad company as carrier had ceased—I. e., its relationship to the plaintiff as carrier had ceased—and the relationship of the terminal carrier to the plaintiff had become that of a warehouseman, it is unquestionably true that said amendment is not applicable to the case in so far as the damages occasioned the plaintiff by the sale of the goods by the terminal carrier is concerned. In such case the chain between the original negligence as carrier, in delaying the transportation, and the total loss sustained by the plaintiff, would be broken, and the wrongful conduct of the terminal carrier in selling the goods would lose its character of being a mere incident to the original wrong and become itself the proximate cause of a part at least of the injury to the plaintiff, so that the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover in this action the whole of the damages claimed. But whether this is such a case depends, of course, upon whether the relationship of carrier aforesaid had terminated when the possession of the goods was delivered as aforesaid for sale, and that, therefore, is the crucial question in the case.

As said in N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Stuart Draft Co., just referred to:

"It is not infrequently a question of some nicety to determine the precise * * * time at which the liability of a railroad company as carrier ceases and that of warehouseman begins."

This, however, which is quoted with approval in the opinion of this court in the case just mentioned, is said in 6 Cyc. 455:

"The carrier remains liable until the goods have reached their destination and the consignee has had reasonable opportunity (involving notice of arrival when such notice is essential to charge him with the duty of taking the goods) to receive the goods from the carrier, and that, after the expiration of such reasonable time, the liability of the carrier, if the goods remain in his possession, is that of warehouseman only. The carrier is liable only as warehouseman after the consignee has refused to receive the goods, or while the goods are held by the carrier at the request and at the convenience of the consignee."

[8] And it must be borne in mind in the instant case that under the terms of the bill of lading the firm of De Wald & Co. was not the consignee. That firm, at the time they refused to accept delivery, at noon on July 24th, had no written order from the plaintiff authorizing the delivery to them, and hence it had no authority to refuse to accept the delivery. Therefore the so-called refusal of De Wald & Co. to accept delivery was nothing more than notice to the railroad company that they would not put themselves in a position to accept delivery by paying for the goods, and thus obtain the written order aforesaid. Theretofore De Wald & Co., as appeared from the bill of lading, was merely a conditional consignee. Thereupon the plaintiff became the unconditional consignee, and as such he was entitled to notice of the arrival of the goods, the refusal of De Wald & Co. to qualify as consignee, and a reasonable time thereafter within which to make other disposition of the goods so as to have them taken from the hands of the railroad company. A reasonable delay in delivery due to such a cause must often arise in the transportation business, and this, in reason, and in accordance with the substance of the holding of the authorities on the subject, must be regarded as within the mutual contemplation of the shipper and carrier at the time of the contract of carriage.

This brings us to the next question for our decision, and that is this:

3. Was the plaintiff given a reasonable time, between the notice to him, on the afternoon of July 24th, of the arrival of the goods at destination and the refusal of the conditional consignee to qualify as such, and the delivery by the terminal carrier of the goods to another, on July 28th, for sale, within which to make other disposition of the goods?

This is a question of fact dependent upon all of the facts and circumstances in evidence in the case. The controverted question of fact whether on receiving the notice in question the plaintiff expressly notified the railroad company "that the car in question would be handled," as the plaintiff testified he did, or "that the car had been disposed of," as Mr. Savage, a witness for the railroad company, testified, is an important one in this connection. The decision of this fact involved in this conflict of the testimony was peculiarly for the jury. The same is true of what occurred in the personal interview between the plaintiff and Mr. Savage on July 25th. The question of fact therein involved is whether the plaintiff by what he said to Mr. Savage on July 25th can be reasonably said to have justified the railroad company in receiving the impression that the plaintiff refused absolutely to give any instructions for other disposition of the shipment, and abandoned it to the railroad company to handle it. Then there is the statement in the letter of August 28th of the claim agent at Portsmouth of the terminal carrier, saying:

"We immediately handled with the agent of the NYP&NRR at Cape Charles and wrote you direct, requesting disposition, before disposal orders could be obtained, then shipment began to deteriorate and I found it necessary to turn over to McCullough Bros. for handling, in order that the shipment might not become worthless * * *"

—which tended to show that the railroad company never received the impression that the plaintiff had refused to give instructions for disposition, but knew from what plaintiff told Mr. Savage on July 24th that he was at work endeavoring to make other disposition which was to be expected to be made as soon as reasonably possible, and that the terminal carrier decided to sell the goods, not because the plaintiff refused or failed to give other disposition instructions, but because of a different reason altogether, namely, because, as alleged in said letter, the "shipment began to deteriorate, and I found it necessary to turn over to McCullough Bros. for handling, in order that the shipment might not become worthless." This is a self-serving declaration long after the sale of the goods. It is not supported by a scintilla of evidence in the record. The witnesses who saw the potatoes in Atlanta make no mention of any deterioration in them, and the other testimony on the subject which was introduced in behalf of the railroad company gives as the sole reason for the low prices of potatoes in Atlanta after July 22d and 23d the general fall in prices, all as set out in the statement preceding this opinion. And there are other circumstances, which are set out in the statement just referred to, and hence, need not be repeated here, which tend to show that the railroad company did not give the plaintiff the reasonable time in question, and, indeed, did not itself act upon the supposition that it had done so.

Moreover, it should be said on this subject that so long as the railroad company continued to occupy the relationship of carrier to the plaintiff, any deterioration in the goods due to the delay in delivery was in truth proximately caused by the negligent delay of the carrier, and the carrier could not sell the goods because of such deterioration so as to escape liability for the result of such antecedent delay, and its sale of the goods because of such deterioration could only have been in recognition of such liability and in mitigation of the damages. And as appears from said letter, in the light of the testimony in the case, the sale was in fact made by the terminal carrier merely in apprehension of such deterioration and for the purpose of mitigating the damages.

[7] We are of opinion, therefore, that there was ample evidence before the jury to support their verdict in finding that the reasonable time in question was not given, and hence that the relationship of the railroad company to the plaintiff still remained that of carrier at the time the potatoes were delivered over for sale as aforesaid.

It follows from this conclusion that the delay in transportation aforesaid was the proximate cause of the loss and damage suffered by the plaintiff, and the railroad company is liable therefor if the facts were that such delay was due to the negligence of the railroad company or of said terminal carrier (which is a conclusion of law if it was an unreasonable delay), and that such delay was the occasion of the loss of the sale to De Wald & Co.

This brings us to the next question before us for our decision, namely:

[8] 4. Is there sufficient evidence in the record to support the verdict of the jury, which found, in effect, that there was unreasonable delay in the transportation of the goods, and that that delay was the occasion of the loss of the sale by the plaintiff to De Wald & Co., or is that finding contrary to the evidence?

In the case of Norfolk Truckers' Ex. v. Norfolk Co., supra, 116 Va. 468, 82 S. E. 92, the transportation was from Herbert's, Va., to Johnstown, Pa. The shipment was delayed in transit eight days beyond the usual period required for such transportation. Such delay in the instant case was, it is true, only four days. But otherwise the evidence in the Norfolk Truckers' Ex. Case was much weaker than in that now before us to sustain the verdict of the jury for the plaintiff.

[9] As said of the transportation of inanimate goods in 10 C. J. § 420 (2), p. 301:

"* * * When evidence of unusual delay is adduced, a prima facie case of negligence is made out, and the burden then devolves on the carrier to explain the delay and to show that it arose from some cause other than the carrier's negligence or that of its agents or servants."

We deem it sufficient to say in conclusion upon the subject under consideration that the material evidence bearing thereon and the lack of evidence adduced by the railroad company in explanation of the unusual delay, at least while the shipment was in the hands of the terminal carrier, appears from the statement preceding this opinion; and we must hold, as we held in the Norfolk Truckers' Ex. Case, supra, 116 Va. at page 471, 82 S. E. 94, that—

"In view of the established facts and the reasonable inferences to be drawn from them, it cannot be said that the jury were without evidence to support their conclusion that there had been unreasonable delay in the carriage and delivery of the potatoes, and that such delay was the occasion of the [conditional] consignee's refusal to accept the shipment; nor can it be said that the verdict found was a plain deviation from right and justice."

There remains but one other question for our decision, and that is the following:

[10] 5. Is the verdict of the jury invalid because it estimated the damages on the basis of the price the plaintiff was to receive under the contract of sale to De Wald & Co., plus the other proximate damage, consisting in this case in loss of interest, instead of following the general rule that the measure of damages for loss of the entire value of goods occasioned by delay in the transportation of them is the market value of the goods at the place of destination at the time when the delivery of them should have been made, plus the other proximate damage, consisting in this case in loss of interest?

This question must be answered in the negative.

There is the following stipulation in the bill of lading in the instant case, namely:

"The amount of any loss or damage for which any carrier is liable shall be computed on the basis of the value of the property at the place and time of shipment under this bill of lading, including the freight charges, if paid."

This value has been construed by the courts to mean the invoice price at which the goods are sold at the time and place of shipment, with freight added to the place of destination, if paid. Kelly v. Southern Railway, 84 S. C. 249, 66 S. E. 198, 137 Am. St. Rep. 842.

While such stipulation might not be valid under the Cummins Amendment of 1915 (Fed. Stat. Ann. 1916, Supp. pp. 124, 125 [U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8592, 8604a]) as against the shipper where there has been no such sale, or where such sale is defeated by the action of the carrier, and it appears in evidence that the stipulated value is less than the market value at destination at the time the goods should have there arrived, and the shipper seeks to recover such market value, no such case is presented by the record before us. And such stipulation, with the construction placed upon it aforesaid, is certainly valid under the circumstances of the instant case, for in such case, in the absence of any stipulation on the subject, the law would fix the same measure of damages.

As said in 10 C. J. § 611 (4) p. 399:

"Where goods are shipped in pursuance of a sale thereof at a stipulated price which is less than the market price at destination, damages for loss or injury must be estimated on the basis of the price to be received under the contract of sale. But, if the price contracted for is greater than the market value at destination, the estimate will have to be based on the market value, unless the carrier had been notified at the time of the shipment of the fact that the goods had been sold for a higher figure."

In the instant case the stipulated price at which the goods were sold to De Wald & Co.

at the time and place of shipment was much less than the market price at destination from July 16th to July 24th, inclusive; so that the market price at destination when the goods should have arrived was greater than the stipulated selling price, plus the freight, as appears in evidence.

The case will be
Affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

[11] It is urged in the petition for rehearing that the court has not given legal effect to the clause in the bill of lading involved in the case which is as follows:

"Property not removed by the party entitled to receive it within forty-eight hours (exclusive of legal holidays) after notice of its arrival has been duly sent or given may be kept in car, depot, or place of delivery of the carrier, or warehouseman, subject to a reasonable charge for storage and to carrier's responsibility as warehouseman only." (Italics supplied.)

It is argued that this identical provision in a bill of lading was held valid and binding in the case of Southern Railway Co. v. Prescott, 240 U. S. 632, 36 Sup. Ct. 469, 60 L. Ed. 836, and that therefore it should be held by us as fixing the character of the liability of the terminal carrier in this case as that of a warehouseman after the expiration of 48 hours after both Chandler and De Wald were notified of the arrival of the goods at destination. And the discussion by the Interstate Commerce Commission, in the Matter of Bills of Lading, decided April 14, 1919, 52 Interst. Com. Com'n R., 671, at pages 696, 700, 701, and 712, is also relied upon. But neither the Supreme Court decision nor the discussion of the Interstate Commerce Commission referred to sustains the position that the clause in the bill of lading in question is applicable or binding in cases of interstate shipments, when the relationship of shipper and carrier has not been terminated by the expiration of a reasonable time for the removal of the goods after the giving of the notice to the party entitled to receive them.

In the Prescott Case it developed in evidence on the trial that the consignee accepted the goods, took away a portion of them, and left the residue merely for his convenience until he could call for them, and, as stated in the opinion of the court:

"At the close of the testimony the plaintiff withdrew his causes of action against the defendant as a common carrier * * * and the case went to the jury solely with respect to the liability of the defendant as warehouseman."

The loss in the case was occasioned by fire while the goods remained in the custody of the railroad company in the admitted capacity of warehouseman. And, as clearly appears from the opinion of the court in the Prescott Case, and from what is said with respect to that case and other cases by the Interstate Commerce Commission in its report in the Matter of Bills of Lading, 52 Interst. Com. Com'n R. at pages 696 to 700, inclusive (referred to at page 712), the Prescott Case has not changed the established rule that when the goods are not accepted, the liability of the carrier, as carrier, under the Carmack Amendment, does not cease until the expiration of a reasonable time for the removal of the goods after the giving of the notice to the party entitled to receive them. And the Interstate Commerce Commission in its said report unquestionably recognizes that such rule was in force as late as April 14, 1919, unaffected by the clause in bills of lading which is drawn in question in the case before us, notwithstanding the Prescott Case, which is expressly referred to and discussed in such report.

Moreover, the Carmack Amendment, as amended by the first Cummins Amendment, which latter was approved March 4, 1915, and was in force when the cause of action in the instant case arose, expressly provides that the liability of the carrier, as carrier, imposed by the statute, should exist—

"notwithstanding any limitation of liability * * * in any * * * receipt or bill of lading, or in * * * any tariff filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission; and any such limitation, without respect to the manner or form in which it is sought to be made, is hereby declared to be unlawful and void."

Therefore, even if the clause in the bill of lading in question were to be construed as attempting to fix the arbitrary limit of time therein mentioned as the time within which the relationship of shipper and carrier may be terminated by the notice prescribed therein, it would be void, under the provision of the statute just quoted, in all cases in which, under the facts of the particular case, such time is found not to be the reasonable time aforesaid.

There is but one other ground for a rehearing urged in the petition therefor, and that is to the effect that the distinction made in the original opinion between the bill of lading involved in the case and an ordinary order notify bill of lading is unsound. The distinction referred to is, as we think, a sound distinction as bearing upon the ascertainment of "the party entitled to receive" the goods as consignee. No reason is suggested why we should consider our conclusion unsound on that subject, and we see none.

The petition for rehearing will therefore be Refused.

SMITH v. WITHROW.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. April 6, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error §525(1), 528(4) — Instruction or affidavits must be included in the record, to be available on appeal.

Matters, such as instructions or affidavits used on new trial, if sought to be availed of on appeal, must be made parts of the record by proper bills of exceptions.

2. Appeal and error §933(5) — Presumed that affidavits not in record on which new trial was ordered were sufficient.

In the absence of affidavits on which the trial court relied in setting aside the jury's verdict, this court must presume that the verdict was properly set aside, and where the plaintiff tendered no evidence on the second trial the final judgment of the court therein must be affirmed.

3. Appeal and error §706(3) — Matter depending on affidavits cannot be reviewed in their absence.

A complaint that a verdict on a first trial should not have been set aside, save as to the recovery for personal injuries to which the affidavits for new trial related, cannot be reviewed, in the absence of such affidavits.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Newport News.

Action by G. W. Smith against C. S. Withrow. Verdict for plaintiff, motion for new trial sustained, judgment on second trial for the defendant, and the plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

T. J. Christian, of Newport News, for plaintiff in error.

Lett & Massie, of Newport News, for defendant in error.

SAUNDERS, J. The following facts are revealed by the record in this case:

The plaintiff in error, an old man named Smith, owns a small truck farm a few miles north of the city of Newport News. Returning to his farm from that city on the night of May 17, 1919, accompanied by his wife, and driving slowly on the right-hand side of the road, he was run into from the rear by an automobile belonging to Claude S. Withrow, the defendant in error. Hereinafter the parties will be referred to, respectively, as the plaintiff and the defendant.

The impact of the automobile knocked Smith out of his wagon, injured his horse, so that he died in a few days, and damaged the vehicle. After making some ineffectual efforts to effect a settlement with the owner of the car, Smith brought an action of trespass against the latter in the circuit court of the city of Newport News for personal injuries received and damage to his property, and secured a verdict for $500.

The defendant moved to set the verdict aside on the ground that it was contrary to the law and the evidence, and on the further ground of after-discovered evidence. The court overruled the motion on the first ground, and deferred the disposition of the motion on the second ground until the following day. On that day the defendant tendered four affidavits in support of his motion last made. These affidavits were received and ordered to be filed. Thereupon, after argument, the court sustained the defendant's motion on the ground last above stated, set aside the verdict, and ordered a new trial. To this action of the court the plaintiff excepted.

The case was called for trial at the January term, 1920, of the circuit court, and, the plaintiff declining to introduce any evidence, it was considered by the court that the—"plaintiff should take nothing by his writ, and that the defendant should go thereof without day."

The plaintiff applied for and secured a writ of error and supersedeas from one of the judges of this court.

[1] The evidence submitted on the first trial of the case was duly put in the record by a proper bill of exceptions; but the plaintiff failed to make the affidavits tendered by the defendant a part of the record. Plaintiff's bill of exception No. 2, erroneously referred to in the record as defendant's bill, merely excepts to the action of the court in setting aside the verdict, and prays that his bill of exceptions may be signed, sealed, etc. Of course, matter such as instructions, or affidavits, if sought to be availed of in this court, must be made parts of the record by proper bills of exception. There is no need to cite authority for this pronouncement, but a very recent case to this effect is N. Y., P. & N. R. Co. v. Chandler, 106 S. E. 684.

[2] In the absence of the affidavits upon which the trial court relied when it set aside the verdict of the jury, this court must presume that such action was correct, and the verdict properly set aside. That being so, and the plaintiff tendering no evidence on the second trial, the final judgment of the court recited supra was unescapable.

[3] The plaintiff complains that the verdict on the first trial should not have been set aside, save as to the recovery for the personal injuries to which the affidavits related; but determination of this contention would require an inspection of the affidavits. These affidavits, as stated supra, are not before this court. Hence, in respect of the above contention, this court must presume that the defendant's affidavits supported the action of the trial court, and that its judgment setting aside the verdict generally was fully justified.

In the state of the record, and the situation cannot be rectified by any present action on the part of this or the trial court, nothing remains save to affirm the judgment complained of, which is accordingly done.

Affirmed.

GREAT ATLANTIC & PACIFIC TEA CO. v. COFER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. April 6, 1921.)

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨53(2) — Lessee's rights not affected by erroneous acknowledgment of receipt of subsequently returned check for rent.

A lessee's rights under lease as against innocent purchaser were not affected by the erroneous acknowledgment of receipt of lessee's subsequently returned check by employee of purchaser's agent who had been instructed not to accept check from lessee for rent.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨53(2)—Lease for two-year term with option to renew held for a term of more than five years required to be recorded.

A lease for a term of two years and one month, giving lessee the option to four successive renewals of the lease each for a term of one year, held a "contract of a term of more than five years," within Code 1904, §§ 2463, 2465, making such a contract void as to purchasers for a valuable consideration without notice, unless recorded.

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨53(2)—Purchaser's acceptance of rent without knowledge of right to renew not ratification of renewal contract.

Acceptance by lessor's grantee of rent from lessee with knowledge that lease provided for a term of two years and one month, but without knowledge of lessee's option to renew, did not constitute a ratification of the provisions of lease as to a right to renew.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨24(1)—Validity of lease not affected by invalid covenant for renewal.

A lease for a term of two years and one month with the privilege to lessee of four successive renewals each for a period of one year, though void as to innocent purchaser because unrecorded under Code 1904, §§ 2463, 2465, making land contract for term of five years void as against purchaser for value without notice, in that the privilege of renewal made it a contract for term of more than five years, was valid in so far as the original term of two years and one month was concerned, since a covenant for renewal may be void without impairing the original term.

5. Landlord and tenant ⇨291(16)—Whether purchaser had knowledge putting him on inquiry as to contents of lease held for jury.

In unlawful detainer action by lessor's grantee who claimed to have purchased without knowledge of the provisions of lease giving lessee the privilege of renewal, question of whether grantee, when he purchased the property, had knowledge of such fact as would have put a reasonably prudent man on inquiry as to the contents of the lease, held for the jury.

6. Vendor and purchaser ⇨229(1)—Purchaser chargeable with fact which inquiry prompted by knowledge of facts would have necessarily revealed.

Purchaser to be charged with notice of a fact must have knowledge of facts and circumstances naturally calculated to excite suspicion in the mind of a person of ordinary care and prudence as to the existence of such fact, and which would naturally cause him to pause and make an inquiry which would necessarily have resulted in the discovery of the fact.

Sims, J., dissenting.

Error to Corporation Court of Norfolk.

Action by J. H. Cofer against the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Willcox, Cooke & Willcox, of Norfolk, for plaintiff in error.

E. R. F. Wells, of Norfolk, for defendant in error.

SAUNDERS, J. This is an action of unlawful detainer brought by J. H. Cofer (defendant in error) to recover possession of certain premises on Granby street, Norfolk, Va., alleged to be unlawfully detained by the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company (plaintiff in error). The jury trying the case, after hearing the evidence and being instructed as to the law, returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, which the court refused to set aside. The case is brought before us by writ of error to the judgment of the trial court.

The plaintiff in error, the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company (defendant below and hereinafter referred to as the Tea Company), makes three assignments of error:

First. The giving of the instruction requested by the plaintiff.

Second. The refusal of four instructions requested by the defendant.

Third. The refusal of the trial court to set aside the verdict.

The pertinent facts are as follows: One J. Frank East was the owner of certain real estate on Granby street, in Norfolk. On November 24, 1917, he entered into a written lease of a portion of this property with the Tea Company. This paper, in part, was as follows:

"The said lessor has leased, and by these presents does grant, demise and lease unto the said lessee" (the Tea Company) "all that," etc. (Here follows the description of the property leased.)

"To have and to hold the same for a term of two years and one month, to begin December 1, 1917, and to end December 31, 1919, at," etc. * * *

"The lessee at its option shall be entitled to the privilege of four successive renewals of this lease, each such renewal to be for a period of one year, to be subject to all the terms and conditions of this lease. * * *

This lease was under seal but never recorded. The lessee entered and took possession of the premises under the terms and provisions of its lease. On March 28, 1919, East executed an agreement with one J. H. Cofer, subsequently the plaintiff in the aforesaid action of unlawful detainer, for the sale of his Granby street property, including that portion leased to the Tea Company. In this agreement of sale it was provided, among other things, that—

"The taxes on said property for the year 1919, and the rents from the same are to be apportioned between the parties as of the day of settlement above named" (May 1, 1919).

Cofer bought this property through one R. L. Forrest, agent of the vendor, East. The agreement of sale was consummated on May 1, 1919, on which date East and wife conveyed the property to Cofer. This conveyance contained a covenant that the grantors had done nothing to incumber the land. After completing his purchase, Cofer employed Hoggard & Co. to collect his rents. In June, 1919, Hoggard at the direction of Cofer informed the Tea Company that "its lease expired on December 31, 1919, and that it would be expected to vacate on that date." At the same time the company was advised that it could secure a further lease of the premises at $75 a month. Receiving no reply to this letter, Hoggard wrote again, asking the company if it desired a new lease on the terms submitted. In reply to this inquiry the superintendent of the Tea Company called Hoggard's attention to the fact that it had "a lease containing a clause affording the privilege of four renewals for one year each," and that under such circumstances the company "would not consider favorably the proposition to increase the rental to $75.00." This letter and the lease of the Tea Company were at once submitted to Cofer by Hoggard.

[1] In November, 1919, the company wrote to East, in care of Hoggard, that it had decided to renew its lease on the premises on Granby street for the term of one year from January 1, 1920, on the terms provided by its contract, and that it reserved its "rights with respect to the remaining three options." This letter was also submitted to Cofer. During the period of this correspondence, and for the month of December, 1919, the monthly rent due by the company was paid to and receipted for by Hoggard, the agent of Cofer. When the latter was advised that the company refused to vacate his property, and was claiming the right to hold the same under its lease, he notified his agent, Hoggard, not to accept any rent after December 31, as he proposed "to take the matter up with his attorney and make a contest." Hoggard & Co. instructed their office force not to accept any checks from the Tea Company for rent after December 31, 1919. The Tea Company sent a check for January, 1920. By mistake of a clerk in the office of Hoggard & Co., this check was accepted and a receipt therefor forwarded. The error was discovered at once, and the Tea Company so advised by letter. The check was returned uncollected, with a request for the return of the receipt. This was not done. Under the circumstances, the rights of the parties were in no wise affected by the erroneous acknowledgment of receipt of the subsequently returned check.

The Tea Company refusing to surrender Cofer's property, the latter brought an action of unlawful detainer on January 12, 1920, to recover the same. Upon the trial of the issue the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, which the trial court declined to set aside.

The plaintiff in error complains of the following instruction given at the instance of the plaintiff:

"The court instructs the jury that under the law the lease offered in evidence should have been recorded, and is void as to J. A. Cofer, unless they believe from the evidence that at the time of his purchase he had knowledge of such facts which would put a reasonably prudent man on inquiry as to its terms."

The plaintiff in error objects to that portion of this instruction which tells the jury that the lease should have been recorded, contending that it is in conflict with James v. Kibler, 94 Va. 165, 28 S. E. 417, and Marks v. Gorla Bros., 121 Va. 491, 504, 93 S. E. 675.

In view of this contention, a critical examination has been made of the cases cited, and of the contract of lease in issue. It will be noted that this contract, which has been cited supra makes in part an actual demise of the premises for a term of two years and one month, to end December 31, 1919, and in further part provides that the lessee, at its option, shall be entitled to the privilege of "four successive renewals of the lease." Each of such renewals was to be subject to all the terms and conditions of the lease. Hence this instrument achieves a double purpose: First, it affords a distinct and complete demise of the premises for a term of two years and a month; second, it relates to and provides for, at the option of the lessee, an extension of the term of the demise.

Sections 2465 and 2463 of the Code of 1904, read together, provide that every contract in writing for the conveyance, or sale of real estate, or of a term therein of more than five years, shall be void both at law and in equity, as to purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, until and except from the time that it is duly admitted to record.

The right of the lessee in this case to hold his actual demise against the purchaser is not challenged; but the former essays to hold beyond the term of this demise. The contract provides the means by which the lessee at his option can extend the term of the demise so that the maximum aggregate of the term and the extensions will be six years and one month. In that respect, the contract is one for a term in real estate of more than five years. But a contract for such a term, as we have noted, supra, is required to be recorded to protect the lessee against purchasers for value without notice.

In James v. Kibler, supra, the question for decision was whether a written paper making a lease for five years, with an option for the lessee to continue for another five years, was a present lease for ten years. Obviously it was not, and the court so held. A contract for a lease, and an actual present demise, are essentially different. Judge Harrison notes this distinction in James v. Kibler, when he declares that—

"A mere covenant to renew a term, at the option of the lessee, is not an actual renting for a longer period than the term specified."

Hence the paper under consideration is not a lease for more than two years and one month, by virtue of the authority of James v. Kibler; but it constitutes a contract binding on the lessor, under which the lessee can hold the leased premises for an aggregate in excess of five years. The question may well be asked: If this is not a contract for a term of more than five years in real estate, what is it?

The case of Toupin v. Peabody, 162 Mass. 473, 39 N. E. 280, is very similar in its facts to the case in judgment. The owner of the property in that case leased it to one Toupin for a term of five years, with the privilege of a further term of five years. This instrument was not recorded. Thereafter he sold the property to Peabody. A contest arose between the latter and Toupin over the possession of the premises. The question presented for decision was the effect of the provision furnishing the privilege of renewal. Under the Massachusetts law, a present term of seven years or less is good without recordation, but an instrument providing for a term in excess of seven years is required to be recorded. The court held as follows:

"It is enough for the purposes of this case to hold that as to any extension, or second term, or agreement for renewal, which will carry the possession of the lessee to more than seven years from the making of the instrument, every instrument which confers an estate for years is within the meaning of the statute. The instrument on which the plaintiff relies was of this nature, and so far as it purported to give him the right to a second term of five years, it was invalid as against a purchaser without actual notice."

[2] Analyzing the indenture in the instant case, it is perceived to be a contract by which the lessor has definitely parted with the control of his property for the full period to which the instrument relates. Hence we conclude that this paper is a single contract giving the lessee a demise and four options, and is not four several contracts of option as contended by the defendant. But a contract which provides an actual demise of real estate for two years, and one month, and the means by which the lessee's enjoyment and possession of the premises can be extended for four years more, is certainly a contract for a term of more than five years in real estate and, as against a subsequent purchaser for value and without notice, must be recorded. The case cited ubi supra supports this conclusion. The first assignment of error is not considered to be well taken.

The second assignment of error is the refusal of the court to give four instructions submitted by the defendant.

The first of these instructions is the converse of the instruction just considered; hence, if that was correct, its converse was not, and was properly rejected by the court.

Instruction No. 3 as tendered is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that even if the plaintiff did not have notice of the defendant's lease, yet if they believe from the evidence that he ratified it after he did know of it, they must find for the defendant. Acceptance of rent after notice is a sufficient ratification. Notice to the agent of the plaintiff is notice to him."

[3, 4] This seems to be, abstractly speaking, a correct pronouncement of law; but upon the evidence in the instant case, it was correctly refused. There is no evidence whatever that the plaintiff ratified the lease as a whole after knowledge of its existence. Nor did his acceptance, after notice, of rent for the remainder of the term constitute a ratification. Plaintiff was aware at the date of his deed that the defendant had a lease expiring December 31, 1919. It was a part of his contract of purchase that he was to receive the rents under this demise from May 1, 1919, to the end of the year. This demise was good against the purchaser whether the contract for the term of six years and one month was sustained, or not. Hence, in accepting rent under the demise, the purchaser did not validate the six-year contract. As soon as Cofer was advised of the defendant's claim that it could hold the property beyond December 31, and proposed to do so, he advised his agents that he intended to resist this claim, and not to receive any rent beyond December, 1919. He had already, of date June 14, 1919, advised the Tea Company that their lease would expire at midnight December 31, at which time they were expected to vacate the premises, unless a new lease was effected. Under these circumstances, the receipt of rent for the balance of the year, 1919, did not ratify defendant's lease as a whole, and establish its claim to a six-year term. The Massachusetts court, in the case of Toupin v. Peabody, supra, declined to decide whether an instrument making a present demise for a term of less than seven years, and providing for a further term which with the present demise would exceed seven years from the making of the instrument, would be wholly void as to a bona fide purchaser, without actual notice, or whether it might be good for the demise of less than seven years. This same question arises in the instant case, since the contract makes a present demise for a term of two years and a month, and provides for a further term; the aggregate being in excess of five years. The demise for two years should not be considered void. It is only when the lessee, using that demise and the provision for renewals in conjunction, asserts a right to a term of years in the premises in excess of five years, that his contract is required to be recorded to be effective against a purchaser for value. If not recorded, then with respect only to his claim for a term greater than five years should the contract be considered as avoided as to such a purchaser. This view of the contract strengthens our conclusion that acceptance of rent for the present term which the contract provided did not establish the defendant's right to the renewals, and relieve it from the necessity of recording the instrument under which it claimed. This was the conclusion of the trial court, as appears from its written opinion, and in that conclusion we find no error.

Instruction No. 5, of the rejected instructions, is in these words:

"The court instructs the jury that a tenant who enters, or holds possession of property under a void lease is a tenant at will until he pays and the owner accepts payment of rent. In this case, if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff had no notice of the defendant's lease when he acquired title, but accepted rent from it for an aliquot part of a year, then the defendant became a tenant from year to year, and they must find for the defendant."

From the conclusion announced, supra, it follows that the lessee neither entered, nor held under a void lease. Both parties operated under a demise that was valid. They collided, so to say, over another claim of the defendant, to wit, his claim to a term in excess of five years. In that respect it is considered that the indenture of leasing is required to be recorded to be good against a purchaser without notice. A covenant for renewal may be void, and therefore fall, without impairing the original term. Gear on Landlord & Tenant, par. 102; Hart v. Hart, 22 Barb. (N. Y.) 806.

Instruction No. 5 was properly refused.

The last of the rejected instructions is No. 4, which is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff had actual knowledge at the time he purchased the property that the defendant had a lease for a portion of it, then he is charged with constructive knowledge of all the terms and conditions of said lease, and they must find for the defendant."

This instruction will be considered in connection with the third assignment of error, to wit, the refusal of the court to set aside the verdict, and also with the concluding sentence of the instruction actually given, namely, that the defendant's lease was void as to Cofer, unless the jury believed "from the evidence that at the time of his purchase he (Cofer) had knowledge of such facts as would have put a reasonably prudent man on inquiry as to its terms." At this point we encounter the most troublesome feature of this case. Cofer did make certain inquiries, and ascertained that the defendant had an actual lease which expired on December 31, 1919. A very pertinent query is: Could Cofer conclude his investigations at this point, complete his purchase, and be safe, or was he required to prosecute further inquiries, and failing to prosecute them, is he to be charged with the knowledge that such further inquiries might have afforded? It may be well before proceeding further to collate from the record precisely what Cofer did and what he learned before completing his purchase.

Cofer purchased the property in controversy of East, through the latter's representative, Forrest, about April 1, 1919, giving $40,000 therefor. He had the title examined by a Norfolk attorney, who "reported a clear title, no exceptions made whatever." Cofer states that he knew the Tea Company was a "tenant of the property at the time he made his purchase, but that he did not consult with it, or its representatives, that it was not necessary."

Extracts from Cofer's testimony:

"Q. What notice did you have that any of this property had been rented?

"A. When Mr. Forrest brought this property to me to purchase, representing Mr. East, the owner of the property, I very naturally asked Mr. Forrest what the rentals were, and also how long the places were rented for. Mr. Forrest is a reputable— * * *

"Witness: When Mr. Forrest brought the property to me, I became interested in it, and the first question was with reference to the revenue and the tenants. Mr. Forrest is a reputable real estate man. I have had a number of dealings with him, and I have never yet had occasion to question any statement he made. I naturally assumed Mr. Forrest had given the information, and I took for granted that his statements were correct, and based on his statements of fact, I purchased the property.

"Q. What were his statements?

"A. To the effect that the revenue from the property was approximately $200 a month, and that all the leases expired approximately at the same time as of December 31, this past year. He was very positive of that, and I would not have acquired the property had I not known it.

"Q. Now, Mr. Cofer, Mr. Willcox has asked some questions here, the object of which was to develop some custom here in Norfolk. I will ask you this: Is it customary in this city, when a reputable real estate agent who represents the owner of the property tells you that there is a short time tenancy on the property, for the purchaser to go to the tenant and ask to see his lease?

"A. It is not customary. It would be rather out of place, I think.

"Q. Did you accept Mr. Forrest's statements as true?

"A. Absolutely, because he had investigated the matter at my request, and reported back to me, and I accepted his statements as final.

"Q. For whom was Mr. Forrest acting at the time?

"A. Mr. J. F. East, the owner of the property. If Mr. Forrest had told me there was a long time lease on the property, I would have demanded to see the lease. He told me the lease expired on January 1st, which was eight months after I purchased the property.

"Q. Have you stated all the information you had with reference to the tenancy of the property?

"A. Absolutely, which came through Mr. R. L. Forrest, the agent for Mr. East.

"Cross-Examination.

"Q. You stated it is not customary to go back of the representations of the real estate agents as to leases.

"A. Not unless they are long-time leases. If they are long-time leases, it is customary to call for a copy of the lease.

"Q. I am speaking of whether it is necessary to determine the—is it customary to rely on what the real estate agent tells you?

"A. I have been dealing in real estate for 20 years, and when a reputable man tells me when it expires, I take his word for it. If it had been a long-time lease, I would have asked to see the lease.

"Q. You say the custom; that is what you do?

"A. I don't know the custom of others."

Mr. Forrest, who was examined as a witness, confirms the testimony of Cofer in the above particulars. The following questions and answers are taken from his testimony:

"Q. From what source did you get your information?

"A. I got my information, as well as I can recollect, from Capt. East. I do recall it took me some little while to find out what the rents were. I think he referred me to Mr. Hoggard, or said Hoggard could give them to me. I am sure I got my information from Capt. East, and not from Hoggard. I don't think Hoggard told me anything about the lease or about the rent. I think it finally resulted in Capt. East giving me the information.

"Q. You never saw any written lease, did you?

"A. No, I never saw any written lease.

"Q. And you did not know anything about it except the information that you had gotten from Capt. East, or Hoggard, and passed it on to Mr. Cofer?

"A. That is all. I didn't have any conversation or communication with the defendant in any way at all. * * *

"Redirect-Examination.

"Q. You have sold, as Mr. Willcox says, considerable real estate; is it customary in this city for a purchaser, when he is informed by a reputable real estate agent that there are leases on the place which expire with the current year, to demand to see those leases in advance of the purchase?

"A. He might or might not. I never made any practice in selling Granby street property to run around with the leases.

"Q. Is it customary to demand to see the leases where they expire the current year?

"A. As a general thing, I would say, no."

Mr. Cofer also states that when he purchased the property, paid his money, and executed his notes, he had no knowledge of any written lease. This knowledge came to him later in the year, about August 1, 1919, according to the testimony of H. C. Hoggard.

The deed of May 1, 1919, of East and wife to Cofer, covenants that the grantors had done no act to incumber the land conveyed. It also appears from the record that the general custom with respect to Granby Street property was to lease the same by written lease.

[5] The contention of the plaintiff in error is that upon the state of facts appearing in the record, and substantially stated supra, Cofer should have pursued his inquiries, and therefore is chargeable as a matter of law with knowledge of the renewal provision of the written lease. The instruction given properly remitted to the jury the determination whether, or not, Cofer when he purchased the property had knowledge of such facts as would have put a reasonably prudent man on inquiry as to the contents of the lease. The jury found in favor of Cofer, and there is no reason to disturb their verdict.

This court has considered in a number of cases the doctrine of notice and inquiry. In the nature of things, each case of this character must be decided on its own facts. No standard can be established, or rule promulgated in advance, which will be readily applicable to, and without difficulty decisive of, all subsequently arising cases. The general conclusions announced by this and other courts under this head must be reasonably and intelligently applied by the court, or jury trying the case, to the facts under consideration, and a conclusion reached on the merits.

In the case of McClanachan v. Siter, Price & Co., 2 Grat. (43 Va.) 280, 813, this court said:

"The doctrine that whatever puts a party upon inquiry amounts to notice, is inapplicable to the provisions of the statute in regard both to registered and unregistered conveyances. The registry is not intended to put subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers upon inquiry, but to put an end to the necessity of all inquiry. It is notice in point of law to all persons of the contents, import and legal effect of the registered instrument; but not of other matters connected with the subject not apparent upon the face of the instrument. The statute contrasts this notice in point of law of registered conveyances with notice in point of fact of unregistered conveyances, and by fair construction, with notice in point of fact of any title or claim, not disclosed by a registered instrument. The notice in point of fact must be such as to affect the conscience of the subsequent purchaser, or incumbrancer. It may be either actual, in other words direct and positive, or it may be circumstantial and presumptive. But it is not sufficient if it merely puts the party upon inquiry. It must be so strong and clear as to fix upon him the imputation of mala fides."

This question of notice is very ably discussed in the case of Fischer v. Lee, 98 Va. 159 et seq., 35 S. E. 441, and the clear general rule that constructive notice imposes upon a purchaser such inquiry as is suggested by the facts which are known or disclosed in the transaction is fully sustained. There must be something more than the possibility that inquiry will disclose other facts inconsistent with, or in addition to those already revealed. In the course of the opinion (98 Va. 165, 35 S. E. 442), Judge Rieley says:

"It was contended, however, that the duty of inquiry would not stop at insolvency, but required that the pledgees should inquire whether the property proposed to be pledged was paid for, and that this would have led to the discovery that the pianos had not been paid for, and to the further discovery of the fraud committed in their purchase. The law of constructive notice does not impose on a purchaser such latitudinous inquiry upon mere knowledge that his vendor is in greatly embarrassed circumstances, or even that he is insolvent. It only imposes upon a purchaser such inquiry as is suggested by the facts which are known or disclosed in the transaction. There must be such a connection between the facts disclosed and the further facts to be discovered upon inquiry that the former may be said to furnish a reasonable and natural clue to the latter. To go beyond this would extend the doctrine of constructive notice beyond the limit it has been carried by the courts, and would, especially in the case of personal property, unduly hamper and embarrass its transfer, and interfere with the freedom of trade."

[8] But to affect a party with notice of the fact with which he is sought to be charged, whether he made inquiry or not, he must have had knowledge of facts and circumstances naturally calculated to excite suspicion in the mind of a person of ordinary care and prudence, and which would naturally prompt him to pause and inquire before consummating the transaction. Moreover, discovery of the fact should necessarily follow from the inquiry once embarked upon.

See, also, the case of Arbuckle v. Gates & Brown, 95 Va. 802, 30 S. E. 496, in which the evidence showed that the trustee in a deed of trust to secure creditors, knew that there was some agreement between his grantors and Arbuckle Bros., and had seen the paper itself, though he was in doubt whether he had seen it before, or after the assignment. The court held:

"We are of opinion that the evidence falls short of that clearness that would affect the conscience of Boudar, trustee, and fix upon him the imputation of mala fides, and that he must be held to be a purchaser for value without notice." 95 Va. 814, 30 S. E. 500.

The same question of the duty of further inquiry upon limited knowledge of a transaction, and of the effect of failure to make this inquiry, arose in the case of Toupin v. Peabody, cited supra. In that case the contract of lease made an actual demise for five years, with an option of renewal for a further term of five years. To secure the benefit of the additional term, it was held that the instrument must be recorded. When Peabody purchased the property, he was aware that the same had been leased, but was advised that the lease was not in writing, nor was he aware of the renewal privilege. The lessee insisted that upon the facts Peabody was charged with knowledge of the terms of the lease and was bound by the renewal clause. The court held that—

"The fact that a purchaser of land knew that plaintiff was in possession, as a tenant, was not sufficient to affect him with notice of the terms of plaintiff's unrecorded lease, he being informed that it was not a written one, and it being such a lease as is declared by statute invalid as to a purchaser of the land unless recorded."

See, also, Crane's Nest Coal & Coke Co. v. Virginia Iron, etc., Co., 108 Va. 862, 868, 869, 62 S. E. 954, 1119.

Plaintiff in error cites two cases from other jurisdictions in support of his contention that the plaintiff was charged with knowledge of the renewal feature of defendant's lease. These cases are Jared v. Clements, 1 Ch. Div. 428, an English case, and Leominster Gas Light Co. v. Hillery, 197 Mass. 267, 83 N. E. 870, a Massachusetts case. In the first case a party, while negotiating for a piece of property, obtained actual knowledge of an unrecorded mortgage on same. He gave notice that this mortgage must be discharged. On the day of settlement the vendor produced the original mortgage, and a receipt for the discharge of same, purporting to be signed by the mortgagee. Later it developed that this receipt was forged. The purchaser, however, accepted the receipt as genuine, and bought the property. Later, on discovery of the fraud, the purchaser insisted that the property was relieved from liability on the ground that he had used due diligence to have the debt discharged. The court held otherwise. Obviously this case is not the case in judgment. The purchaser had actual knowledge of the contents of the incumbrance, and gave notice that the debt must be discharged. Thereafter he proceeded at his peril. Due diligence on his part to see that the mortgage was discharged did not pay off the mortgagee's debt, and until that was an accomplished fact, the secured creditor who was in no wise at fault was entitled to the benefit of his security. This in effect is the court's decision. The following is taken from the syllabus:

"A purchaser who, before completion of his purchase, received actual notice of an outstanding equitable interest must, in order to secure a good title from his vendor, take care to see that such interest is got in or destroyed. If he chooses to complete in reliance upon the assurances of the vendor, or the vendor's solicitor, that the interest has been got in, or destroyed, he does so at his own risk, if it turns out that the interest is still outstanding."

If Cofer had had actual notice of the contents of defendant's lease, and upon assurances from his vendor, later proven to be false, that the company for value had waived its right to the renewals, had proceeded to consummate the purchase, the case cited and the case in judgment would be alike upon the facts.

In the Massachusetts case, a vendee took property under a deed containing this provision:

"Said premises are sold subject to a mortgage of $16,500 to the Leominster Savings Bank; * * * also a lease of part of the premises to the Leominster Gaslight Company and a lease of a part of the premises to H. Bicknell & Co."

The lease of the Gaslight Company was for a term of five years, with a right of renewal for a further period of five years. This lease was not recorded. The purchaser of the property notified the lessee to vacate at the end of the first term. This the lessee declined to do and insisted upon his right of renewal. The court held that inasmuch as the purchaser took expressly subject to the lease, his rights were "subordinate to the plaintiff's rights under the lease." Again the facts of the instant case and the case cited are materially different. Cofer did not purchase subject to defendant's lease, or any other lease. His deed expressly states that the "grantee shall have quiet possession free from all incumbrances; and that the parties of the first part have done no act to encumber the land." The defendant having failed to secure absolute protection against subsequent purchasers, by expending a few dollars and conforming to the registry laws of Virginia, seeks to relieve itself from the effect of its failure in that respect, and find protection for its interests in the alleged omissions of the plaintiff. So long as the latter is free of the imputation of mala fides, he is safe, even though further investigation might have revealed facts of which he was wholly unaware, and which once revealed would completely alter his status. Using the language of Judge Riely in Fischer v. Lee, supra, it was incumbent upon Cofer, the purchaser, to "make the inquiry suggested by the facts disclosed." To fix liability for a failure to prosecute additional inquiries, there should "be such a connection between the facts disclosed and the further facts to be discovered upon inquiry, that the former may be said to furnish a reasonable and natural clue to the latter." Cofer was aware: (a) That the defendant had a short time lease on the premises proposed to be purchased; (b) that this lease expired on December 31, 1919; (c) that there were no recorded liens against the property; (d) that the lease probably was in writing; (e) that the vendor had covenanted that he had done nothing to incumber the land; (c) that it was not customary for a purchaser who has been informed by a reputable real estate dealer of a short time lease, expiring with the current year, to ask to see the lease. There was nothing in these facts to furnish a reasonable and natural clue to the renewals contained in a brief paragraph in the elaborate signed, sealed, and duly acknowledged indenture in the hands of the defendant, or to fix upon the plaintiff the imputation of mala fides for failure to definitely ascertain that the lease was in writing, demand its production, and examine its contents, before completing his purchase. Further, this case was submitted to a local jury with an instruction which, in effect, advised them that if they believed from the evidence that at the time of his purchase Cofer had knowledge of facts which would have put a reasonably prudent man on inquiry as to the terms of the lease offered in evidence, they should find for the defendant. The jury upon the facts found for the plaintiff. It cannot be said that this verdict was without evidence to support it, or plainly wrong.

We find no error in this case, and the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

Affirmed.

SIMS, J. (dissenting). In the case of Toupin v. Peabody, 162 Mass. 473, 89 N. E. 280, referred to in the majority opinion, the unrecorded lease was in writing for a term of five years, with a covenant therein that the "lessee is to have the privilege of renewing this lease upon the same terms for the further term of five years." Before the first term expired, the lessor conveyed the premises to a bona fide purchaser without notice of the written lease. The suit was by the lessee, by bill in equity, against the purchaser to compel specific performance of the covenant for renewal in the lease.

The statute involved, so far as material, was as follows:

"A conveyance of an estate in fee simple, fee tail, or for life, or a lease for more than seven years from the making thereof, shall not be valid as against any person other than the grantor or lessor and his heirs and devisees, and persons having actual notice of it, unless it is recorded, * * * etc.

The relief sought in that case would, if granted, have given the lessee tenant for years a longer holding than seven years from the making of the lease, to wit, a holding of ten years. The case does not involve the question whether a lease for a less term than seven years, with the privilege to the lessee of yearly renewals thereafter, extending on beyond the seven years, would or would not be valid for terms which together would not exceed the period of seven years from the making of it.

In the opinion of the court in that case, this is said:

"The intention of the particular clause in question is that a bona fide purchaser without actual notice may rely with certainty upon the fact that no instrument which does not appear of record, and of which he does not have actual notice, can give a tenant for years the right to any longer term than for seven years from the making of the instrument. * * *

"The general intention of the section in which the clause is found is that no instrument operating to create an interest in land greater than an estate for seven years shall, unless duly recorded, be valid as against any person other than the one who makes it, or his heirs or devisees, unless such person has actual notice of the instrument. * * * In fixing upon seven years from the making of the lease as the length of a term which might be valid as against a bona fide purchaser without actual notice, the Legislature intended that to be the utmost which a lessee for years under an unrecorded instrument could claim as against such a purchaser, whether the instrument demised directly a longer term or provided for its indirect creation by an agreement for renewal at the lessee's option."

However, as above indicated, that case does not involve the question which is involved in the instant case, namely, whether a lease for a less time than the statutory period, with the privilege given the lessee of yearly renewals for successive terms of one year during a certain number of years, the extreme limit of which exceeds the statutory period, is good for those terms which do not in the aggregate exceed the statutory period against a purchase for valuable consideration without notice, although unrecorded; and the case referred to does not decide that question, as indeed the court takes care to expressly state, in effect, in the opinion in such case. The following is there said on this subject:

"We do not decide whether an instrument which makes a present demise for a term of seven years or less, and which provides for a further term which with the present demise will exceed seven years from the making of the instrument, either by way of a new lease * * * or by the effect of the lessee's mere continuance in possession after the expiration of the first term, if not recorded, is wholly void as to a bona fide purchaser without actual notice, or whether it may be good for the first term of seven years or less. It is enough for the purposes of this case to hold that as to any extension, or second term, or agreement for renewal, which will carry the possession of the lessee to more than seven years from the making of the instrument, every instrument which confers an estate for years is within the meaning of the statute."

Now, in the instant case, the "second term" covered by the agreement for renewal only is involved. That term, added to the first term demised by the lease, would "carry the possession of the lessee" to less than the statutory period in Virginia of five years. So that the Massachusetts case just referred to is no authority for the holding that the instant case, in so far as the tenancy of the lessee drawn in question therein is concerned, is within the Virginia statute; and it seems plain from what is said in the opinion in the Massachusetts case aforesaid that such court would not so hold.

Coming then to the question aforesaid involved in the instant case, the following considerations lead, as I think, to the conclusion that the provision of the contract here involved is not within the Virginia statute.

As stated in the majority opinion, the statutes involved in the case before us, when read together, provide as follows:

"Every contract in writing for the conveyance or sale of real estate, or a term therein of more than five years, shall be void both at law and in equity as to purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, unless and except from the time that it is duly admitted to record." (Italics supplied.)

The contract under consideration, therefore, falls under the condemnation of the statutes only to the extent that it was made for a holding of the premises by the lessee for "more than five years" from the making of the contract.

As the contract stood when entered into (November 24, 1917), it might have been fully performed within two years and one month and six days, as the first term provided for began December 1, 1917, and ended on the last day of December, 1919. It was only in the event that the lessee exercised one of four options given by the contract of "four successive renewals of this lease" that the contract would not have been fully performed within that time. Before the first term expired, the lessee exercised one of his options of renewal of the contract, but expressly limited such renewal to an additional period of one year, which will be referred to as the second term. The action in the instant case was instituted by the purchaser on January 12, 1920, to recover from the lessee the possession of the premises. There is involved in this action, therefore, the validity of the contract, as against the purchaser, only in so far as it is vouched by the lessee as his authority for holding the premises for the said second term, covering the year 1920. And as the contract stood at the time the action was brought, it might have been fully performed and terminated at the end of the year 1920, only three years and one month and six days from the time of the making of the contract. At the time of the action the lessee was not obligated by the contract to renew the lease further, and he did not assert any right then existing to hold the premises for a term or aggregate term of years in excess of five years, but only for the first and second terms, aggregating three years, one month, and six days. As stated in the majority opinion itself:

"It is only when the lessee using that demise" (referring to the demise for the first term), "and the provision for renewals in conjunction asserts a right to a term of years in the premises in excess of five years, that his contract is required to be recorded to be effective against a purchaser for value. If not recorded, then with respect only to his claim for a term greater than five years should the contract be considered as avoided as to such a purchaser."

Since the lessee in the case before us did not assert, and his right to hold the premises at the time the action was instituted did not depend upon his right to assert "a right to a term of years in the premises in excess of five years," it clearly follows, as I think, that with respect to the claim of the lessee involved in this case, the contract cannot be considered as avoided by the statute. Further:

The statutory provision under consideration, in so far as concerns the language having reference to terms in real estate of "more than five years," is similar in its scope to the provision of the statute of frauds (section 2840, Code 1904) embracing "any agreement that is not to be performed within a year." Hence, in accordance with the well-settled rules of construction of the statute of frauds (see Seddon v. Rosenbaum, 85 Va. 928, 9 S. E. 326, 3 L. R. A. 337, and also with the principle on which the decision of the Massachusetts case above referred to is based, I think that so much of the contract involved in the instant case as could be performed within the period of five years from the making of it, which certainly included the second term aforesaid, is not within the Virginia statute and is therefore valid as against the purchaser, the defendant in error.

Such, indeed, it would seem, would have been the opinion of the learned trial judge if he had thought the contract severable with respect to the second term aforesaid. In the opinion of such judge in the record before us, this is said:

"It is further urged on behalf of the defendant that as the term is for only two years and one month and the contract for renewal provides for successive terms of one year each, it is valid until the term is reached which would carry it beyond the five-year period.

"This would be true if these were separate or separable contracts for each renewal, but the lease contains but one clause of renewal, and the law is well settled that where a contract is entire and relates in part to a matter which requires it to be in writing, the whole provision is void. Engleby v. Harvey, 98 Va. 440; Noyes v. Humphrey, 11 Gratt. (52 Va.) 636."

The entire contracts involved in the two cases cited in the quotation just made were verbal contracts of a party to pay both for work done and to be done for another. Such contracts are not analogous to that involved in the instant case. And the fact that there is but one writing and but one renewal clause in that writing is, as I think, immaterial. The material question is: Might that portion of the contract which is involved in the case before us, as aforesaid, have been fully performed without any obligation on the lessee thereunder for any further period? If so, the contract was clearly severable in that respect and is not within the statute. That it was thus capable of performance and thus severable seems to me to be obvious from the provisions of the contract, which, as aforesaid, did not obligate the lessee as a tenant beyond the first term as the case stood when the contract was executed, and did not obligate him beyond the second term, as the case stood when this action was instituted. The circumstance that the lessor was obligated by the contract for a longer time than the statutory period is not alone the true criterion of the length of the contract obligation. Although one of the parties to a contract is thereby bound for a certain period longer than the statutory period in question, if the other party thereto is given thereby an option to terminate the contract at a time within the statutory period, the contract will be construed as one which may be performed within the statutory period, and hence as not within the statute. In Seddon v. Rosenbaum, 85 Va. 928, 9 S. E. 326, 3 L. R. A. 337, the contract bound the defendant "to buy 250 shrs. R. & D. at 89 and sell the same to T. Seddon" (the plaintiff) "at the end of 3 yrs. at 96." But it contained the further provision that, "Stock may be called at 96 at any time before expiration of 2 yrs." And it was held that the contract might have been performed within one year, and hence was not within the statute of frauds.

For the reasons stated, I feel constrained to dissent from the majority opinion.

KING v. SMITH et al. (No. 4077.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 22, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Covenants §47—General warranty cannot enlarge estate conveyed by deed.

A covenant of general warranty in a deed cannot enlarge the estate thereby conveyed.

2. Covenants §47—General warranty restricted to estate conveyed by deed.

A covenant of general warranty in a deed, which grants all of the right, title, and interest of the grantor, is restricted to the estate conveyed, and does not warrant the title to the land described in the deed.

3. Deeds §120—Estate will not be enlarged by construction, where language clear and unambiguous.

The courts will not, by construction, enlarge the estate conveyed by a deed, where the language of the grant is clear, plain, and free from ambiguity.

Error to Circuit Court, Harrison County.

Action by Mary D. King, administratrix, against Mortimer W. Smith and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Elmer L. Stone, of Charleston, for plaintiff in error.

Harvey W. Harmer and Law & McCue, all of Clarksburg, for defendants in error.

RITZ, P. This writ of error seeks reversal of a judgment of the circuit court of Harrison county, sustaining a demurrer to plaintiff's declaration in an action of covenant.

The declaration made profert of the deed in which is contained the covenant sued upon, and after oyer of this deed was granted on motion of the defendant a demurrer to the declaration was filed, and the same sustained. The deed, after reciting that the grantors are the heirs at law, with the exception of some infants, of Augustine J. Smith; that their ancestor on the 27th day of September, 1856, by a certain paper writing or title bond, bargained and sold unto the grantee, Patrick King, a tract of land situate in Randolph county, describing the same; that the said Augustine J. Smith departed this life in the year 1888 intestate; that no deed had ever been made to the grantee by the said Augustine J. Smith; that the purchase money had never been paid for said land, and that the said Patrick King was willing to take a deed from the grantors as heirs at law of the said Augustine J. Smith, and to prosecute proper proceedings to extract the title from such heirs as were infants, and to pay $2 per acre as a consideration for said deed, proceeds to grant unto said Patrick King, with covenants of general warranty as to themselves, the grantors, their right, title, and interest in and to that certain tract or parcel of land mentioned and described in the title bond aforesaid, situate in the county of Randolph, and, after describing the land, proceeds as follows:

"The purpose and intent of this deed being to invest the party of the second part with all the right, title and interest in and to the said parcel of land that is in them as heirs at law of the said Augustine J. Smith."

The declaration declares that King had been deprived of the possession of said land by a judicial proceeding, and his title thereto held to be invalid, for which reason he claims a breach of the covenant of general warranty contained in the deed. The defendants' contention is that the deed only conveyed such right, title, and interest as they had, and that the covenant of warranty therein contained did not enlarge this grant, but was restricted in its application to the estate granted.

[1, 2] We are asked by the plaintiff to construe this deed as conveying the land in fee because of the fact that the ancestor of the grantors had theretofore made a title bond to King, and for the further reason that the covenant of general warranty is contained in the deed. That a covenant of general warranty contained in a deed will not enlarge the estate thereby granted seems to be very well settled. Such a covenant is a restricted one, and applies only to the estate granted by the deed, and does not have the effect to enlarge that estate. Hull v. Hull, 35 W. Va. 155, 13 S. E. 49, 29 Am. St. Rep. 800; Uhl v. Railroad Co., 51 W. Va. 106, 41 S. E. 340; Reynolds v. Shaver, 59 Ark. 299, 27 S. W. 78, 43 Am. St. Rep. 36; Sweet v. Brown, 12 Metc. (Mass.) 175, 45 Am. Dec. 243; White v. Stewart, 131 Ga. 460, 62 S. E. 590, 15 Ann. Cas. 1198, and note; Maupin on Marketable Title to Real Estate, p. 340; 7 B. C. L., title "Covenants," § 57. It is clear from these authorities that the covenant of general warranty contained in a deed does not enlarge the estate thereby granted.

[3] Nor is there any room for construction of the granting clause of this deed. It is clear and unequivocal, and grants the right, title, and interest of the grantors in and to the parcel of land therein described. Not only is this true of the granting clause, but after describing the property it is again declared that the purpose and intent of the deed is to invest the party of the second part with all the right, title, and interest of the grantors as heirs at law of Augustine J. Smith. This leaves no room for construction. It is true that it is the function of courts to determine what the parties intended by a deed or contract, but this conclusion must be arrived at from the language of the paper when it is clear and unequivocal, as it is in this case. The courts cannot arbitrarily say that the parties intended to say something by their contract or deed which the language does not import. In other words, where the language is clear and free from ambiguity, there is no room for construction, and that is the case here.

There is no error in the judgment complained of, and the same is affirmed.

SHERRARD v. HENRY. (No. 4072.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 22, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Dead bodies §5—Equity may restrain removal when rightfully buried.

Equity has jurisdiction to restrain the removal of or interference with the remains of the dead rightfully buried in a cemetery.

2. Adverse possession §6—Those using land for cemetery purposes with owner's consent may acquire title by adverse possession.

Where a parcel of land has been set apart by the owner thereof as a place for the burial of the dead those who, with the consent and acquiescence of such owner, use the same for the purpose for which it has been dedicated, selecting and appropriating plots or squares for the burial of their dead therein free of charge, may acquire a right to such plots or squares so appropriated by adverse possession.

3. Adverse possession §6—Cemeteries §15—Adverse possession may confer right of perpetual easement in cemetery lot; equity will protect such rights.

While the right which one acquires in a cemetery lot is rather in the nature of a perpetual easement subject to be controlled by the state in the exercise of its police power, it is such a valuable right as a court of equity will protect, and the same character of adverse possession that will confer title to real estate will suffice to confer such right.

4. Adverse possession §19—Sufficiency of boundaries of burial lot for the purposes of adverse possession stated.

It is not necessary in order to the acquirement of a right in a burial lot by adverse possession that the same be fenced. If the limits of such claim are clearly defined by improvements upon the lot and by a slight barrier or ridge extending all the way around the same, and so maintained for the period of 10 years, clearly indicating the extent and nature of the claim, it will be sufficient to confer the right by adverse possession.

5. Cemeteries §21—One who buries a body on another's burial lot may be required to remove it.

One who buries the body of his dead relative upon a burial lot which another has the exclusive right to use for such purpose will be required by mandatory injunction to disinter and remove the same.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Morgan County.

Suit by Alvernon Sherrard against Nora Henry for an injunction, with cross-bill by defendant. Decree for complainant, and defendant appeals. Reversed and rendered.

A. C. McIntire, of Martinsburg, and G. McIntire-Weaver, of Berkely Springs, for appellant.

Allen B. Noll, of Martinsburg, and Luttrell & Rogers, for appellee.

RITZ, P. Plaintiff brought this suit for the purpose of enjoining the defendant from removing the body of her uncle from a burial plot in a cemetery in Oakland, in Morgan county. From a decree perpetuating the injunction and refusing the defendant the relief prayed for in her cross-bill answer, the defendant prosecutes this appeal.

It appears that many years ago there was conveyed to certain trustees for the Methodist Church a tract of land for religious purposes. Upon a part of this land was erected a church building in which has been conducted religious services, and another part of the land was set apart as a burial ground. It appears that this part was inclosed by a fence. No charge was made for lots in this cemetery; it being the uniform and unbroken custom since it was set apart and dedicated for burial purposes for those desiring to bury their dead therein to select a lot for that purpose, and to indicate such selection by marking such lot, and by cleaning it up and keeping it in presentable condition. Both parties to this suit agree as to this phase of the case, and both of them claim the right to the lot in which plaintiff's uncle was buried, by reason of the same having been preempted in the manner above indicated. The plaintiff contends that her grandfather, Dr. B. E. Shockey, selected a row, as she calls it, in this cemetery for the burial of members of his family and their close relatives, and that this row includes the lot wherein her uncle was buried. The defendant, on the other hand, contends that she, in the year 1893, selected a square in this cemetery for the burial of her dead relatives, and marked the same off in accordance with custom, and that the lot in which plaintiff's uncle is buried is within her square, wherefore she claims the right to compel the removal of this body and its reinterment elsewhere, and in her answer she prays that she be given this relief against the plaintiff, and against the plaintiff's father, John W. Sherrard.

The rights of the respective parties to this controversy depend largely upon the fact as to which of their burial lots include the ground in which the body of plaintiff's uncle was interred. The proof is full, in fact is uncontradicted, that this piece of land was set apart for burial purposes many, many years ago, and has been dedicated to that use ever since. The proof is just as satisfactory that the method of selection of a burial lot in this cemetery was, by the party desiring such lot, going upon the ground and marking it in some way, and improving and keeping it in presentable condition, as well as by burial of bodies of dead relatives therein and marking the graves. That the plaintiff's ancestor did select a row or square many years ago for this purpose is likewise not disputed, but it is the boundaries of this square, or the limits of it, which make the controversy here. The plaintiff's father is the principal witness upon the acts of ownership exercised by Dr. Shockey and his successors over this plot of ground. He testifies that for many, many years he worked and took care of the lot appropriated by Dr. Shockey, and that it included the space in which his brother's body was buried. Other witnesses testify that he did on many occasions clean up and work the plaintiff's plot, but not one of them have any information that he ever did anything upon that part thereof in which the body of plaintiff's uncle was interred, nor is there any evidence upon the ground defining the limits of the plaintiff's lot at that end of the plot so far as the testimony indicates. On behalf of the defendant it is shown that in the year 1893 she selected a square in this cemetery, and that at that time she made a slight ridge all the way around this square indicating that it had been appropriated; that in this square at that time she buried the body of her father, and that since that time she has had interred in this square the body of her mother, of her father-in-law, her mother-in-law, her sister, and one of her grandchildren, and that she has space reserved therein sufficient for the burial of her own body and the body of her husband. That this square so marked out by the defendant includes the space in which the body of plaintiff's uncle is buried is undisputed. The evidence is overwhelming that the defendant since 1893 from time to time worked upon this square. She has removed the brush and sprouts therefrom, and kept it planted in flowers, and sowed in grass, has provided suitable headstones at the graves of her deceased relatives buried therein, and has kept up the slight ridge around the edges thereof indicating the limits of her lot. That the father of the plaintiff buried his brother within the limits of this lot there is no question, but his contention, and the contention of the plaintiff, is that Dr. Shockey had acquired this lot prior to the time it had been appropriated by the defendant in 1893. It is clear that in 1893 there was nothing to indicate an intention upon the part of Dr. Shockey or his relatives that their lot should extend to and cover this ground, and it is just as clear that since 1893, when the plaintiff selected the lot, she has indicated by unmistakable marks upon the ground the intention to appropriate the same for burial purposes. Whether this lot was included within the original lot as intended to be appropriated by Dr. Shockey in the beginning can make little difference. There was nothing upon the ground in 1893 to indicate that his row extended in the direction of the defendant's lot beyond the last grave therein. This ground was unappropriated at that time by any person, and under an unbroken custom any person desiring to provide a place for the burial of his dead in this cemetery had a right to appropriate any ground not theretofore marked out and appropriated by some one else for that purpose. It is shown by the evidence and is not disputed that when the plaintiff's father went to the cemetery and indicated the place that he desired the grave dug for the burial of his brother's body, he was told that that was within the defendant's lot, and that he insisted, notwithstanding this information, that the grave be dug at that point. He states in his testimony that, had the defendant come to him and advised him that she claimed this lot, he would have surrendered any claim to it, and buried his brother elsewhere, but that he is now unwilling to remove the remains. This testimony is not at all consistent with his act in burying his brother in this lot after being fully informed of the defendant's claim thereto and without making any further inquiry or investigation as to defendant's rights. In addition to this the insincerity of his statement is demonstrated by the fact that immediately upon the discovery by the defendant that this body was buried in her lot, she called upon plaintiff's father to have the same removed, and informed him that the lot was hers, and she proposed to pay one-half of the expense of the removal of the body, and when this proposition was declined she proposed that she would pay the entire expense of removing it, which proposition was also declined. She then called upon the trustees who held the legal title to the property and asked them to require the plaintiff and her father to remove the body of the plaintiff's uncle from her lot, and the trustees, being advised in the premises, notified plaintiff's father to remove the body within 30 days, failing in which the defendant would have the same removed. Before the expiration of this time this injunction was procured.

[1-3] The defendant challenges the jurisdiction of a court of equity to maintain this bill, insisting that there is an adequate remedy at law for the protection of any rights which the plaintiff may have. This claim is based upon the theory that the plaintiff is not in possession of the lot, and is therefore not entitled to go into equity to protect any rights she may have therein. That a court of equity will interfere to prevent desecration of places of burial of the dead or to prevent the removal of bodies properly buried is well established. There is no property in a dead body, and, this being true, the law can afford no remedy in a case where the removal of such a body is sought or attempted. The courts do, however, recognize that, while there is no property in the body, the close relatives have a right to protect the same, and to prevent its removal or the desecration of the grave. This being true, there is no other remedy except resort to a court of equity when the removal of a dead body is attempted or threatened, and then such relief is granted as the circumstances require, and as is in consonance with the feelings of mankind. Wormley v. Wormley, 207 Ill. 411, 69 N. E. 865, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 481, and monographic note; England v. Central Pocahontas Coal Co., 104 S. E. 46. There is no doubt of the plaintiff's right to resort to a court of equity to prevent interference with the body of her dead uncle, unless it appears that it was interred in a place where the plaintiff had no right to bury it. There is no doubt but that one who acquires a cemetery lot has some interest therein. He does not acquire the fee in the land. His interest is more in the nature of a perpetual easement, and it is likewise true that the exercise of this right is subject to the police power of the state. Conditions may arise which would make such a cemetery a nuisance, in which case the state, under its police power, could require its removal and the reinterment of the bodies at some other point. 5 R. O. L. title "Cemeteries," § 10; Grinnan v. Fredericksburg Lodge, 118 Va. 588, 88 S. E. 79, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 729; Roanoke Cemetery Co. v. Goodwin, 101 Va. 605, 44 S. E. 769.

[4] It seems to be quite as well established that this right may be acquired by adverse possession as any other interest in real estate may be acquired, and both of the parties in this case contend that this is the way they did acquire the rights for which they respectively contend in this suit. The plot of land in controversy was not inclosed by either of the parties with any fence, and, as before stated, the limits of the Shockey lot were not definitely marked upon the ground at any time, at least not in 1893, when the defendant appropriated the lot. There are some authorities which hold that, in order to the acquisition of title by adverse possession, where such possession is not accompanied by any color of title, the exterior boundaries must be indicated by a fence or barrier, and, if this rule is applied in this case, neither of the parties have had any adverse possession of this particular piece of ground. There is no doubt but that the extent of such claim must be indicated in some way upon the ground, and this delimitation of the claim upon the ground must be of such character as to clearly indicate that it is claimed by the party asserting the right thereto. There must be such marks as indicate that the land is under the actual control of the party claiming it. Jacobus v. Congregation of Israel, 107 Ga. 518, 33 S. E. 853, 73 Am. St. Rep. 141; 5 R. C. L. title "Cemeteries," § 10; 2 C. J. § 71; Hook v. Joyce, 94 Ky. 450, 22 S. W. 651, 21 L. R. A. 96; Roumillot v. Gardner, 113 Ga. 60, 38 S. E. 362, 53 L. R. A. 729; Hines v. State, 126 Tenn. 1, 149 S. W. 1058, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1138; Woodbridge v. Smith, 243 Mo. 190, 147 S. W. 1019, 40 L. R. A. (N. S.) 752; Illinois Steel Co. v. Blot, 109 Wis. 418, 84 N. W. 855, 85 N. W. 402, 83 Am. St. Rep. 905; Lyons v. Fairmont Real Estate Co., 71 W. Va. 754, 77 S. E. 525. The proof in this case is clear that the defendant had buried in her square a number of her relatives whose graves were marked by headstones indicating that at least the portion of the ground in which they were buried had been appropriated for that purpose. If this had been all that she had done, her interest might extend no further than the land occupied by these graves, but, in addition to this, ever since the year 1893 she has had this entire square, including the land where plaintiff's uncle is buried, surrounded by a ridge indicating the limits of her claim, and has cared for all of the land included within this slight barrier by sowing the same in grass, planting flowers thereon, and caring for the same from year to year as the same needed attention. This was a clear indication that this piece of ground had been appropriated by the defendant for burial purposes, and, as held in the case of Lyons v. Fairmont Real Estate Co., supra, was a sufficient indication of the limits of her claim. We are therefore of opinion that the defendant was entitled to the exclusive right to bury her dead in the space where the body of the plaintiff's uncle was buried, and that neither the plaintiff nor her father had any right to appropriate this land for the purpose of interring the body of their deceased relative therein.

[5] The defendant, as before stated, asked for affirmative relief, and prayed that John W. Sherrard, the father of the plaintiff, in addition to the plaintiff, be made a party defendant to her cross-bill. This was done, and process served upon him upon the cross-bill. Defendant now insists that she is not only entitled to defeat the plaintiff's claim, but is also entitled to a mandatory injunction here-in commanding and requiring the plaintiff and her father to forthwith remove the body of their deceased relative from the place where the same is now buried, in order that she may enjoy the rights to which she is entitled. It would seem quite clear that, where one trespasses upon the rights of another, and does some act which would prevent such other from enjoying to the full extent the privileges to which he is entitled, a court of equity will compel the guilty party to restore the status quo, and this is as true in the case of the unauthorized interment of a dead body as with any other interference. McWhirter v. Newell, 200 Ill. 583, 66 N. E. 345; Dwenger v. Geary, 113 Ind. 106, 14 N. E. 903.

It follows from what we have said that the decree complained of will be reversed, and the injunction dissolved, and that a mandatory injunction will be granted to the defendant, in accordance with the prayer of her cross-bill answer, commanding and requiring the plaintiff and her father, John W. Sherrard, to forthwith remove the body of their deceased relative from the point where the same is now buried upon the defendant's lot, and the cause remanded for the purpose of executing this decree.

STATE v. BRIDGEMAN et al. (No. 3776.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 22, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law §594(1)—Elements necessary for continuance for absence of witnesses enumerated.

A motion for continuance based on the absence of a witness is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, and it must be shown to the satisfaction of the court that the witness is material, and that due diligence has been used to obtain his attendance, and that his evidence would not be cumulative.

2. Criminal law §1151—Appellate court will not reverse denial of continuance for absence of witnesses unless for abuse of discretion.

Where a continuance because of the absence of a witness has been refused, the appellate court will not reverse unless it clearly appears that the trial court has abused its sound discretion.

3. Lewdness §10—Evidence sustaining conviction of lewd and lascivious cohabitation.

Proof that a man and woman not married to each other occupied together two adjoining rooms with a door in the partition between for approximately one year, where they slept and took their meals, she doing the cooking and other domestic work and acting as assistant to him in his profession as a dentist, conducted in offices adjoining the two living rooms, at a wage of $10 per week, and that she stated to various visitors that they were married, and on one occasion introduced him to her brother-in-law as her husband, he taking no exception to the introduction, but tacitly assenting thereto, that on one occasion they were found sleeping together in one of the rooms, that a boy baby was born to her there after she had been living in the rooms for approximately ten months, of which baby he seemed to be very fond, and to which he called himself "Daddy," and that on one occasion he came into the room when she had just arisen from bed, and remained until she dressed without apparent embarrassment to either, "same as any man might happen to run in on his wife if she would be dressing," is sufficient to constitute the offense of lewd and lascivious cohabitation under section 7, c. 149 (sec. 5310), of the Code.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

4. Lewdness §10—"Lewd and lascivious cohabitation" defined.

The crime of "lewd and lascivious cohabitation" under Code, c. 149, § 7 (sec. 5310), means the living together of a man and woman not married to each other, in the same house or apartment, as husband and wife.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Lewdness.]

Error to Circuit Court, Harrison County.

Hugh B. Bridgeman and another were convicted of lewd and lascivious cohabiting together, and they bring error. Affirmed.

Charles G. Coffman, of Clarksburg, for plaintiffs in error.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., and R. Dennis Steed, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

LIVELY, J. Hugh B. Bridgeman and Eula Miller were indicted, tried, and convicted in the Criminal Court of Harrison County of lewd and lascivious cohabiting together and with each other, and the former was adjudged to pay a fine of $100 and was sentenced to confinement in the jail at hard labor for 30 days, and the latter was fined $100, both sentences being imposed on the 1st day of December, 1917.

Defendants assign as error: (1) The refusal of the court to continue the case; (2) the court's refusal to permit certain evidence offered by the defendants to go to the jury; (3) the court's refusal to set aside the verdict on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to convict.

Bridgeman is a dentist, and had rented four adjoining rooms on the second floor of the Elk Bridge Building in Clarksburg, the first two of which rooms he used for dental offices, and the other two, which were adjoining, all being in one suite, he occupied as living rooms. The room next to those used for offices was furnished with a bed, piano, dresser, chairs, and the like, and the other room, the back room, was used as a dining room, in which was a table, a kitchen cabinet, a davenport, and it was otherwise fitted up for a kitchen and living room. In July, 1915, he employed Eula Miller to assist him in his dental work at $8 per week. At that time she was 17 years old and resided with her father on Baltimore street, about one-half mile from the Elk Bridge Building. In September, 1916, she began living in these two living rooms occupied by Bridgeman, and was yet residing there at the time of the trial. In May, 1917, she was delivered of a boy baby. The following August both defendants were arrested and bound over to answer an indictment for the offense for which they were convicted, were indicted at the succeeding November term of the criminal court of that county, and tried and convicted at that term. Mrs. Cozad, a sister of Eula Miller, testified that she visited her sister at these living apartments of Dr. Bridgeman quite often before defendants were arrested in August, 1917, when she saw her sister doing the cooking and housework; that she had been there as much as two days and two nights at a time, and saw no one else rooming there or staying there at any time except the defendants; that on one occasion she saw them in bed together in the room which contained the piano, and which room opened into the kitchen, where she (witness) slept on the davenport. Eula Miller stated to the witness that she and Dr. Bridgeman were married, but Dr. Bridgeman never made such a statement. She was there at noon nearly every day for a considerable period when she worked at Gribble's store, in the near vicinity. She saw Bridgeman take his meals at the apartment, and always considered, but was in doubts, as to whether the defendants were married, as she had heard that Bridgeman was married to some other woman. Mrs. Hattie Wallace testified that she was a sister of Eula Miller, and visited the Bridgeman apartment in the summer of 1916, and on one occasion when she was there her sister was in bed in the room adjoining the dental offices, and had just got up without much clothing on, when Dr. Bridgeman came in the room and remained while she was dressing, "same as any man would happen to run in on his wife if she would be dressing; and he called himself 'Daddy' to the baby, and asked me what I thought about it, and he called me 'Aunt' to it, which I suppose I am." The defendant Eula Miller told her that she and Doctor Bridgeman were married. Mrs. Lena Ice, another sister of Eula Miller, testified that she visited her sister at the apartment one evening in November when Dr. Bridgeman came to town on a late train, and came to the apartment, when her sister Eula cooked his supper for him, and after supper they accompanied her across the bridge to Pike street, where they met Mrs. Ice's husband, to whom Eula Miller introduced Dr. Bridgeman as her husband, and the doctor acknowledged the introduction. On that occasion her sister told witness that she and Dr. Bridgeman had been married in Cincinnati, and she (Eula) thought that they would rent a house and furnish it in the near future. This was before the baby was born. Mrs. Effie Wamsley, another sister, stayed at the Bridgeman apartments about three or four weeks while Eula Miller lived there, and slept in the rear room on the davenport a portion of the time, and sometimes in the bed in the other room. At that time, which was in September, 1916, she usually slept with her sister, and her husband slept with Dr. Bridgeman. Her husband ate his meals at the apartment, but not all of the time, and when she and her husband slept together she did not know where Dr. Bridgeman slept. She never saw him and her sister sleeping together. Her sister did go into the other room at the retiring hour, and frequently Dr. Bridgeman would go into the same room either before or after, but she could not tell whether or not he continued to stay in that room all night. Eula Miller stated to this witness also that she and Dr. Bridgeman were married. The testimony of Clyde Wamsley, the husband of Effie Wamsley, was practically the same as that of his wife. Mrs. Cozad, who visited the defendants at their apartments possibly more often than any other witness, stated: "They lived there seemingly the same as the rest of my sisters and their husbands." She testified that defendants got their meals there, her sister doing the cooking and the housework, and he was staying with her. G. W. Miller, the father of Eula, testified that after his daughter quit coming home at night and began to stay at the Bridgeman living rooms he went to see Dr. Bridgeman about the matter and remonstrated with him and asked him not to take automobile trips at night with her and "do things like that," as it would cause people to talk about them. At that time the doctor promised him that he would not do so any more. His daughter told him that they were married. He frequently visited them at the living rooms when the doctor came in and took his meals there. After some trouble had arisen and he became suspicious that they were not married, he went up to the apartments and had a talk with them, and they requested him to stop any trouble, stating that they would have everything in "shape" and would be married the following September.

All of the witnesses for the state who visited the defendants at their apartments were under the impression, from their conduct and manner of living, that the defendants were married and were living together as man and wife. Quite a number of them testified to the actions of Dr. Bridgeman after the baby was born, stating that he held himself out to be the father of the child and was proud of its size and looks, nursed it, and seemed to be very proud of it.

On the other hand, the defendants are positive in their statements that they never lived together as man and wife, never held themselves out to be married, never occupied the same bed together, and that they had no illicit intercourse. She denies that he was the father of the child. Dr. Bridgeman denies that he was introduced to Mrs. Ice's husband as the husband of Eula Miller; and Miss Miller denies that she ever told any of her sisters or her father that she was married. As is usual in such cases, there is a flat contradiction between the witnesses for the state and the defendants. Dr. Bridgeman testifies that he employed Miss Miller to assist him in his profession at $6 per week, and afterwards paid her $12 per week for a time, until she began living at his apartments, when he paid her $10 per week; that he rented these four rooms and paid therefor the sum of $100 at intervals of three months; that he boarded elsewhere than at the apartments, paid no bills for Miss Miller, either for clothing or for groceries, and did not furnish any money for those purposes. He testified that he took his meals at various restaurants, and, after he was arrested in August, rented a room, near by his office, which he had occupied from that time until the trial. He flatly denies that he is the father of the illegitimate child or that he ever held himself out to be such, either by word or deed. On this conflicting evidence the jury found defendants guilty.

[1, 2] When the case was called for trial defendants moved the court for a continuance on account of the absence of Lee Rogers and Harold Dunn, claimed to be important witnesses, without whose evidence they could not safely go to trial. Rogers had been summoned, but Dunn had not been found by the sheriff. A rule was issued against Rogers, and he afterwards appeared and gave his testimony, which was not important. Bridgeman was under bond to answer the indictment, and, after the indictment was found, he did not have subpoenas issued for his witnesses until four days after. He knew Dunn very well and testified that he had lived with him at his apartments during most of the time that Miss Miller lived there, and that this witness had been at Clarksburg up until about the time of the trial, but that he did not know what had become of him. He stated that this witness lived in East End, Industrial, an addition to the city of Clarksburg. As an excuse for not having his witnesses summoned promptly, he stated that this witness had been around town all the time, and he supposed that he would be on hand at the trial or would be within reach of the sheriff when process was issued. Under such circumstances the court in its discretion refused to continue the trial, presumably because the defendant had not shown the proper diligence in preparing for the trial. It is pertinent to state that it does not appear from the testimony of any of the witnesses who visited the apartments of Dr. Bridgeman while Miss Miller lived there that the absent witness, Dunn, was ever seen there. It is well settled that a motion for continuance is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, under all of the circumstances of the case; and, unless it is clearly shown that the lower court has abused its discretion, and it is reasonably clear that an injustice has resulted, the appellate court will not review the holding of the lower court. It must be clear that the defendant has been prejudiced by the refusal of the continuance before the appellate court will reverse because a continuance is not granted. State v. Harrison, 36 W. Va. 729, 15 S. E. 982, 18 L. R. A. 224; Bank v. Ralph-snyder, 54 W. Va. 231, 46 S. E. 206; State v. Jones, 53 W. Va. 613, 45 S. E. 916; State v. Harrison, 36 W. Va. 729, 15 S. E. 982, 18 L. R. A. 224; Hewitt v. Commonwealth, 17 Grat. 627; Flott v. Com., 12 Grat. 576. In the case of State v. Harrison, Judge Brannon says:

"The judge presiding sees all the surroundings of the trial, and can better than we decide whether the design of a motion for a continuance is delay, or whether a continuance is really essential to a fair and proper trial."

In the case of Ohio Valley Bank v. Berry, 85 W. Va. 95, 100 S. E. 875, it is held:

"A motion for the continuance of a cause is always addressed to the sound, but not arbitrary, discretion of the court, and when based on the absence of a witness depends on the diligence employed to obtain his presence and the materiality of his evidence, and a judgment denying such motion must plainly appear to be erroneous, to justify a reversal thereof. There is no presumption of due diligence in such cases from the mere suing out of summons for an absent witness. Diligence to obtain his presence must be affirmatively shown, as well as the materiality of his evidence if present, and that it will not be merely cumulative of other evidence, must also affirmatively appear."

Under the circumstances of this case we cannot say that the trial court abused its discretion in refusing a continuance.

Defendants attempted to show by cross-examination of G. W. Miller that on one occasion a dispute arose between him and Eula, his daughter, while she was at home, over whether the daughter or a niece should clean the parlor or wash the dishes, and as a result of the dispute he struck Eula over the head with a thin board several times, breaking the board into several pieces. The witness began telling about the occurrence, saying that he was correcting her for some of her misdoings and for "sassing" him, and, although angry, he did not hurt her, when, upon objection, the court refused to permit further testimony along that line, saying that it was not pertinent to the issue. The witness was further asked if he and his wife did not on that occasion tell the daughter to leave home, and an objection to the question was sustained. Afterwards the witness said he did not tell her to leave home, and did not remember whether the incident was before or after she began staying with Bridgeman, but thought it was after she had begun to stay at night at the Bridgeman apartments. Defendants also attempted to show by Eula Miller that her father and mother attempted to compel her to sleep with the hired girl, who was dirty, filthy, and lousy, and that her father beat her over the head with a box and told her to leave, and that she was compelled to give up her room and occupy that of the hired girl, and upon refusal to sleep with the hired girl her mother told her to leave, and drove her away, and because of this alleged ill treatment at home she went to sleep at the Bridgeman rooms, having no other place to go. The court refused to allow this evidence and evidence of this character to go to the jury. Defendants assert that this evidence was proper to show that Eula Miller had no intent to lewdly and lasciviously cohabit with Bridgeman when she left her home to go to his apartments. Whether her intent was innocent at that time is not very pertinent. If, after going to his apartments with the purest intentions, she discarded those intentions and began a life of reproach, she would not be held guiltless. She had four married sisters living in Clarksburg, with whom she seemed to be on friendly terms. Even if life at her father's house was unendurable, the necessity for living with Dr. Bridgeman is not perceived, and her actions there are not condoned because she was driven from home. She stated to her sisters that she was married to Dr. Bridgeman. This was the reason which she gave to them why she was living with him in that manner, and not that her parents had driven her from home. We cannot see how this evidence would have changed the verdict. Should her intent have been innocent in the beginning, she remained there for over a year, creating the false impression by word and deed that she was in lawful wedlock. It is not perceived how this evidence, if admitted, would help Dr. Bridgeman. Did he take her into his apartments because she was homeless and live with her for that reason? Did he take advantage of her because she was turned out of home? If he wished to take care of her, was it necessary for him to live and cohabit with her? The evidence, if admitted, would have accentuated his guilt, and could not have helped her. The cause of her going to his rooms is not important. It is what they did during the long time she remained there which constitutes the violation of law of which they are convicted.

The remaining ground of error alleged is that the evidence is not sufficient to justify the verdict, and that the court should have set aside the verdict and granted a new trial for that reason. We are cited to the cases of State v. Foster, 21 W. Va. 767, State v. Miller, 42 W. Va. 215, 24 S. E. 882, State v. White, 66 W. Va. 45, 66 S. E. 20, and State v. Ramage, 75 W. Va. 524, 84 S. E. 246.

[3, 4] The crime of lewd and lascivious cohabitation under section 7, c. 149, of the Code (sec. 5310) means the living and cohabiting together of a man and woman not married to each other, in the same house or apartments, as husband and wife. As stated in the Miller Case, occasional acts of secret illicit intercourse are not alone sufficient. It must be proved to the satisfaction of the court and jury that the parties cohabited together; that is, lived together as man and wife. It is not necessary that they should hold themselves out to the world as man and wife, as is held in the first point of the syllabus in the Ramage Case. The burden of the offense is the open, lewd, and lascivious conduct of the parties, not being married, and living together as if the conjugal relation existed, and in this way undermining and debasing public morals. The facts proven here are quite different from those found in the cases above cited. In the Foster Case the woman lived in a house used as a kitchen, near the residence of the defendant, and she did the cooking and superintended the household affairs, and all ate at the same table. This woman was hired as a cook and slept in the kitchen near Foster's residence, and there was no evidence whatever that they cohabited together; no evidence of any acts of illicit intercourse. In the Miller Case it appeared that Miller was clearing a piece of land he owned, and employed several workmen for that purpose, and also employed Susan Hatton and other women to do the housework and cook for the laborers. The house consisted of one room, where she slept, and Miller and various other work hands also slept in the same room. It did not appear that Miller had ever had illicit intercourse with Susan Hatton, and never even passed a day with her in the house, which was the common dwelling place of all. She was employed in February and gave birth to an illegitimate child in the following September. There was nothing in this case to show that the defendant cohabited with her in any way. These facts were clearly insufficient to sustain the verdict. In the White Case the defendant had leased a house to Geneva Dunningan, a single woman and the mother of an illegitimate child then three years old, for the purpose of keeping boarders, and he and others boarded with her in that house, which had four rooms, consisting of a dining room and kitchen, and two bedrooms in each of which were two beds. White and other boarders occupied one of these rooms, and Geneva Dunnigan and her child and a hired girl occupied the other. There was no evidence of illicit intercourse between White and the Dunnigan woman or that any improper relations ever existed between them. They did not hold themselves out to the world as man and wife, although a short time after the house was finished they occupied it together, after which time others came there to live and board. White, as well as the other boarders, assisted in doing chores about the house. The evidence was held to be insufficient to establish the crime of lewd and lascivious cohabitation. In the Ramage Case it appeared that the defendant was the general superintendent of a coal company and lived in the same house with Maud Hunter, an unmarried woman, who had been employed by the coal company at a fixed sum per month to do the cooking and washing and general housework, and that for a year or more previous to the indictment she and Ramage had lived in the house alone; that the house contained a number of rooms, and he occupied a bedroom on the lower floor and she one up stairs; that on three or four occasions they were seen together in daylight going in the direction of the church and to ball games; and that cows and other domestic animals were kept on the premises, which she fed and attended, while he followed his occupation as superintendent of the mines. The only evidence of illicit intercourse was given by one witness, a Mrs. Pilcher, who was visiting at the Ramage house. This witness saw Maud Hunter leave her room on the second floor about 3 o'clock one morning and go down the stairs and enter Ramage's room. This evidence of illicit intercourse was flatly contradicted by both of the defendants, but the jury evidently believed Mrs. Pilcher and found the defendants guilty; but the court held that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain the indictment for lewd and lascivious cohabitation.

In the case under consideration the defendants were together occupying the two rooms, and it is very evident that they occupied them together almost continuously after she left her father's home and began sleeping at the Bridgeman apartments. The evidence of the various witnesses who visited the apartments is summed up in that of Mrs. Cozad when she said, "They lived there seemingly the same as the rest of my sisters and their husbands." Eula Miller quite consistently asserted that she was married to Bridgeman, evidently realizing that their conduct was inexcusable except as that of husband and wife. It is true that there was no evidence that Dr. Bridgeman claimed that they were married, but on one occasion he was introduced as the husband of Miss Miller and made no objection thereto. He tacitly consented to the fiction. It is also true that this is denied by both of the defendants, but that was a question for the jury to determine, and evidently the jury believed the testimony of the state's witnesses in that regard. If the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the indictment for the offense charged, it would be difficult indeed to ever obtain a conviction for this crime.

Instructions were given to the jury. They do not appear in the record, and evidently properly propounded the law applicable to the facts, as no exceptions were taken thereto.

It is peculiarly within the province of the jury to pass upon the credibility of the witnesses, and, although the evidence of the state's witnesses is wholly contradicted by the two defendants, we cannot invade the province of the jury, and have concluded that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict.

REGENT WAIST CO. v. O. J. MORRISON DEPARTMENT STORE CO. (No. 4130.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 22, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Sales \S 62—When contract "severable" stated.

If the part of a contract to be performed by one party consists of several distinct and separate items, and the price to be paid by the other is apportioned to each item to be performed, such a contract is in general severable.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Severable Contract.]

2. Sales \S 62, 129—Contract for purchase of different kinds of waists severable, and purchaser may accept those complying with contract and reject remainder.

Where a retail merchant orders from a manufacturer of shirtwaists a number of such waists of different kinds and qualities, a definite price being fixed for each of such different kinds and qualities, such contract is separable in the absence of any circumstance indicating the contrary, and if the seller, in fulfillment of his contract, furnishes some of the different items in compliance therewith, and others which are not of the kind and quality stipulated for, the purchaser will have the right to accept such of said lots as comply with the contract, and to reject such as fail to comply therewith.

3. Sales \S 357(1)—Burden is upon seller in suit for purchase price to establish that the goods furnished were of kind and quality stipulated for.

The burden of proof is upon the seller, in a suit to recover the purchase price of goods sold by him, to establish that the goods furnished are of the kind and quality stipulated for.

Error to Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Action by the Regent Waist Company against the O. J. Morrison Department Store Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Morton & Mohler, of Charleston, for plaintiff in error.

Elmer L. Stone, of Charleston, for defendant in error.

RITZ, P. On the 2d day of October, 1917, the plaintiff's representative called at the storeroom of the defendant in the city of Charleston, and exhibited to defendant's general manager, and the person in charge of the ladies' waist department, certain samples of ladies' waists, with a view of making sales of this character of goods to the defendant. After an inspection of these samples, defendant's general manager gave an order to plaintiff's representative for 2 dozen white waists, stock No. 1138, at the price of $2.25 each; 2 dozen flesh-colored waists, stock No. 1138, at the price of $2.25 each; 2 dozen white waists, stock No. 1142, at the price of $3 each; 2 dozen flesh-colored waists, stock No. 1142, at the price of $3 each; 1½ dozen white waists, stock No. 2074, at the price of $2.25 each; 1½ dozen flesh-colored waists, stock No. 2074, at $2.25 each; 1½ dozen white waists, stock No. 1120, at $3 each; 1½ dozen flesh-colored waists, stock No. 1120, at $3 each; and 1½ dozen white waists, stock No. 1140, at $3.50 each. Of this order the 2 dozen white waists and 2 dozen flesh-colored waists of stock No. 1138, and the 1½ dozen white waists and 1½ dozen flesh-colored waists of stock No. 1120 were to be shipped at once, and the remainder of the order in two weeks. A very few days after this order was given, the waists which were to be shipped at once, as aforesaid, together with the 2 dozen flesh-colored waists of stock No. 1142, were received by the defendant. Upon their receipt the package was opened and examined by defendant's general manager and the woman in charge of its waist department, and, according to their testimony, the 1½ dozen white waists of stock No. 1120, and the 1½ dozen flesh-colored waists of stock No. 1120, were inferior in quality to the sample from which the order was made, and were also different in style, and for this reason the defendant immediately returned these two lots of waists to the plaintiff, and notified it of such return, and of the reason therefor. Shortly thereafter the remainder of the order was shipped and was received by the defendant, with the exception that instead of 2 dozen white waists of stock No. 1142, as provided in the order, only 1½ dozen were included, and the 1½ dozen, of stock No. 1140, was not included. Upon the receipt of this shipment the defendant's general manager and the woman in charge of its waist department examined the same and found, according to their testimony, that the 1½ dozen white waists of stock No. 1142, included in this shipment, were not in accordance with the sample, being different in style and inferior in quality. The defendant thereupon immediately returned these 18 waists, and notified the plaintiff thereof, and of the reason therefor. The remainder of the goods were retained by the defendant.

It was provided in the contract that defendant was to have 8 per cent. discount for payment within a certain time. Within the time provided the defendant deducted 8 per cent. from the cost price of the waists retained by it and sent its check to the plaintiff for the residue. The plaintiff declined to receive this check, not because it was in the form of a check, but because, under its contention, all of the waists shipped by it were in accordance with the sample, and it insisted that the defendant must receive and pay for all of them. It also refused to receive the waists returned from the transportation company. The defendant refused to pay for the waists returned by it, and this suit was brought to recover the contract price for the whole number of waists shipped. The defendant, upon the trial, tendered the amount which it claimed was due the plaintiff for the waists retained, that is, the invoice price less 8 per cent. discount, and a trial was had as to the residue of the claim which resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendant.

The principal contention of the plaintiff is that the defendant must pay for all of the goods shipped to it, inasmuch as it received part of these goods and rejected the residue; that its reception of any part thereof bound it to receive all of them. The issue between the parties as to whether or not the waists that were returned were of the kind and quality ordered was submitted to the jury, which found for the defendant thereon. Plaintiff, however, contends that this can make no difference; that because of the fact that the defendant on the receipt of these goods retained some of them, it is bound to pay for all of them, whether they complied with the plaintiff's contract or not. And this presents the question of whether or not the contract under which the goods were purchased was separable. If it was an entire contract, that is to say, one which could not be divided for any purpose, then the defendant is bound by its acceptance of a part of the goods shipped. If, on the other hand, this contract is separable, and one part in no way dependent upon the other, the defendant had the right to reject such of the lots of goods as did not meet the warranty, and retain such as did meet the warranty. It would seem that when a sale is made as in this case of different kinds of goods, and a unit price fixed for those of each kind, that there would not of necessity be any such connection between the several kinds as would make it an entire contract. If it appears that the seller would not have sold a part of the goods ordered unless the whole order was taken, then it would be an entire contract. If there is such intimate connection between the several items ordered that it may fairly be assumed that the seller would not have made the contract unless all of the goods ordered were purchased, it can safely be said that the contract is entire. This rule is not an exclusive one, however. There may be other contracts which would be held to be entire, even though it might appear that the seller would have sold a less amount than that ordered had the purchaser desired it. Of this class are those cases where a definite quantity of a particular article, such as a certain number of bushels of wheat, or a certain number of tons of iron, are ordered at a unit price per bushel or per ton. It is ordinarily held that such contracts are entire if the delivery of the whole is made at one time, and that the purchaser must reject or accept the whole thereof. It is generally held, however, that where a contract consists of several distinct items, and the price to be paid is apportioned to each item according to the value thereof, and not as one unit in a whole, or a part of a round sum, the contract will ordinarily be regarded as severable, and this rule applies even though the contract may in some sense be entire if what is to be paid is clearly and distinctly apportioned to the different articles as such, and not to them as parts of one whole. 13 C. J. 563. In this case the defendant insists that each item of waists of different kinds should be treated as a separate order, and the price apportioned to each unit of this item would fix the measure of liability therefor, while the plaintiff contends that the whole order being taken at one time is an entire contract, and that designation of different kinds of waists cannot have the effect of separating it into separate orders for waists of the separate kinds. There is no suggestion in this case that the plaintiff would not have sold the defendant the waists which were actually retained by it at the very same price at which it did sell them, if defendant had not ordered the waists which were rejected. In other words, it does not appear that the price of any particular lot of these waists was dependent upon the defendant giving the order which it did give. We can see no good reason for holding, in a case like this, that because the order was taken on one piece of paper it must be treated as an entire order, and the defendant required to accept or reject every item thereof. The rule that such a contract is separable where it is made up of several distinct items, and the price to be paid for each item is affixed thereto, in accordance with its value, seems to us to be based upon sound principles of common sense. It is a well-recognized doctrine that it is the duty of a party to a contract who has been injured by a breach thereof upon the part of the other party to, as far as possible, minimize the damages. The rule contended for by the plaintiff would require the aggrieved party to aggravate the damages as much as possible, for it insists that the defendant should have rejected all of these goods, and then sued for damages for breach of the contract upon the part of the plaintiff. Suppose in a contract like this that the buyer had an extensive trade which would be lost to him if he had rejected all of the articles shipped. It is well known that such articles as are involved in this suit can only be sold at certain seasons. It would be unable to supply its trade by going into the market and repurchasing the articles, for the reason that by the time they could be supplied to him by some one else his customers would have made their purchases elsewhere. By retaining such of the items as met the requirements of the contract he could supply his trade to that extent and save the plaintiff the damages which would necessarily result if he was unable to meet the demands of any of his customers for this class of goods. In other words, under the plaintiff's theory, the defendant must reject all of the goods, and the plaintiff would be liable, if any single item thereof failed to meet the requirements of the contract, for all of the damages which the defendant would sustain by reason of lost profits on the sales of all of the articles; while, under the theory of the defendant, plaintiff would be relieved of any damages on account of those items in the order which met the requirements of the contract. We can conceive of no principle of convenience or necessity which makes it necessary to create a situation which would inflict upon one of the parties to a contract a hardship which could be so easily avoided. Why create a situation which would result in a damage suit of substantial magnitude when the same can very simply be reduced to a claim for damages inconsiderable in extent without injuriously affecting the status of either of the parties? An examination of the books leads us to the conclusion that not only is the defendant's contention based on reason, but it is well supported by authority.

[1] In Hammon on Contracts, at section 463, the author says:

"If a contract, although evidenced by one instrument, is severable into distinct and independent contracts, it is said to be divisible, rather than entire. A breach of one of these independent contracts does not constitute a breach of another, and a breach of one is actionable without reference to the performance of the others. The principal feature of a divisible contract is that either party, having fully performed any one of the several agreements into which the contract may be divided, may sue thereon for its breach by the other party, without pleading or proving performance on his (plaintiff's) part of all the several agreements.

"If the consideration of a contract is single, the contract is, generally speaking, entire and indivisible, whatever the number of items embraced in its subject, and the promises involved in an entire contract are mutual and dependent. If, however, the part of a contract to be performed by one party consists of several and distinct items, and the consideration to be paid by the other party is apportioned to each item to be performed, or is left to be implied under the law, the contract is generally held to be severable or divisible; and the failure of the promisor to perform one item does not entitle the other party to rescind the contract, and refuse to accept further performance, nor discharge him from the obligation of paying for the other items, if they have been performed."

In 2 Elliott on Contracts, § 1544, the same doctrine is stated as follows:

"The divisibility of the subject-matter, while not controlling, is frequently of importance in determining the intention of the parties. Generally when the part to be performed by the promisor consists of several distinct items and the price to be paid is apportioned to each item according to its value and not as a part of a lump sum, the contract is considered as several."

And Prof. Williston, in his work on Contracts (volume 2, § 1719), also announces the same doctrine:

"The bargain though contemplating but a single delivery may contemplate several distinct sales, several dissociated things being ordered or contracted for, each for a distinct price. Here acceptance of part will not justify any implication of assent to become owner of the remainder, or of discharge of the seller from his legal duty with reference to the remainder. If some of the goods tendered are not in accordance with the contract, the buyer is generally held entitled to accept such of the articles tendered as fulfill the seller's obligation and reject those which do not."

[2] We conclude that the contract in this case was severable, at least to the extent that the defendant undertook to so treat it. It will be noted that it did not break any one of the items contained in the order, but either rejected each item entire, or accepted it entire. Whether each separate garment would constitute a separate part of the contract we are not called upon to say. It may be that a contract such as this could only be severed to the extent that was done by the defendant in this case, that is, into the separate items contained in the order, and not into the separate articles composing each of these items.

The plaintiff relies upon the case of Manse-Bruning Shoe Co. v. Prince, 51 W. Va. 510, 41 S. E. 907, as controlling this case in its favor, and point 3 of the syllabus in that case would seem to justify this conclusion. The facts in that case, however, were exceptional. Prince's conduct in regard to accepting or rejecting the goods was equivocal. He did not, as the plaintiff did here, upon finding that they did not answer the requirement of the contract, immediately reject those lots which were not of the quality bought, and return them, but he entered into negotiations with the shoe company in regard thereto, and even when he did finally return the same he kept some of the lots, and some of the very shoes which he claimed were of inferior quality. Under these exceptional circumstances the court held this conduct amounted to an acceptance of the whole. The syllabus of the case must be read in the light of the facts which the court was considering, and so construed. The statement contained in point 3 is broader than the facts in that case required, and in considering it it should be limited in its meaning as applying to the case made. The case of Ohio River River Contract Co. v. Smith, 76 W. Va. 503, 85 S. E. 671, also relied upon, is not applicable to this case. That was a sale of a quantity of piling at so much per ton. It was not a sale of separate pieces of piling at so much per piece, as is the case here. It was the kind of a contract which is ordinarily held to be entire.

The plaintiff insists that the question as to whether or not this contract was severable or entire was one of law for the court, and that the court erred in submitting the same to the jury. We agree with the plaintiff in this conclusion. Under the facts proven here, there was no question to be submitted to the jury as to the entirety or severability of this contract. It was one of construction for the court. The jury, however, gave the contract the only construction which we think it will bear, and the action of the court in submitting the question to the jury has resulted in no injury to the plaintiff.

[3] The plaintiff also claims that the court erred in instructing the jury that the burden was upon it to establish that the goods which it furnished was of the kind and quality sold. We do not think there is any error in this. This suit was brought to recover for goods shipped upon a contract, and it is the ordinary rule of practice that when one seeks to recover upon a contract for the sale of goods he must show that the goods delivered by him in fulfillment of the contract were of the kind and quality stipulated for.

It is also insisted by the plaintiff that it is entitled at least to recover the discount which the defendant deducted from the invoice price of the goods accepted by it. We cannot agree with this conclusion. A check was sent to pay for these goods within the period allowed for discount, and was rejected by the plaintiff, not because it was a check, but because the defendant, according to its theory, must pay for all of the goods. Under this state of facts, the defendant having made good its claim that the merchandise rejected was not of the quality purchased by it, the plaintiff was in default in not accepting the payment at the time it was offered, and cannot, by its refusal so to accept it, deprive the defendant of the discount allowed by the contract.

We find no error in the judgment complained of, and the same is affirmed.

ROUND BOTTOM COAL & COKE CO. et al.
v. BEN FRANKLIN COAL CO. OF WEST VIRGINIA.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 22, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Quieting title §34(1) — Allegation that plaintiff is in "possession" held sufficient allegation of actual possession.

The allegation in a bill to remove cloud upon title to land that plaintiff is in possession thereof, prima facie means actual possession, and on demurrer constitutes sufficient allegation of actual possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Possession.]

2. Equity §233—General demurrer to bill setting up several grounds for relief challenges bill as a whole.

A general demurrer to a bill setting up several grounds for relief challenges the sufficiency of the bill as a whole and does not call for adjudication as to the sufficiency of each one of the several parts, and if one ground be good, the general demurrer is properly overruled.

Case Certified from Circuit Court, Marshall County.

Suit by the Round Bottom Coal & Coke Company and others against the Ben Franklin Coal Company of West Virginia. Case certified as to correctness of order overruling defendant's demurrer. Rulings affirmed, and case recertified.

McCamie & Clarke, of Wheeling, for plaintiffs.

D. B. Evans and Charles E. Carrigan, both of Moundsville, and James Balph, of Pittsburgh, Pa., for defendant.

MILLER, J. The circuit court has certified to us the correctness of its ruling upon the defendants' demurrer to plaintiffs' bill.

The main object of the bill was to set aside and have removed as clouds upon plaintiffs' title to the coal under a tract of land known as the "Potts Tract," situated in Marshall County, two deeds dated April 14, 1919, of record in said county, in Deed Book No. 155, at pages 51 and 53 respectively; the first executed by defendant Kate Higgins, widow of the late John Higgins, to the defendant Ben Franklin Coal Company of West Virginia; the second executed by Houston Higgins, Grayce Hoffman and Everett Hoffman, her husband, and Marie Keffer and William Keffer, her husband, heirs at law of said John Higgins, deceased, to the same company; whereby Kate Higgins, grantor in the first deed, purported to convey to the grantee therein all her dower right, title and interest in and to all the coal of which said John Higgins died seized in fee simple together with all her right, title and interest in and to the mining rights appurtenant thereto and thereunto belonging, the same being all that part of said coal which was conveyed by David Roberts and wife to Simeon B. Purdy, by deed dated January 7, 1843, and subsequently through mesne conveyances to said John Higgins, and being that part of the said coal remaining after the conveyance by said John Higgins and wife to James W. Wiley, of the coal under a tract of thirteen (13) acres and eighty-seven (87) poles, with mining privileges, and the coal under a tract of 228½ acres adjoining the first tract, with like mining privileges, by two deeds, both dated May 5, 1902, the first recorded in said Marshall County in Deed Book No. 128, page 282, and the second recorded in said county in Deed Book No. 84, page 428; and whereby the said Houston Higgins and others, grantees in the second deed, purported to grant and convey to said Ben Franklin Coal Company all their three-fifths undivided interest with like mining rights and to the same coal so remaining vested in said John Higgins at the time of his death, more definitely described as that part of the coal underlying that part of the larger tract known as the "Potts Farm."

The said bill also seeks to have cancelled and removed as clouds on plaintiffs' title to the coal under the "Potts Farm" so much of two other deeds executed by the widow and heirs of said John Higgins since his death, the first a deed to J. M. Williamson in fee for the surface of 72.82 acres, recorded in said county in Deed Book No. 137 at page 280, the second to A. H. Ferris in fee for 169.22 acres of surface, which included the surface of the 13 acres and 87 poles, recorded in Deed Book No. 141 at page 466, as purported to reserve to the grantors "a right of way or entry in and through said tract or parcel of land hereby conveyed, under the surface thereof, to the tract known as the Potts land, at such points and in such manner, under the surface, as may be necessary or useful so that the coal within and underlying the said Potts land may be mined and taken away through said right of way or entry or entries," and also that part of said deed to said Ferris providing as follows:

"Also reserving * * * the right to mine and operate on that part of the aforesaid land heretofore conveyed to the said John Higgins and described in the deed conveying the same as containing 13 acres 87 poles with the usual and customary mining rights and privileges, so as to enable the said grantors, their heirs, personal representatives and assigns to mine and remove the coal within and underlying the Potts land, and if any surface of the 13 A. 87 poles of land shall be used in the mining and removing of the said Potts coal, the same to be paid for at the rate of $25 per acre, which payment shall be made before the said land is occupied and shall entitle the said grantors, their heirs, personal representatives and assigns to a deed in fee for the part so taken and used."

The bill further alleges that the several deeds and proceedings which it seeks to have removed as clouds on plaintiffs' title to the coal under the Potts Farm were made and executed since the decision here of the case of Higgins v. Round Bottom Coal & Coke Co., reported in 63 W. Va. at page 218, 59 S. E. 1064, giving construction to the deed of David Roberts to Simeon B. Purdy, dated January 7, 1843, for the 13 acres and 87 poles, part of said 400 acre tract, as shown in the opinion in that case, the particular provision in which, now relied on by defendants, thereby construed, is as follows:

"Also the privilege, should the said Purdy, his heirs or assigns, open a coal mine on said tract of land, of undermining southward beyond the lines of said tract of land so far as not to injure the tract of land of which this was a part and now taken from."

In the former case, as in this, the questions presented were by the demurrer to the bill. In the former case we were careful not to in any way conclude the parties on the merits of the case. We quote from the opinion the following:

"What is here said is predicated on the allegations of the bill. The answer and evidence adduced hereafter, if any, may wholly alter the case."

The bill now before us exhibits the record of the subsequent proceedings of the circuit court in the former case after it was certified back for further proceedings, showing that defendants answered and took evidence in support thereof, and that plaintiffs took no proof in support of their bill; but that when the case was matured for hearing on defendants' answer and evidence, plaintiffs were permitted by order of the court to dismiss the suit without prejudice; and it is alleged in the bill that by the dismissal thereof nothing was decreed concluding the parties, and that the rights of the parties remained the same as if the suit had never been brought or prosecuted on appeal to this court on the demurrer to the bill, sustained below but here overruled.

The question now certified is whether in view of our holding in the former case the present bill presents any basis for equity jurisdiction or for the relief prayed for. Construed in the light of the provisions of the deed there involved and the facts alleged in relation thereto, and particularly with reference to the map exhibited with the present bill purporting to show the location of the 13 acres and 87 poles with reference to the lines by which the coal in question was to be determined, we decided that the privilege or grant of coal beyond the lines of the tract specifically included the title to the coal in the residue of the larger tract of which the 13 acres and 87 poles was a part lying southwest as well as south of the granted parcel and withheld the right to make openings in said residue for mining purposes, by prescribing the mode of removal of the coal to be by means of an opening to be made in the parcel granted. That decision, as now interpreted by defendants, if they may rely thereon, would cover most if not all of the coal under the Potts Farm claimed by them. But the bill here exhibits a map or survey of the land granted, and of the lots into which the original 400 acres was divided, and with reference to which it is alleged the coal under lot No. 1, the 13 acres and 87 poles, and also under No. 3, the 228½ acre tract, was conveyed by Higgins to Wiley on May 5, 1902, and applying the rules for interpreting the deed followed in our decision in the former case, a very large portion of the coal under the Potts Farm would not be covered by the reservation or grant contained in the deed from Roberts to Purdy, of 1843. So that if the allegations of the present bill be true and the lines of the 400 acre tract are correctly shown on the map of the survey thereof exhibited with the bill, the deeds of the widow and heirs of Higgins, of April 14, 1919, and the reservations in the deeds to Williamson and Ferris would constitute clouds on the title of plaintiffs to all of the coal under that part of the Potts Farm which would not fall within the extended lines of the 13 acres and 87 poles as shown on the said map and survey, and to that extent at least the bill presents good ground for relief, provided of course the possession by plaintiffs be well pleaded and then established by proof.

[1] For the purposes of the demurrer all matters well pleaded must be taken to be true. The first point of demurrer is that the fact of actual possession by plaintiffs is not sufficiently alleged, wherefore the right to relief by removal of cloud is not shown by the bill. The bill here does allege that plaintiffs were in possession of the coal. In Sansom v. Blankenship, 53 W. Va. 411, 44 S. E. 408, following Moore v. McNutt, 41 W. Va. 695, 24 S. E. 682, we held that the allegation that plaintiffs were in possession, prima facie meant actual possession. So that on demurrer we must accept the allegation of the bill as to possession as the equivalent of an allegation of actual possession, and our opinion is that this point of demurrer was properly overruled by the circuit court. It is argued in this connection also that plaintiffs do not show clear title to the coal. But if the facts be as alleged, and as they must be regarded on demurrer, plaintiffs do have clear title to at least a greater part of the coal under the Potts Farm, not from Higgins or the Higgins heirs it is true, but by deed from J. B. Potts and wife, of April 1, 1903; and the only adverse title or claim of defendants, so far as the bill shows, was derived by the deed of the Higgins heirs, made subsequently and depending on the true interpretation and the application thereof to the ground of the privilege or grant conveyed in the deed from Roberts to Purdy, of 1843. If the allegations of the bill be true, there is certainly coal under the Potts Farm not covered by the deed of the Higgins heirs to the defendant company, wherefore there is equity in the bill to remove cloud from plaintiffs' title thereto.

[2] Plaintiffs' counsel in argument have appealed to us to settle and adjudicate finally the rights of the parties on all issues presented by the bill and exhibits. This we can not do, of course. The demurrer was general and in no way limited to any particular issue. For instance, we are requested to decide whether or not the grant to plaintiff Wiley of the coal under the 13 acres and 87 poles and under the 228½ acres divested the Higginses of all right and title to take coal from any of the land outside of or beyond the boundaries of those deeds and of all mining privileges to remove any coal through or over those tracts from adjoining lands. The defendants' demurrer might have been both general and specific as to those questions, but it was general, and the general demurrer would not reach the specific questions sought to be presented. As we held in City of Wheeling v. Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co., 82 W. Va. 208, point 6 of the syllabus, 95 S. E. 653:

"A general demurrer to a bill in equity setting up several grounds for relief challenges the sufficiency of the bill as a whole and does not call for adjudication as to the sufficiency of each of the several parts."

If we might properly respond to the specific question thus sought to have decided, it would be inadvisable to do so, for the whole case may be changed on the answer and proofs at final hearing; and indeed on the question of possession the plaintiffs may not be able to establish by proof the fact of possession entitling them to relief in equity to remove a cloud, and the case may never reach a final decision on the rights of the parties.

Wherefore we are of opinion to affirm the ruling below on the demurrer, and to so certify our decision to the circuit court.

BRADFORD v. STATE. (No. 2290.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Criminal law §1129(3)—Assignment of error in refusing to instruct on involuntary manslaughter insufficient where no specification as to grade.

An assignment of error complaining that the court did not charge the law of involuntary manslaughter is not a good one where no grade of involuntary manslaughter is specified.

2. Criminal law §1129(3)—Assignment on admission of evidence must show objection raised at time.

An assignment of error complaining of the admission of certain evidence over the objection of defendant's counsel is insufficient where it does not appear from the assignment what objection was raised at the time of the admission of the evidence.

3. Criminal law §815(11)—Instruction held not to exclude defendant's statement as to accidental killing.

In a homicide case, where defendant contended in his statement that the homicide was accidentally committed through misfortune, accident, or misadventure, an instruction as to the certainty of the evidence necessary to convict held not erroneous as excluding from the minds of the jury the statement of the defendant, or as having that tendency.

4. Criminal law §782(10)—Instruction as to evidence sufficient in civil case held not reversible error.

The giving of an instruction in a homicide case that "in all civil cases the preponderance of the testimony is considered sufficient to produce mental conviction" held not reversible error.

Error from Superior Court, Wilkes County; B. F. Walker, Judge.

Will Bradford was convicted of murder and brings error. Affirmed.

Some of the grounds for new trial were as follows:

IV. Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "If, after going over all the evidence, facts, and circumstances of the case, applying the rules of law given you in charge theretofore, if you have resting on your minds a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendant, you should give him the benefit of that doubt and acquit him. Now, when I say a reasonable doubt, the law does not mean some mere vague conjecture or possibility that might arise, but such a doubt as arises in an honest juror's mind, seeking for the truth, and leaves it wavering and in doubt. It may arise from having heard the evidence, the want, weakness, or insufficiency of the evidence. In this connection the law does not mean nor are you required as trial jurors before you find the defendant guilty, you must find him guilty to a mathematical certainty. Moral and reasonable certainty is all that the law requires. So, if in this case, if you should find the defendant guilty to a moral and reasonable certainty, and that beyond a reasonable doubt, it would be your duty to find the defendant guilty; if not, it would be equally your duty to acquit him."

The defendant excepts to this charge because the said charge excluded from the minds of the jury the statement of the defendant, or had that tendency. The defendant contends that the court nowhere in its charge to the jury instructed them on the defendant's contention on the trial of the case. The defendant contended in his statement before the jury that the homicide was accidentally committed through misfortune, accident, and misadventure, so the foregoing charge excluded forever from the minds of the jury the defendant's statements and contention in the case. The court nowhere in its charge to the jury instructed them on the defendant's contention on the trial of the case. The court nowhere in its charge to the jury referred to the contention of the defendant and simply charged on accidental homicide without charging the contention of the defendant in his statement. For all of these reasons the defendant assigns the foregoing charge as error.

V. Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "In all civil cases the preponderance of the testimony is considered sufficient to produce mental conviction."

The defendant contends that the foregoing charge refers to civil cases, and not to criminal cases, and for that reason the charge is excepted to.

HILL, J. Will Bradford was indicted and tried for the crime of murder. The jury returned a verdict of guilty, with recommendation that he be sent to the penitentiary for life. The defendant made a motion for new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

[1] 1. Error is assigned because the court did not charge the law of involuntary manslaughter. No grade of involuntary manslaughter is specified; and the assignment of error is therefore not a good one. Troup v. State, 150 Ga. 633, 104 S. E. 421.

[2] 2. Error is assigned on the admission of certain evidence over the objection of the defendant's counsel. It does not appear from the assignment what objection was raised at the time of the admission of the evidence, and for that reason the assignment is insufficient.

[3, 4] 3. The other assignments are without merit.

SHINHOLSER et al. v. HENRY et al.
(No. 2076.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 3, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Insurance §777—Objection that beneficiary was ineligible could be raised only by fraternal organization.

Where, on death of member of a fraternal organization, a person originally designated as a beneficiary and two other persons subsequently substituted as beneficiaries claimed the amount payable on the certificate, and the order filed its petition for interpleader and deposited the amount of the certificate in court, the substituted beneficiaries cannot raise any objection as to the eligibility of the person first named to be a beneficiary under the by-laws of the order, for such objection could be raised only by the order itself, and by the deposit in court the order waives the objection.

2. Trial §110—Question not objectionable as being appeal to sympathies of jury.

In an action between beneficiaries in a fraternal benefit certificate, court did not err in permitting one of the beneficiaries to testify, in answer to questions put by counsel, that she loved the deceased, and that she loved him as a daughter loved her father, as against an objection that questions were a patent appeal to the sympathies of the jury.

3. Evidence ¶471(14)—Testimony as to coherence of person's talk held not mere opinion.

A witness was properly permitted to testify that a certain person talked incoherently most of the time, but sometimes would talk naturally, as against an objection that the question called for an opinion, and that the answer was merely an opinion.

4. Evidence ¶471(12)—Evidence as to father's affection for child held not mere opinion.

Question, "What was the character and kind of association and relationship?" was not objectionable as calling for an opinion, and an answer, "Just like any other fond parent for his daughter, he was very fond of her, and foolish about her, and we all knew he was," was not objectionable as an opinion and conclusion.

5. Appeal and error ¶1064(4)—Errors in instructions on immaterial matter not harmful.

Errors in instructions as to immaterial matters are not reversible error.

6. Insurance ¶826(1)—Instruction as to mental ability to substitute beneficiaries held properly refused.

In an action between original and substituted beneficiaries in a fraternal benefit certificate, where the vital issues in the case were whether insured was mentally incapable of making the change in beneficiaries, or whether he was induced to make it by undue influence or fraud practiced upon him, court did not err in refusing written requests to charge, "Unless you believe from the evidence in the case that there was on the part of S. at that time such a mental condition as to betray a total want of understanding, or idiocy, or delusion, his mind could not be called unsound," and "Unless you believe from the evidence in the case that at the time of such signing S. was of unsound mind, you should find in favor of the validity of the change of beneficiaries."

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; H. A. Mathews, Judge.

Action by M. S. Henry and others against J. W. Shinholser and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Some of the assignments of error were as follows:

(7) Because the court erred in admitting in evidence, over the objection of movants, the following testimony of Mary B. Henry, one of the contestants for the fund in court: "Q. Did you love Samuel D. Shinholser? A. Yes; I did. Q. Did you love him as a daughter loves her father? A. I did." To the question, "Did you love him as a daughter loves her father?" movant objected, on the ground that it was a patent appeal to the sympathies of the jury and utterly irrelevant. Said objection was overruled by the court, with the statement: "I think she can testify as to her affection for him, if for no other reason to combat the proposition she willfully neglected him." Movants contend that the admission of said testimony was error, and prejudicial to movants, because the affection or feeling of Mrs. Henry for Mr. Shinholser could not be relevant to illustrate either her dependency upon him, or his mental capacity to change the beneficiary originally named in the certificate, or the influence, if any, brought to bear on him to induce such change, but could only appeal to the sympathy of the jury, to influence them to award the fund to her by reason of the affection she claimed to have for the insured.

(8) Because the court erred in admitting in evidence the following testimony of Mrs. Mary B. Henry, one of the contestants to the fund in court, over the objection of movants: "Q. State whether or not he talked, when he did voluntarily talk, did he talk incoherently, or did he talk naturally and normally? A. Most of the time he talked incoherently; sometimes he would talk naturally." To the question and answer movants objected, because the question called for an opinion, and the answer was merely an opinion. The admission of said testimony was error, and prejudicial to movants, because the said Mrs. Henry was permitted to state her mere conclusion and opinion as to a matter involving the mental condition of Mr. Shinholser, without stating any facts from which the jury might determine whether his talk was incoherent or not.

(9) Because the court erred in admitting in evidence the following testimony of Mrs. J. L. Grace, a witness for Mrs. Mary B. Henry, over objection of movants: "Q. What was the character and kind of association and relationship? (between Samuel D. Shinholser and Mrs. Henry). A. Just like any other fond parent for his daughter; he was very fond of her and foolish about her, and we all knew he was." To the question and answer movants objected, because the question called for an opinion, and the answer was an opinion, and the answer was an opinion and conclusion of the witness.

Jones, Park & Johnston, and Richard Curd, all of Macon, for plaintiffs in error.

FISH, C. J. [1] 1. The objection that the beneficiary named in the certificate issued by a fraternal beneficiary order was ineligible under its by-laws can be raised only by the order itself; and an admission of liability on the part of the order, and payment of the fund into court, is a waiver of any objection to the beneficiary. Johnson v. Knight of Honor, 53 Ark. 255, 13 S. W. 794, 8 L. R. A. 732; Knights of Honor v. Watson, 64 N. H. 517, 15 Atl. 125; Tepper v. Royal Arcanum, 61 N. J. Eq. 638, 47 Atl. 460, 88 Am. St. Rep. 675; Johnson v. Van Epps, 110 Ill. 551 (4), 563; 1 Cooley, Ins. Briefs, 320, 815, 816. See Doody Co. v. Green, 131 Ga. 568, 62 S. E. 984; Dell v. Varnedoe, 148 Ga. 91, 95 S. E. 977; Depee v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W., 106 Iowa, 747, 78 N. W. 798; Order of Patriarchs v. Davis, 129 Mich. 818, 88 N. W. 874; Fischer v. Malchow, 98 Minn. 396, 101 N. W. 602; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Wolfe, 203 Pa. 269, 52 Atl. 247; Schardt v. Schardt, 100 Tenn. 276, 45 S. W. 340.

(a) Accordingly, where, on the death of a member of a fraternal order, a person originally designated as a beneficiary in the member's certificate, and two other persons subsequently named therein as substituted beneficiaries in place of the original beneficiary, claim the amount payable on the certificate, and the order thereupon files its petition for interpleader against such persons, and deposits the amount of the certificate in court, it thereby waives any objection as to the eligibility of the person first named to be a beneficiary under its by-laws, and the substituted beneficiaries cannot raise such objection.

[2-4] 2. The errors assigned on the admission of evidence are not meritorious, and are not of such character as to require special consideration.

[5] 3. In several of the grounds of the motion for new trial error is assigned upon the instructions of the court to the jury on the question as to the eligibility of the person first named to be a beneficiary in the certificate. Even if such instructions were subject to the criticisms made thereon, that question, under the ruling above made, was immaterial, and the instructions do not appear to have been harmful to the movant.

4. There was ample evidence to authorize the instructions as to the alleged mental incapacity of the insured to make a change as to the beneficiaries in the certificate, and also as to alleged undue influence and fraud practiced upon him to induce him to make such change.

5. Sam B. Shinholser, deceased, was the member to whom the benefit certificate was issued. Mrs. Mary Henry, formerly Shinholser, was named as the original beneficiary, and designated as "daughter." John W. Shinholser and Robert L. Shinholser, designated as "brothers," were the beneficiaries named when the change as to beneficiaries was made by the insured. Vital issues in the case were whether the insured was mentally incapable of making the change in beneficiaries, or whether he was induced to make it by undue influence or fraud practiced upon him. In view of the pleadings, the evidence, and the entire charge given, there was no material error as against the movants, for any reasons assigned, in the instructions to which exceptions were taken.

[8] 6. The court did not err in refusing written requests to charge as follows:

(a) "Unless you believe from the evidence in the case that there was on the part of Samuel D. Shinholser at that time such a mental condition as to betray a total want of understanding, or idiocy, or delusion, his mind could not be called unsound."

(b) "Unless you believe from the evidence in the case that, at the time of such signing, Samuel D. Shinholser was of unsound mind, you should find in favor of the validity of the change of beneficiaries."

7. There was ample evidence to authorize the verdict, and the refusal of a new trial was not error.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Cancellation of Instruments \S 37(7)—Petition to declare deed void for insanity held good as against demurer.

Petition as amended in a suit to have a deed declared void on the ground that the grantor was insane at the time of the execution thereof held not subject to demurrer.

2. Decent and distribution \S 65 — Widow claiming entire estate under deed held not to elect to take one-fifth.

A widow, who based her entire defense to an action to set aside a deed on the condition that she was vested with the entire estate under the deed, which the jury found to be void, held not entitled to the benefit of the statute which provides that where there are more than 5 shares the widow shall be entitled upon election to one-fifth interest in the estate.

Error from Superior Court, Laurens County; J. L. Kent, Judge.

Suit by Estoria Walters and others against Mary Lawrence. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The petition alleged:

"(10) Petitioners further show that the defendant took advantage of the physical and mental condition of the deceased, having said deed prepared in the city of Dublin and being drawn for him to sign under the conditions and surroundings hereinbefore narrated, the said deed at the time of its execution being executed in secrecy so far as the members of the family were concerned."

Plaintiffs, after leave of the court first had and obtained, amended their original petition in the following particulars:

"(1) By adding at the end of the tenth paragraph and in connection therewith the following additional allegation, to wit: 'Petitioners further show in connection with said paragraph that the deceased was not only afflicted greatly in mind and body at the time of the execution of said deed and for some time prior thereto, but that his said wife by virtue of their confidential relations exercised a controlling influence over his will power, and was capable at all times of substituting her own will for his. That the defendant taking advantage of her own position and the enfeebled condition of the deceased who had been in convulsions during the night preceding the morning when said deed was executed, procured the same, thereby undertaking to deprive and defraud petitioners of their inheritance in said land, it being apparent at the time that the said J. E. Lawrence could live but a few days longer. Wherefore petitioners pray that this amendment be allowed.'"

—Statement by editor.

Ira S. Chappell, of Dublin, and Owens Johnson, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

R. Earl Camp, of Dublin, for defendants in error.

HILL, J. J. E. Lawrence died in March, 1916, leaving a wife and five children, Mrs. Estoria Walters and four others. During his life Lawrence executed a deed conveying the entire property in controversy to his wife, Mrs. Mary Lawrence, the defendant in the present case. The children of Mrs. Estoria Walters, deceased, and four others, brought suit against the widow for the recovery by each of a one-sixth undivided interest in the property; and they sought to have the deed declared void on the ground that the grantor was insane at the time of the execution thereof. A special demurrer to one paragraph of the petition was filed by the defendant, and was overruled after the petition was amended so as to meet the special demurrer. On the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence the defendant moved for a nonsuit which was refused, and the defendant excepted. The defendant then offered evidence, and the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff. A motion for new trial was overruled, and the defendant excepted. Held:

[1] 1. The special demurrer was met by the amendment to the petition.

2. The motion to nonsuit the case was properly overruled.

[2] 3. The second and only remaining special ground of the motion for new trial complains that the court erred in charging the jury that if they should find for the plaintiffs the latter would be entitled to recover five-sixths of the property in controversy; and this charge is criticized, first, on the ground that the evidence showed that there were more than five shares in the estate under consideration, and, second, that under the statute which provides that where there are more than five shares the widow shall be entitled, upon election, to a one-fifth interest in the estate, the defendant in this case was entitled to the one-fifth, and that consequently the other heirs, the plaintiffs in this case, could not be entitled to one-sixth each in the estate (meaning that they would be entitled to a one-fifth of the four-fifths remaining after the widow took her share). The first criticism is without merit, because the charge complained of distinctly recognizes that there are more than five shares, as contended by the defendant; and the second exception to the charge cannot avail the plaintiff in error here, because it does not appear from the record that the widow had made an election to take the one-fifth interest in the estate which might have been allowed her under an election, but based her entire defense upon the contention that she was vested with the entire estate under the deed which the jury found to be void. *Hanvy v. COMER et al. v. COMER. (No. 2132.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

Habeas corpus ~~§~~99(1)—Court did not err in awarding custody of child to mother.

In habeas corpus proceeding instituted by a wife, who had separated from her husband, against her husband and his mother for the custody of a female infant 8 years of age, where defendants alleged that plaintiff had voluntarily surrendered and abandoned the child, and was emotional, erratic, lacking in love for the child, and temperamentally unsuited to have its custody, and without means to support it, held that court did not err in awarding the custody of the child to the wife.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; P. W. Meldrim, Judge.

Habeas corpus proceedings by Pauline O. Comer against Arthur F. Comer and another for the custody of a female infant three years of age. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants brings error. Affirmed.

Petition by Pauline O. Comer against her husband Arthur F. Comer and his mother Carmine E. Comer to obtain custody of a female infant three years of age, the child of the husband and wife, in which she alleged that she and her husband were living in a bona fide state of separation, and that the husband and mother-in-law were wrongfully restraining the child of her liberty and keeping her illegally from the custody of the petitioner.

Respondents in their answer admitted that they refused to deliver the child into the custody of petitioner; that plaintiff voluntarily delivered the child into the custody and control of the respondents; that plaintiff is emotional, erratic, lacking in love and affection for the child, and is temperamentally unsuited to have its custody, and is without means to support, maintain, and educate it; that the associations and environments in which the child would be placed would not be for its good, happiness, and welfare; and that respondents are devoted to the child, and able and willing financially to support it.

The evidence was as follows:

Mrs. Pauline Comer, the plaintiff, having been duly sworn, testified as follows:

My little girl is being kept by Mrs. Comer, my mother-in-law, against my will. I did not voluntarily surrender, permanently, the care, custody, and control of the child to Mrs. Comer. I have endeavored to get them to let me have my baby. My baby is 3 years old, a little girl. She needs a mother's care. I am able to take care of her.

Cross-examination: My child was born on the 21st of January, 3 years ago, the year 1917. My husband left for the war a year ago, last July—I think it was on the 16th of July, 16th of July, 1919. It was not earlier than that—I think it was a year ago, last July. I don't remember that it was in the year 1918—I thought it was a year ago last July. It was in 1918 when my husband left for the war. I was living up at Newport News at the time my husband left; I had gone to see him off. We had no definite plans as to where my residence would be while he was away; the idea was that I was to come to Savannah and look for board. I was to live here in Savannah; I was to board here in Savannah. I don't remember discussing with him the question of leaving my child while he was away and taking up a career on the operatic stage. I don't remember that subject having been discussed between us before he left for the war. I have a vague recollection of one time—some months before he left—discussing about going to New York, but I don't remember what was said. I don't think he insisted, while discussing the matter with me, that the welfare of my child, while he was away, required that I should not take up any musical career. I don't remember the thing being discussed at all. I did not find a place to live when I came back to Savannah to look for a place; I came and went out to my mother-in-law's, Mrs. Comer. I lived there for a week with her until I made my plans to go North. I made my plans to go North because I was very unhappy and restless, and I felt I would like to study singing. My child then was about 21 months old. About how she was nourished at that time, she was pretty well so far as I know; she was not sick. She was a bottle baby—she was eating things. She was still taking the bottle and eating almost anything that was wholesome for her. I had not left the child with the grandparents while I was in Newport News; I took the baby up there with me. I thought that her father would like to see her before he went to France. When I came back I went to the mountains a few weeks before I went to New York, and I took the baby with me, because she was up there at Newport News with me, and I wanted her with me. There was no reason why I should have the baby with me in the mountains—I had her with me in the mountains. I came back from the mountains I think it was the last day of August. I went to New York on the 8th of September. I lived with my mother-in-law when I came back from the mountains before I went to New York. When I was living with my mother-in-law I said I wanted to study singing while my husband was gone. I thought that was a good time to do so. I wanted to study, and everybody told me I ought to do it. So I left the child with my mother-in-law to care for her, because while in New York I would have to stay in a boarding house, and I knew, while I was gone, that the baby would be well cared for by my mother-in-law. My mother-in-law didn't insist that was not the proper course for me to pursue, and that my place was at home while my husband was away. I didn't say that my musical career was more to me than anything in the world; didn't say to my mother-in-law that my musical career was more to me than anything in the world. I didn't ask her to take the child and keep the child, and that I would surrender to her all custody, care, and control of the child; I had no permanent idea about it. I didn't make a similar statement to Mr. Joseph Comer, a brother of my husband. I never made a statement that I was permanently giving up my baby to anybody. I didn't tell them anything like that, if they didn't take the child and keep it, I would have to make another disposition of it; that I was going on the operatic stage. I wrote the letter that you show me. I wrote those letters. I was absent 6 months. I heard from my husband during the time I was away. I haven't those letters, because I didn't want to see them; I destroyed them all. When I came back to Savannah I went to see my child first; I went right there from the station. After I got back to Savannah I did not have a place where I could keep my child. I am living with my father, and if the child was turned over to me, awarded to me, I have a place to take her to now. If the child was awarded to me I would take it to my father. My father would live with me during the time I would have the custody of the child. He would be an inmate of the house with me. As to asking him to assist me in rearing and training the child, I don't think I would require any assistance; I don't consider that I would. If I needed help, I would, of course, call on him, but I don't think I need assistance. My father is a proper person to be around a house where a small child is to be reared. My father's habits as to morality are everything to be desired now. I don't know that my father associates, in a criminal way, with negro women. I don't know that he has done it. I have no knowledge on the subject at all. I never heard of it. My father never told me that he had made complaint against a negro woman for stealing money from him, and that, as a result of that complaint, they both had been tried and convicted of a criminal offense. I don't know that it is true. My mother-in-law did not endeavor to persuade me not to leave Savannah; I don't remember it if she did. She didn't tell me that was not my duty to my child or absent husband. While I was in New York my father gave me an allowance of—I have forgotten—about $35 a month, and my grandmother left me a little money, and I took some of that, and for the first three months I received some money from my husband, that he sent me to pay expenses, as I thought, and to pay certain debts. I paid $60 a month for board. My husband did not beg me to return to Savannah to my child. I came back because I wanted to be with my baby; I didn't want a musical career then. When I got up there I was unhappy away from my baby and unhappy the whole time I was gone. I didn't come back because I found out I would not be a success in a musical way. It is not true that if I had made the success I expected I never would have come back to Savannah. After I came back I was not absent from the child, away from the child, two or three weeks at a time without devoting any care to it at all, except my mother-in-law took her away with her; with the exception of that I have seen her every day since I came back from New York, except about two days out of a year. It is not true that I have brought these proceedings, not because I want to get my child, but because I wish to force my husband to return to me and live with me, purely and simple; I brought them because I want my baby. I didn't make any statement to Mr. Comer's brother that unless he returned to me that I would force him to do so by seeking to get custody of the child. I am a Christian Scientist. I did not make the statement that in the event my child fell down and broke her leg, or sustained other physical injury, I would have only a Christian Scientist healer to attend her for any injury of that kind. I never made any such statement as that.

Q. Are you not rather changeable and emotional, and, I may say, peculiar in your disposition? A. I have been; I suppose I have been impulsive because I was very young, but I am not that way any more. In the last few years I changed my religion from Catholic to Episcopalian and from Episcopalian to Christian Science. I did not join the Christian Church. I am a member of the Christian Science Church. I have become stable in that faith.

Mrs. William P. Comer, the defendant, having been duly sworn, testified as follows:

Mrs. Pauline Comer left the infant in my care because she intended to pursue a musical career in New York. She stated that she wanted to leave the child with me, to act as a mother to the child, and I said that I would do so. I was to have the care of the child, while she was pursuing her career; that she believed she could become an operatic star. She said, if successful in her career, it would take her away many years in training and also on the stage, and I would have the care of the baby during that time. The baby was a frail baby—she was not ill at the time. At the time that she left it was taking bottle food. It was indefinite at the time how long she contemplated leaving the child with me. She was absent from the child I think it was from September until the end of the following month. When she returned she came to me; her father came to me, and asked me to receive her, and I did. She came to my house. I allowed her to come to me. She stayed with me three weeks. She said she was going to pursue a business career—she was going to take up stenography. She was going to follow a business career as a stenographer. She went for that to a school in Savannah, called, I think, Ryan school. Presume her husband was able to provide for her and take care of her without pursuing that course. I have always cared for the child during the time that her mother left my house, and left the child in my care while she pursued a business career. The father furnished the means to support and take care of the child. I gave the child care and attention to the best of my ability. I have raised two sons. I am 49 years of age. My health is such as to enable me to take care of the child while in the custody of the father. I wish the child to remain in my custody. I think Mrs. Pauline Comer has been very inexperienced as to being a practical mother—the knowledge of how to rear and take care of a child. I say that simply because she has not done like most mothers do—take care of a child and not leave it. There was no necessity for her to leave the child with me and go on an operatic career. At the time she left there was no stated time for her return. If I had not taken the child I don't know what would have become of her. Her father came to me and asked if I would take the baby after she came back from New York, and I said that certainly I would. Mrs. Pauline Comer's temperament and disposition is emotional, erratic. Her attitude and demeanor towards the child was always affectionate when she came to it. I have not denied her access to the child. I think it would be better for the welfare of the child, in my opinion, for the child to remain in the custody of the father under my care. I am willing, if the father has the custody of the child to continue to give it care. As to whether or not there was any statement made by Mrs. Pauline Comer that she would ever return and claim the child, when she left she did not intend to return to Savannah; that she hoped her course would be successful, and did not expect to return to Savannah. The arrangement was that if I took the child in July I was to stop at Round Lake for her to see it. Not that I understood then was she to return to Savannah and return to take the child from me. Since my son's return I first learned that she had the intention of retaking the child from me. She did not at any time, while she was away, either by word or deed, signify her desire to retake the child from me. The child calls me Mother. She calls her own mother Pauline.

(No cross.)

Joseph H. Comer, a witness for the defendants, having been duly sworn, testified as follows:

I am Arthur M. Comer's brother. Mrs. Pauline Comer did make statement to me, before her departure for New York, as to the purpose of her departure. The statement was that she was going to New York to pursue a musical career, and that she never expected to return to Savannah again. About the child, she stated that she had given the child to my mother because she would not be able to take care of the child herself while pursuing her career. She did not mention how many years she would be absent in pursuing her career; she said she had decided to pursue the career; that she did not expect to come back to Savannah; she did not expect to return to Savannah again. She said that she was going to New York to pursue this career. I live in my mother's home, where this child is kept. I am a cotton shipper. The child receives every care and attention while the mother has been away from it. As to the condition of the child now compared with what it was when its mother left it, her health has wonderfully improved. I think I know the temperament of Mrs. Pauline Comer. I consider her emotional, erratic, and selfish. Selfish, because she considered her own desire for a musical career in preference to the welfare of the child. I consider my brother a very calm, conservative man and as unselfish as the average man. The handwriting you show me is my brother's. I did not advise Mrs. Pauline Comer to leave the baby with my mother on the idea that it would change the attitude of my brother towards his wife when he returned. I did not suggest that she leave the child with my mother. I did not make any suggestion about the child just before my brother's return nor after his return. I made no suggestion whatever. About the relations between Mr. Comer and wife and baby I mentioned that if I could bring them together again I would be glad to do it.

Redirect: Mrs. Pauline Comer threatened to take the child if my brother would not accede to her wishes. Her wishes were that he immediately make up with her and live together again, and I don't remember the rest. I only know the moral habits and character of Mrs. Pauline Comer's father from what I have heard. That reputation is bad. I would not be willing for an infant of mine to be reared in a home where he is.

Recross: I don't know of my own knowledge about Mr. Overton.

Arthur F. Comer, defendant, having been duly sworn, testified as follows:

I am the father of the child now before the court. In July, 1918, I was at Camp Stewart. I was there making preparations for embarking overseas. I have been all over Europe on various missions between that time and the beginning of this year. What you show me is known as an officers' record book. It contains recommendations of the officers under whom I served in the capacity of valuing engineer, and so forth. My profession is that of an architect. My duties during the time I was in the service was valuing engineer. I was in the service 36 months. I am living in Savannah now. My profession in Savannah is that of an architect. I am financially able to take care and support and maintain my child. I have been supporting, maintaining, and taking care of my child since its birth. I am willing to continue to do so. The present surroundings of the child are the best home that could possibly be furnished her. She is receiving the best attention my mother can give it. In my opinion my mother is the better qualified to take care and rear my child; she does not know any other mother. The child regards my mother as its mother; knows no other. The temperament and characteristics of my wife are emotional, erratic, and unstable. I say unstable because you can't depend on her for anything any length of time. She is changeable, erratic, and not dependable, first, from a religious standpoint; she has changed, to my knowledge, from Catholic to Episcopal; she has attended one or two services of the Christian Church, and has adopted the Christian Science faith. I am confident of my own knowledge that if my child was sick that her religion would dictate that she have a Christian Science healer. When I left for Europe, as to what my plans for my wife and child, I discussed with my wife that phase of their home life; the question was brought up by my wife asking permission to go to New York to study music. I told her that it would not be advisable for her to do that because of the health of the child, which was bad, and she had no place to take the child; it was no place to take the child—she had no relatives or friends there. I had that discussion with my wife one day before I left for France at Ft. Stewart. She withdrew her intention to go to New York; she said that she would go to the mountains until the 1st of October, and then return to my mother, because my brother was going into the service, and my father was on the seas, and she stated that she would make her home with my mother. I received those letters identified by my wife. I returned to Savannah, discharged from the army, on the 8th of March, of this year. The paper you show me contains my record, statements by my colonels in France. As to the care and attention my child has received at the hands of my mother since I have returned, I could not wish for any better treatment of the child, and from the testimony of my friends I am sure it could not be better while I was in the service. I do wish to retain the custody of my child. If I am permitted to have the child I will always give to it the same kind care and attention that it has received heretofore by my mother. I consider for the best welfare of the child as to where it shall be taken care of that it shall be with my mother, because it has a delicate constitution; it has recently gained strength after a case, as the doctor described it, of acidity of the stomach; the food has to be properly selected, properly cooked, and in proper quantities. The treatment my child received from its mother depended upon the daily program of my wife as to where she was going. By "depending upon the daily program of my wife as to where she was going" I mean by that if my wife had something personally to do which required her time otherwise the child did not get the proper care. I can cite one instance, among many instances, where the milk was not given to the child in its proper condition, because in her hurry to leave the house the ——— which had to go into the milk was not properly cooked. It was against my consent that my wife remained in New York pursuing her musical study. I know the father of Mrs. Pauline Comer. I know his general reputation and character in this community for morality. It is bad. I am not willing for my child to be reared in a home where he should be arbiter of that child and my wife;

I am trying not to subject my child to that exposure.

Cross-examination: My wife after she came back phoned to me once. I said I would see her some time. It is correct that she phoned me once, and I said I could not see her that night. It is correct that she asked me if I would see her the next day. It is not true that she asked if I could see her the night after that, nor the day after that. She did not the third time. I said she could see me some time during the next week if it was possible. The reason why I would not let her come to see me was because I considered what she was doing as an indirect way of attempting to live with me again. I was thinking over the matter, and when she telephoned me I was not in the mental attitude of desiring her to come. I did not have a long time to think about it. I was away from her several months. I had not written her harsh letters. She appealed to me only once shortly after I came back for an interview. She did twice in the same conversation. I had a definite arrangement. That was that I would try to see her the following week. I had become aware that she wanted to live with me again. Not through a letter that she wrote to my mother—through a statement from my brother. My brother told me that my wife wanted to live with me again. I knew that my mother had received a letter from my wife, but I did not see it. As to my acknowledging a letter, although written to my mother, you are referring to a different letter. I saw only one letter, the next to the last letter that my wife wrote to my mother. Only one letter I have seen that she wrote to my mother. That is the letter that I wrote a reply to; that is the letter that you show me. Prior to the time that I went away my wife went on to where I was stationed to see me. I was well at that time. I was not under treatment at that time by anybody. I was not under treatment at any time that my wife visited me, after I had gone into the army. The only time I ever saw a doctor, that I remember, was the time the doctor told me I had autointoxication; I saw one doctor, I believe. I was not under treatment at all while stationed at Ft. Monroe, at the training school. I was, with several others, placed in quarantine, because we were threatened with measles. I did give the information to my wife that the lavatories were very filthy around there. I remember the occasion now. I think my wife was a little over 20 when I married her. That is correct that the baby was born about 9 months after we were married. I don't know how old my wife was when her mother died; I have been told, but I have forgotten it. I never knew her mother. My wife was over 21 when her baby was born, a little over 21. She neglected the baby on many occasions. She went out with me sometimes, not quite frequently at night. My mother looked after the baby when she went out at night with me. I know the baby's food was not properly prepared, because Dr. Crawford told me so. Dr. Crawford told me and that is really the way I know about it. Mrs. Comer brought the baby to see me off. I did not think that was all right. I advised her not to do it, because I investigated the conditions in the surrounding country in Newport News, and places outside, and came to the conclusion that the places around there were no places for a baby and a young wife to be at. It was absolutely natural for a young mother to want her only baby to see her father off to say good-bye to him; it was the most natural thing for a father to want his baby to be brought to him to say good-bye. I did not promptly shut off my wife's allowance when I found that she was in New York, studying art, and in that letter which she wrote to me, explaining the circumstances of everything like that—how she had left the baby to the tender solicitude of her grandmother and care. The allowance did not stop quickly after I found she was in New York. It didn't stop as quickly as I could stop it—it continued. It continued through the month of January, 1919. It continued six months. I got my wife's letter, telling me about her being in New York, the latter part of August, 1918. The allowance continued until January, 1919. I shut off the allowance in January, 1919, because she told me she was financially able to take care of herself. I did not know what employment she had at that time. Outside of my mother I have relatives, an aunt and uncle, to look after the baby, in their homes, Boston, Mass., and New Hampshire—nobody else in Savannah. My mother is naturally devoted to the child. She has not taught the baby to call her Mother. The child adopted it by hearing my brother call my mother Mother. The baby calls Mrs. Comer, my wife, Pauline. I have no regular income; I am in partnership with Henrik Wallin, architect. I have no income at all; I am re-establishing my business. I have been in the army, and I have no interest in any work except that secured after my return from the army.

Redirect: I have plenty of work in prospect that will insure me a competency. The year before I went into the army my earning capacity and ability was over $4,000. I anticipate that this coming year it looks as if it will be equal to that.

Mrs. W. T. Dakin, a witness for the defendants, having been duly sworn, testified as follows:

My name is Mrs. Dakin. I live in Savannah. My husband is the Rev. W. T. Dakin. I know Mrs. Pauline Comer. I know Mrs. William P. Comer. I know Arthur Comer. I know the little child in the custody of Mrs. William P. Comer. I have had every opportunity to observe the care and treatment that child received; I live next door. The child receives excellent care. Mrs. W. P. Comer is qualified for the care and custody of the child. I do not know the temperament and characteristics of Mrs. Pauline Comer. I am not able to express an opinion as to which one would be the most qualified to rear that child. I have met Mr. Arthur Overton. I do not know the general character he bears in this community for morality. I do not know his reputation. I live next door to Mrs. O. Comer. The general reputation of Mr. Arthur Comer is good, from what I have heard.

Mrs. Augusta Lynah, a witness for the defendants, having been duly sworn, testified as follows:

My name is Mrs. Lynah. I know Mrs. Carmine Comer. I know Mrs. Pauline Comer. I have known Mrs. Pauline Comer all my life. I have known Mrs. Carmine Comer since Pauline has been married. I do not know the temperament and characteristics of Mrs. Pauline Comer very intimately. I don't know the temperament and characteristics of Mrs. Carmine Comer very intimately. I know the care and custody, attention that is being given to the child of Mrs. Pauline Comer by Mrs. Carmine Comer. It has received most careful attention. From my knowledge of the two ladies, and the care and attention that has been accorded to the child, in my opinion the child would be best protected in the grandmother. I know only from hearsay about the circumstances of Mrs. Arthur Comer leaving the child and going to New York.

Mrs. C. V. Snedeker, a witness for the defendants, having been duly sworn, testified as follows:

My name is Mrs. C. V. Snedeker. I live 924 East Henry. I know Mrs. Carmine Comer. Apparently the child of Mrs. Pauline Comer gets the best of care from Mrs. Carmine Comer. I have occasionally visited the home of Mrs. Carmine Comer. I know Arthur Comer. I know Mrs. Pauline Comer. I have not known her very long. I know nothing of the characteristics of Mrs. Pauline Comer.

Mrs. J. H. Bolshaw, a witness for the defendants, having been duly sworn, testified as follows:

My name is Mrs. Bolshaw. I know Mrs. Carmine Comer. I know Arthur Comer. I know Mrs. Pauline Comer. I know that the little child has received the best of care while in the custody and care of its grandmother.

Mrs. Pauline Comer, the plaintiff, recalled, further testified:

At the time I went away I consulted with my mother-in-law, my father, and my aunts about the propriety of my going away. Mrs. Comer, my mother-in-law, said that I had arranged everything splendidly, and said that she would be glad to take care of the baby while I was gone. There was no suggestion made, at the time I left my baby, upon the part of my mother-in-law, that it was not proper for me to leave the baby with her. There was no suggestion or intimation that I was going to leave the baby with her permanently. When I came back from New York the baby was left with Mrs. Comer, Sr., because I thought through her reconciliation might be effected, between my husband and myself, for her sake. I have a letter that I wrote to Mrs. Comer. It has been impossible for me to go to my mother-in-law's house under the conditions and treatment which have been accorded me by my husband since my return. My father's habits are good now. He is leading an entirely clean and wholesome life. He has a home and I am living with him. I have a comfortable home to take my baby to and rear it. If my baby were to get ill, I would not have any objection to her being treated by a regular practitioner of medicine. I have not said anything about the subject to my brother-in-law. I would be perfectly willing to have it attended to by a physician.

Cross-examination: I don't know anything about my father's habits; he used to drink; he has not been doing that in 4 years. I don't know anything about his moral life.

Mrs. W. P. (Carmine) Comer, a witness, recalled, further testified as follows:

The statement made by Mrs. Pauline Comer that I advised her to go to New York, that I thought the arrangements made were admirable, that this was an opportunity for her to cultivate her voice, and that she went with my entire consent and approval is not true; I did not approve of it. I didn't state to Mrs. Pauline Comer that this was a good time for her to cultivate her voice, and I approved of her leaving her child with me and going to New York. Nothing of that kind was said by me to her.

BIBB COUNTY v. JONES et al.

JONES et al. v. BIBB COUNTY.

(Nos. 1823, 1824.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 5, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Trial \S 280(1)—Requested charges covered by general charge properly refused.

It was not error to refuse requests to charge where they were fully covered by the court's general charge.

2. Evidence \S 419(2)—Consideration recited in deed prima facie true.

The recital of a consideration in a deed is to be taken as prima facie true, but is subject to be overcome or explained by parol testimony, and court did not err in so charging as against an objection that it should have charged that the recital in the deed of receipt of a consideration is presumed to be true, and such presumption continues until it is overcome by evidence.

3. Evidence ~~¶~~273(2)—Testimony as to statement held immaterial and irrelevant.

In an action against a county to set aside alleged gift of land to a county, testimony as to statements of donor as to how he had acquired the land was properly excluded as being immaterial and irrelevant.

HILL, J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County;
E. D. Graham, Judge.

Action by D. B. Jones and others against the County of Bibb. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error, and plaintiffs file cross-bill. Reversed on main bill of exceptions and affirmed on cross-bill.

The bill of exceptions contained the following:

Be it further remembered, that during the trial of said case the testimony of Roff Sims, as follows, was offered by plaintiffs:

"I knew Aaron A. Roff; was named for him. In 1876 or 1877, when I was about 16 years old, I was frequently with Mr. Roff. At that time I was acquainted with the property known as Roff Home, and am acquainted with it now. When I was about 16 years old, I was driving by that property with Mr. Roff, and he pointed to it, and asked me if I knew that at one time he owned that place. I told him, 'Yes,' I heard that he owned it. And he said, 'Yes, you know I gave it to the county.' He said that he took it from Mrs. Donald B. Jones to pay the debt of Adams, Jones & Reynolds that was due to him, of which firm Mrs. Jones' husband was a member. He often referred to it as having been taken from Mrs. Jones to pay this obligation. On one occasion he said to me, that he was a money lender and didn't want any property and didn't feel as if, having taken this property in payment for a debt, from a woman, that he cared to liquidate it and have it to become a part of his estate, and therefore gave it away."

The defendant objected to said testimony as to all statements of Mr. Roff as to how he acquired title to the property and the consideration paid for it, and as to every other statement with reference to it, on the grounds: First, that it is hearsay; and, second, that the statements were made by Mr. Roff after he parted with title and possession of the property. The court sustained said objections, and excluded said testimony concerning the statements of Mr. Roff from the jury. To which ruling of the court, the plaintiffs then and there excepted, and now except, and assign the same as error, and say that the court erred in excluding said testimony.

That on the trial of said case, the court charged the jury as follows: "The recital of a consideration in the deed from Jones to Roff is to be taken as prima facie true, but is subject to be overcome or explained by parol testimony." To which charge the plaintiffs then and there excepted, and now except, and assign the same as error, and say the court should have charged the jury that the recital in the deed of receipt of a consideration is presumed to be true, and such presumption continues until it is overcome by evidence.

W. G. Smith and Jos. H. Hall, both of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

J. L. Anderson, of Atlanta, and Ross & Ross, of Macon, for defendants in error.

PER CURIAM. When this case was before this court on a former occasion (County of Bibb v. Jones, 147 Ga. 493, 94 S. E. 765) it was held that the deed of the trustee and his wife, unless void for fraud, conveyed the entire estate in the property conveyed by the deed to the husband and trustee. The fourth division of the decision then rendered is as follows:

"Having held, in the second division of this decision, that the deed from the trustee was effective to convey the entire property, unless impeached for fraud, and it appearing upon an inspection of the evidence contained in the record that the evidence was not of such a character as to require a finding that the transaction was fraudulent, the court erred in directing a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for the property in dispute."

The evidence introduced upon that trial, for the purpose of impeaching the deed for fraud, consisted of the testimony of the wife of the trustee, which had been perpetuated under order of court. Her evidence was direct, unequivocal, and undisputed. On the subsequent trial of the case, now under review, the plaintiff offered in evidence the same testimony, and, in addition, other testimony tending to establish the same fact which upon the former trial was undisputed. Held:

1. Under the evidence in the present record, and in view of the ruling quoted above, the verdict for the plaintiffs was unauthorized, and the court therefore erred in overruling the defendant's motion for new trial.

[1-3] 2. Certain charges of the court and refusals of certain requests to charge are assigned as error in the cross-bill of exceptions. The requests to charge, in so far as legal and pertinent, were fully covered by the court's general charge to the jury, and the charges given are not erroneous for any reason assigned. The evidence, the exclusion of which is also assigned as error in the cross-bill of exceptions, was immaterial and irrelevant to any issue in the case, and the court did not err in excluding it.

Judgment reversed on the main bill of exceptions, and affirmed on the cross-bill.

All the Justices concur, except

HILL, J. (dissenting). In view of the ruling made in the case when it was formerly before this court, and of the evidence in the present record, I dissent from the ruling of the majority of the court in the first head-note [division of decision].

HILL v. NEELY.NEELY v. HILL.

(Nos. 2131, 2139.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 4, 1921.)

*(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)1. Estoppel §120—Giving Code definitions of equitable estoppel held applicable to evidence.

Giving the definitions of equitable estoppel as pertaining to real estate set forth in Civ. Code 1910, §§ 5737, 5738, held not inapplicable to evidence, though the estoppel relied on was recited in written deed.

2. Estoppel §32(1)—Description in deed to constitute estoppel must be definite and accurate.

For an estoppel to operate against a party signing a deed as to a boundary line between two adjacent tracts of land, the description included in the deed of the boundary line in question must be sufficiently definite and accurate to put the party signing the deed, and who it is claimed is estopped, on notice as to the definite boundary line between the tracts of land in question.

3. Ejectment §94—Evidence should so identify land as to enable sheriff to put plaintiff in possession.

In an ejectment suit it is essential that the evidence should identify the land and locate the boundary in such a manner as to enable the sheriff to put the plaintiff in possession of just the right land and no more.

4. Ejectment §110—Instruction as to map or survey being color of title held properly refused.

In ejectment, held, that court did not err in refusing to charge the jury that "a map or survey is not of itself title to land nor color of title."

5. Estoppel §120 — Instruction as to notice of contents of recital in deed held properly refused.

In ejectment arising out of a boundary dispute, held, that court did not err in refusing to charge, "If you find from the evidence that a deed was filed by R. C. Company through R. C. as president, then R. C. is himself charged with notice of the recitals in that deed, and it is for you to decide under the evidence whether that notice would work an equitable estoppel."

Error from Superior Court, Burke County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Action by R. C. Neely against L. D. Hill. From a judgment defendant brings error, and plaintiff files a cross-bill. Judgment on main bill of exceptions affirmed, and cross-bill dismissed.

Charges relating to equitable estoppel were as follows:

"Gentlemen, I charge you this on the subject of estoppel: Where the estoppel relates to the title to real estate, the party claiming to have been influenced by the other's acts or declarations must not only be ignorant of the true title, but also of any convenient means of acquiring such knowledge. Where both parties have equal knowledge or equal means of obtaining the truth, there is no estoppel. In order for an equitable estoppel to arise, there must generally be some intended deception in the conduct or declarations of the party to be estopped or such gross negligence as to amount to constructive fraud, by which another has been misled to his injury. I charge you that for an estoppel to operate against a party signing a deed, as to a boundary line between two adjacent tracts of land, the description included in the deed of the boundary line in question must be sufficiently definite and accurate to put the party signing the deed, and who it is claimed is estopped, on notice as to the definite boundary line between the tracts of land in question, and if it is too indefinite to put the party executing the deed on notice, then it would not amount to an estoppel. If you find that the plaintiff has not put before you sufficient evidence to prove the land claimed on the western side of Beaver Dam creek was in fact a part of the plantation known as Forest Hill, as alleged in his petition, then he cannot recover, and your verdict should be for the defendant. In an ejectment suit—and this is an ejectment suit—it is essential that the evidence should identify the land and locate the boundaries in such a manner as to enable the sheriff to put the plaintiff in possession of just the right land and no more. If the evidence for any reason fails to give you the facts on which such location can be made of the land in dispute, then your verdict should be for the defendant. In regard to the partition proceedings and plat of the Waterloo Plantation, I charge you that you are not to consider these documents as evidence of title of the plaintiff to the land sued for as part of Forest Hill Plantation, but you are to consider these documents only as evidence for what they may be worth in locating the boundaries of the land claimed by plaintiff under his own chain of title as part of Forest Hill Plantation. Gentlemen, it is for you, therefore, to say whether the plaintiff, claiming this land under a chain of title, written deeds and muniments of title extending back over a number of years as claimed, has, in the first place, shown you that any land on the western side of Beaver Dam creek is his as the purchaser and owner of the Forest Hill Plantation; next, where that land is, and within reasonable limits what are its boundaries and what is its amount. If he has successfully done that, by the greater weight of credible testimony, he should recover. If he has not, your verdict should be for the defendant."

Some of the grounds for new trial were as follows:

(12) The court erred in refusing to give in charge to the jury the following written request, duly presented by counsel for defendant: "A map or survey is not of itself title to land nor color of title"—the error arising because said request was sound in law and was applicable to the facts of the case. No evidence having been offered to prove the accuracy of the map or survey.

(151 Ga. 322)

(18) The court erred in refusing to give in charge to the jury the following written request duly presented by counsel for defendant: "If you find from the evidence that a deed was signed by R. C. Neely Company through R. C. Neely as president, then R. C. Neely is himself charged with notice of the recitals in that deed, and it is for you to decide under the evidence whether that notice would work an equitable estoppel"—the error arising because said request was sound in law and was applicable to the facts of the case.

(17) The court erred in charging the jury as follows: "In regard to the partition proceedings and plat of Waterloo Plantation, I charge you that you are not to consider these documents as evidence of title of plaintiff to the land sued for as part of Forest Hill Plantation, but you to consider these documents only as evidence for what they may be worth in locating the boundaries of the land claimed by plaintiff under his own chain of title as part of Forest Hill Plantation."

GEORGE, J. [1-3] 1. "Where the estoppel relates to the title to real estate, the party claiming to have been influenced by the other's acts or declarations must not only be ignorant of the true title, but also of any convenient means of acquiring such knowledge. Where both parties have equal knowledge or equal means of obtaining the truth, there is no estoppel." Civil Code 1910, § 5737. "In order for an equitable estoppel to arise, there must generally be some intended deception in the conduct or declarations of the party to be estopped, or such gross negligence as to amount to constructive fraud, by which another has been misled to his injury." Civil Code 1910, § 5738. See Wilkins v. McGehee, 86 Ga. 764, 13 S. E. 84; Stonecipher v. Kear, 131 Ga. 688, 63 S. E. 215, 127 Am. St. Rep. 248; Oats v. Jones, 136 Ga. 704, 71 S. The charges of the court relating to the doctrine of estoppel were authorized by the evidence, and were substantially correct.

[4, 5] 2. The rulings on the admissibility of evidence, and the refusal of the court to charge the jury as requested, show no cause for reversal.

3. The evidence for the plaintiff is sufficient to identify the land claimed, and the verdict finding for the plaintiff the premises in dispute is not without evidence to support it.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

Divorce—§312—Award of custody of child to mother on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

In a divorce action, where the evidence was conflicting, held, that the action of the court in awarding mother custody of a 13 year old child would not be disturbed.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; H. A. Mathews, Judge.

Action by Mrs. W. T. Watts against W. T. Watts. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

See, also, 106 S. E. 731.

The plaintiff testified:

I am the mother of this girl child. She is about 13 years old. Mr. Watts has never helped me to take care of the child. He has not provided it with clothes to wear. Mr. Watts, my husband, left me during the year 1915, and went to the state of Alabama, and stayed there for some time. When Mr. Watts came back from Alabama, I told him I could not take him into my home as a husband no more, but would take him in as a boarder, like the rest of the boarders I had at my house, and let him pay me $6 per week. This he done. We slept in the same room in different beds, but never cohabited again as man and wife. My house was raided twice, but the police and detectives did not find anything wrong with my lady boarders, but advised me to ask them to leave my home, stating that they knew that I did not know the character of the women, but that they [the detectives] did, and advised me to have them leave my home, which I did. I had three working girls in my house at the time. They worked at the cotton mills. I never did see anything wrong with them. They acted all right around me. They always conducted themselves like ladies around me. At the time that my husband left my home I was afflicted with rheumatism, and he attempted to take my child away is the reason that I called him a son of a bitch, and I threw bricks at him when he left for the state of Alabama. I am sorry that I used such language. I am not accustomed to using such language: I have supported myself and child. He has never given it anything to wear. When Mr. Watts was in Alabama, he sent the child three pennies and a pair of stockings and a dress. My rent on my houses made it so that I could live and support my child.

The defendant testified:

I am the defendant in this proceedings. I am the father of this girl child. When I came back from Alabama, I came back to my wife and little child. I was in the state of Alabama two years, during the year of 1915 and 1916. My wife told me that she would not take me back as a husband, but would take me as a stranger and boarder, and charge me $6 per week. When I returned home, I found two women in my house of bad character. I told my wife to get rid of them; that they were not the right kind of women to keep in her house. She refused to do this, and in a short time the house was raided by the police. The women then left the house. My home was raided twice for bad women, and in a few days after that two more women came there, and their character was not good. They would have men to come there from 10 to 12 o'clock in the nighttime. They would slip through the house into their rooms, and would stay at a late hour of the night. Automobiles would gather around my home, and I could hear men going to their rooms. At 10 o'clock one night a man come and knocked at the door, and I went to the door, and a man dressed as a soldier asked me was this 1011 Elbert street, and I told him, "Yes," and he said that a man and woman was out in the car and wanted a room, and that he heard that I had rooms to let. I told him, "No, sir; we have no rooms to let;" and I shut the door in his face and went off, and my wife remarked to me and said: "I have lost $5 now by not taking in them." On one occasion I came from my work, and she had a pint of whisky, and I asked her where she got it, and she said a man give it to her and told her not to tell me about it. My wife is a woman that uses profane language in the presence of my little girl, and she allows her older boys by her first husband to curse around them, and allows the boys to lie around with the girls on the bed and play with them in the presence of my little child. My wife run me away from home. She told me to go to Alabama and stay there; never to put my foot in her yard again. She called me a son of a bitch. She threw bricks at me the day that I left for Alabama. During my absence in Alabama I sent the child all of the clothes that it needed, and I sent them a barrel of apples at one time. While living in Macon, I run a meat market for 10 months, and fed my wife and her boarders, and she never paid me a cent for it. My wife is not a fit and proper person to raise my little girl child. I have two sisters in Alabama and myself will take care of the child, and will provide for it and give it an education and raise it in the proper manner; that is where I propose to carry the child if the court awards her to me. That place where my child is now is no home for it. I never did mistreat my wife, nor desert her in any way. I have always treated her in a kind and affectionate manner.

DENSON v. STATE. (No. 12029.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 8, 1921.)*(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)Larceny §64(6)—Evidence held to explain possession, so as to prevent conviction on proof of recent possession.

On trial for larceny of lumber claimed to have been blown from the prosecuting witness' billboard on a vacant lot, evidence concerning defendant's claim that he purchased the lumber from people giving a show on the vacant lot held to fully explain his possession, and prevent a conviction on proof of recent possession alone.

Error from City Court of Macon; F. Holmes Johnson, Judge.

Jackson Denson was convicted of simple larceny, and he brings error. Reversed.

The property claimed to have been stolen consisted of molding and other lumber claimed to have been blown from defendant's billboard on a vacant lot adjoining defendant's lot during a storm, and to have been subsequently found under defendant's house. The prosecuting witness testified that defendant told him he purchased part of the lumber from people who gave a show on the vacant lot, and that the show people gave him some of it for services; that the lumber was not concealed from public view, and that the molding was red and green in color. Another witness for the state testified to seeing the molding and telling defendant that it belonged to the prosecuting witness, and that defendant said he bought it from the show people.

Priscilla Pearce testified for defendant that she saw green lumber under the house before the storm, and that it was plainly exposed to public view. Joe Coates testified that before the storm he saw lumber under defendant's house, part of which was green, and that defendant told him he bought part of it from the show people, and they gave him some of it for favors he had done for them. Jesse Fredick testified that before the storm he saw defendant, and one of the showmen standing in front of a pile of lumber, and that he saw defendant give the showman some money; that he stopped and looked at the lumber, and that some was red and some green.

Defendant in his statement said that he did the show people certain favors, and that after the show one of the show employes sold him a pile of lumber for $1 and gave him another pile; that when the prosecuting witness' employes claimed the lumber he denied that it belonged to the prosecuting witness, and told him he had bought it from the show people; and that he put the lumber under his house, and it was plainly exposed to public view.—Statement by editor.

HOWARD v. STATE. (No. 12043.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 8, 1921.)*(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)Criminal law §595(1)—No abuse of discretion in refusing continuance.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to murder, held, that court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to continue the case on account of absent witnesses who would testify that prosecuting witness was chasing defendant with a razor at the time, when defendant procured a pistol and fired the shot.

Error from Superior Court, Appling County; J. P. Highsmith, Judge.

Hattie Howard was convicted of assault to murder and brings error. Affirmed.

The motion to continue the case referred to in the opinion was as follows:

Now, comes the defendant, Hattie Howard, in the above-stated case at the call of same and moves the court to continue said case for this term of court, and for grounds of said motion states the following facts:

This defendant shows that she was indicted at this term of court, which court convened on April 12, 1920, and this defendant was indicted on the 12th day of April, 1920, for the offense of assault to murder one Lucile Pierce, being charged with shooting at her with a pistol and gun and hitting her, and it being charged that same was done without justification. This defendant further shows that this shooting occurred on the "turpentine quarters" of the Surrency Turpentine Company, Surrency, Ga., and at the time the shooting was done there were present Lillie Bell Norwood and Estelle Walker, both of whom reside at Surrency, Ga., both of whom were within 30 feet of this defendant at the time the shooting was done, and affiant further on oath says that since she has been indicted for said offense that she has had issued by the clerk of this court on the 13th day of April, 1920, subpoenas for said two named persons above, to wit, Lillie May Norwood and Estelle Walker, and this defendant shows that they were present from the time the altercation started between this defendant and the said Lucile Pierce until the same was ended and wound up and saw the entire happening at said fight. This defendant further shows that these parties live in this county, and just as soon as this defendant found she was indicted as stated aforesaid she procured subpoenas and had them placed in the hands of the sheriff of this court to summon said witnesses. This defendant further shows that these two witnesses will swear that at the time the shooting was done by this defendant that Lucile Pierce, the woman who was shot by this defendant, had a razor in hand and was after this defendant, chasing this defendant with her razor and undertaking to take the life of this defendant, and this defendant procured a pistol from Estelle Walker and fired the shot at the said Lucile Pierce, and did it after she had been running this defendant for some time with the razor, and these witnesses will swear these facts, and will swear to seeing the razor, and the party heretofore named started after this defendant with said razor, and this defendant further shows that she has no other witness that was present at said time or who knows the facts about the case that she can summons to prove same, except the two witnesses named above, and this defendant does not make this motion for the purpose of delay only, but same is made for the purpose of procuring the testimony of these witnesses, and this defendant expects to have said witnesses present at the next term of this court, and these witnesses have not left the county or place where they were by the consent or procurement of this defendant, and this defendant has not agreed for one or either of them to remain away from court, and defendant expects to be ready for the trial of this case at the next term of this court. This defendant expects to further prove by the above-named witnesses that she did not start the trouble between herself and the victim of the shooting, but expects to prove by said witnesses that this party, this defendant, shot without cause or provocation, drew her razor and began cursing this defendant and took after this defendant with same, and it was the only method this defendant had of stopping said party chasing her, and which facts this defendant expects to show by said witnesses heretofore named. This defendant expects to show further that the witnesses that are subpoenaed by the state, to wit, Julia Williams and Maggie Rogers, were not present at the time the shooting occurred, nor were they close enough to see how the disturbance started, nor do they know any of the facts connected with said shooting, and this defendant is informed that said witnesses for the state will swear that they were present, and that the said Lucile Pierce was not chasing this defendant at the time the shooting was done by this defendant, and this defendant shows that she can disprove what they will swear along this line, if they should so swear as this defendant is informed they will swear, and this defendant can at least, whether they swear or not, show that she acted absolutely in defense of herself and person at the time she fired the shot and hit the alleged victim in said indictment, and this motion is made for the purpose of getting the evidence and testimony of these two witnesses for the consideration of the jury and on the trial of this case.

This defendant shows that immediately after she found out that a bill of indictment was returned against this defendant that she delayed no time in trying to procure the attendance of said witnesses by having them served to attend as witnesses at this term of court to testify for this defendant. This defendant further shows that every fact stated in this motion with reference to what the witnesses sought to be summoned will swear is true, and this defendant states that each of the witnesses named as stated will swear what this defendant has stated herein they will swear, and this defendant makes this motion for a continuance in good faith, believing that she will be acquitted if she can get these witnesses she seeks to get.

1. Master and servant \S 67—Burden of proof on prosecution under labor contract act.

In a prosecution under the labor contract act (Pen. Code 1910, §§ 715, 716), the burden of proof is on the state to show affirmatively that accused failed to perform the services contracted for, or failed to return the money advanced on the strength of the contract, "without good and sufficient cause."

2. Master and servant \S 67—Evidence insufficient to show violation of labor contract act.

In prosecution under labor contract act (Pen. Code 1910, §§ 715, 716), evidence held insufficient to show that laborer receiving an advance of $1 failed to carry out contract or return of the $1 without "good and sufficient cause."

Error from City Court of Leesburg; W. G. Martin, Judge.

Nig Alford was convicted of cheating and swindling, and he brings error. Reversed.

J. E. Matthews, employer and prosecutor, testified, in effect, that he hired accused under a contract for a year's services and advanced him $1 on faith of the contract, and accused did not perform any part of the contract or return the $1, and that he gave accused no cause to fail to carry out his contract, but that prosecutor did not know positively that accused was not sick or in jail. Prosecutor also testified that the first time he saw accused he did not demand the return of the $1, but did demand that he pay him $140, which accused owed him.—Statement by editor.

MORRISON v. ALEXANDER. (No. 11931.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 9, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Trial \S 170 — Verdict properly directed when demanded as matter of law.

It was not error to direct a verdict against defendant where the verdict directed was demanded as a matter of law.

2. Banks and banking \S 77(6)—In action by receiver on note pleas held properly stricken.

In an action by the receiver of a bank on notes, amended pleas alleging that defendant was held liable to a third party on an accommodation note executed to the bank and had paid the judgment and become subrogated to the judgment creditor's rights and was entitled to set off the amount paid on the judgment, and that one of the notes had been settled subsequent to the filing of the original plea in bankruptcy proceedings against a third party, held properly stricken.

3. Evidence \S 457 — Permitting witness not making notation on note to explain abbreviation held not error.

Where a note held by a bank bore the notation, "Cr. by cash $3,781.20, note ex. for $3,120.00, interest $120," it was not error to permit a witness to testify that "ex." meant exchange, though he did not make the notation.

4. Bills and notes \S 497(1)—Proof under plea denying plaintiff's ownership of note payable to it held not to overcome presumption.

In an action by the receiver of a bank on a note payable to the bank, where there was no allegation or proof of fraud in the procurement of the note, and nothing alleged or proved negating the presumption that plaintiff was a bona fide holder and owner, a plea denying plaintiff's ownership was not sustained in view of Civ. Code 1910, §§ 4288 and 4290.

5. Banks and banking \S 77(6)—Plea denying plaintiff's ownership should be stricken unless necessary.

Under Civ. Code 1910, § 4290, providing that the title of the holder of a note cannot be inquired into unless necessary for defendant's protection or to let in the defense which he seeks to make, where, in an action by the receiver of a bank on a note payable to the bank, its execution is admitted, a plea denying that it was the holder or owner should be stricken on demurrer where such inquiry is not necessary.

Error from City Court of Richmond County; J. C. C. Black, Jr., Judge.

Action by Irvin Alexander, receiver of the Irish-American Bank, against H. C. Morrison. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The first assignment of error complained of the direction of the verdict.

The second and third assignments complained of the striking of amended pleas A and D. Amended plea A alleged that in a suit by the Citizens' & Southern Bank defendant was held liable on an accommodation note made by him to the Irish-American Bank and had paid the judgment and become subrogated to the rights of the Citizens' & Southern Bank against the Irish-American Bank and its receiver and was entitled to set off the amount paid on such judgment. It also alleged that the note had been settled in bankruptcy proceedings of the Industrial Lumber Company. Plea D alleged practically the same facts concerning a suit against defendant on the accommodation note and the payment of the judgment, and also alleged that subsequent to the filing of the original plea the note was claimed by the lumber company, and defendant's liability was settled, the receiver or his attorney being present and consenting to the settlement, that the credit thereon was paid by the lumber company, and not by defendant, and the note was settied by the lumber company's trustee in bankruptcy.

Assignment 4 complained of the striking of that portion of defendant's answer wherein it set up that the note sued on was not plaintiff's property.

Assignment 5 complained of the testimony of one Welges. A note in evidence bore the notation: "Cr. by cash $3,781.80, note ex. for $3,120, interest $120." Welges, who apparently did not make the notation, was permitted to testify that "ex." meant exchange.

Assignment 6 complained of the refusal of the charge mentioned in the opinion.
